Mark your calendars and pay the chambers later for attending the next awesome Christmas party for 2019!

Friday, December 13th after his conference ends (so could be 12:30 or 1 start - TBD)

If anyone is interested in joining us for Wreaths Across America, we can't take everyone, but maybe 15 of the families this year! RSVP if you want in for Saturday, Dec 14th when we meet up around 7:30 am near Pentagon Mall and caravan in. Usually done by 11:00 am. There is a Wreaths Across America website too for more info, in general. We are just getting a slightly different treatment for this huge open to the public event, as many of you know.

Cheers, Ginni

Hi Valeria – Here is the one from our website, but I’m checking with our public affairs team to see if we have something shorter for you.

Dr. Heath P. Tarbert is Chairman and Chief Executive of the Commodity Futures Trading Commission. He was nominated for a term expiring on April 13, 2024 and took office on July 15, 2019. The mission of the CFTC is to promote the integrity, resilience, and vibrancy of the U.S. derivatives markets through sound regulation. Chairman Tarbert also serves as a voting member of the Financial Stability Oversight Council (FSOC), as a Vice Chair of the International Organization of Securities Commissions (IOSCO) Board, and as a member of the President’s Working Group on Financial Markets.

Chairman Tarbert has extensive experience in financial services law and has served in senior leadership roles in the public and private sector. Most recently, he served as Assistant Secretary for International Markets and subsequently as acting Under Secretary for International Affairs at the U.S. Department of the Treasury. Prior to his service at the Treasury Department, Chairman Tarbert was head of the bank regulatory practice of Allen & Overy LLP, a leading global law firm.

Hi Summer,

Attached is a draft agenda for our COP meeting next week. We thank Dr. Tarbert for his flexibility to present during our meeting. The White House is aware that Dr. Tarbert is planning on joining the call with the President, as soon as I have the link for that first part of the meeting I will share it with you.

Here is the link for Dr. Tarbert to join the second part of the meeting. We would ask him to call in at least 10 minutes before 11:30 am to make sure he has no problems logging in.

INVITE LINK FOR JULY 15

President Duvall will be introducing Dr. Tarbert, and I understand he will have some slides. He will have complete control over them, but if you would like our help with that let me know. He is scheduled to present from 11.30 am to 12 pm.

I also attached a list of all farm bureau presidents registered to attend; they will be joined by their administrators and National Affair Coordinators from their state.

Press is not invited, this is a private event and it will not be recorded.

Please let me know if you have any questions. My cellphone in case you need it for next week is^{(b)(6)}

I hope you have a nice weekend and see you all next week.

The Heritage Foundation offers 60 plus paid internships every spring, summer, and fall; and our program attracts young conservative leaders of the highest caliber. Heritage Foundation interns get to work directly with our prestigious analysts and policy makers, and many will have the opportunity for original research and writing. We train, equip, and develop tomorrow's young conservative leaders during their time at Heritage through educational programs like First Principles lectures, policy briefings, mentorship, research, and social gatherings with prominent Heritage fellows. This is definitely not an internship where you're fetching coffee or making copies. Interns are working alongside researchers, attending outreach meetings, and communicating policy.

Heritage is looking for rising juniors, seniors, and graduate students interested in experiencing DC first hand for the 2019 fall internship program. You can find a full list of the 60 plus open roles online at <https://hyperlink.services.treasury.gov/agency.do?origin=www.heritage.org/internships>. Interested applicants should apply by June 3rd by filling out our online application. They will also need to submit 2 letters of recommendation and an official school transcript by the deadline. International students must also submit work authorization.

When is it appropriate to resist the agents of the state? For many, the answer may be (all too) easy: never. But the United States itself was founded on one such act of resistance, and libertarians have always been deeply skeptical that the agents of the state enjoy any special status in moral philosophy.

May an individual legitimately resist state agents? In what cases is such resistance allowed? What methods may be used, and to what ends? In his book When All Else Fails: The Ethics of Resistance to State Injustice, philosopher Jason Brennan argues that sometimes, individuals have not only a right to resist unjust state actions but even an obligation to do so.

America's fiscal future is in peril. At $67,000 for every American, the $22 trillion national debt is larger than what the typical American household earns in a year. At the same time that federal debt is growing rapidly, politicians on both sides of the political aisle are making grand promises for new spending. It's as if Washington's elite think that the debt does not matter. A high and rising national debt exposes America to significant dangers and imposes steep costs on families, workers, and businesses. The sooner we act to correct course, the more sensible reform options we have available to avoid severe austerity measures.

Join the Heritage Foundation for an enlightening panel discussion on why you should care about the national debt by discovering how debt impacts America's economy and our financial future.

The Blueprint for Balance: A Federal Budget for Fiscal Year 2020 is The Heritage Foundation's budget proposal to guide Congress in its constitutional exercise of the power of the purse. Specifically, the Blueprint: balances the budget in 10 years on a static basis; balances the budget in six years on a dynamic basis; reduces spending by $10.8 trillion over 10 years; reduces deficits by $9.9 trillion over 10 years; and much more.

The American Law Institute (ALI) is a well-respected, nearly century-old body of jurists and legal practitioners that produces documents called "Restatements," which have traditionally distilled and clearly restated the opinions of a majority of state courts on difficult questions of common law. But recently, some in the legal community have raised concern that ALI is putting out problematic Restatements that are more aspirational in nature and that run counter to its mission; others claim that ALI is simply interpreting the law. Meanwhile, states are considering and passing laws that would prevent judges from referring to certain ALI Restatements when deciding cases. Join us for a lively panel discussion on ALI, and whether it should still be considered a trusted institution.

In a recent Washington Post op-ed, Robert Kagan wrote, “Only with the advent of Enlightenment liberalism did people begin to believe that the individual conscience, as well as the individual’s body, should be inviolate and protected from the intrusions of state and church.” It is widely thought, as Kagan assumes, that religious freedom is the work of the Enlightenment. Only with the decline of religious faith and the end of the religious wars engendered by the Reformation did liberty of conscience gain a foothold in the emerging secular states of Europe. Or so the story goes.

Liberty in the Things of God tells a different story. The origins of modern notions of liberty of conscience and religious freedom are to be found in Christian writers from the early centuries (e.g. Tertullian of Carthage and Lactantius), medieval churchmen and theologians, and Christian thinkers in the 16th and 17th centuries. Three features of this tradition of thinking are distinctive: religious faith cannot be coerced; conscience is a form of spiritual knowledge that mandates action; the realm of statecraft and the realm of religion are distinct and must be kept separate.

Please join us for a conversation with Robert Louis Wilken about the Christian origins of religious freedom.

The Constitution's authors expected Congress to be the first branch of our federal government. But today it serves less as a deliberative body legislating on matters of national importance, and more as ombudsman for the administrative state—a platform for cable television appearances.

"How did an institution that was once admired around the world become so toothless?" This was the question posed by Rep. Mike Gallagher, in a widely read article last November in The Atlantic. "I have come to believe that the problem is not the people," he explained. "The problem is a defective process and a power structure that, whichever party is in charge, funnels all power to leadership and stifles debate and initiative within the ranks."

To explore these questions and the path to reform, the Hoover Institution is honored to welcome Rep. Gallagher for a conversation on how to fix Congress—and why. He will be interviewed by Hoover Institution research fellow Adam White.

The U.S. Department of Justice estimates that police officers shoot and kill more than 10,000 pet dogs in the United States every year. From SWAT raids to standard calls for service and police visits to wrong addresses, officers are often too quick to use lethal force against family pets, despite the fact that no police officer has ever been killed in the line of duty by a dog.

In the award-winning documentary Of Dogs and Men, director Michael Ozias and producer Patrick Reasonover delve into the culture of violence against dogs by police officers. Of Dogs and Men provides firsthand accounts of families and individuals who have suffered the loss of a dog killed during a confrontation with law enforcement.

The powerful film takes audiences on a journey with pet owners in pursuit of policy change in the legal system. The stories told in Of Dogs and Men have prompted cooperation and best-practices guidelines from law enforcement organizations such as the National Sheriffs' Association.

Of Dogs and Men was chosen as part of the official selection at both the Anthem and the Austin film festivals and was awarded the Honorable Mention Audience Award at the Austin Film Festival. Victoria Stillwell, host of Animal Planet's Its Me or the Dog, has said, "Every person who has a dog should watch this film. It could be the difference between life and death."

Please join us Thursday, June 6, for a screening of the award-winning documentary Of Dogs and Men and a post-movie discussion with director Michael Ozias and producer Patrick Reasonover, moderated by Clark Neily, Vice President for Criminal Justice, Cato Institute.

Thirty years after Tiananmen Square, human rights abuses continue to proliferate in China. Hundreds of thousands, possibly as many as 3 million, Muslim Uighurs are currently held by the Chinese government in political reeducation facilities. Individuals inside these facilities are subject to indoctrination, forced labor, torture, and in some cases, even death. Collectivization of this population was achieved through the Chinese government's rapid deployment of large-scale surveillance technology – technology that poses a severe threat to people inside and outside of China. The crisis in Xinjiang is both a human rights and national security threat that merits a strong response from the U.S. government. While the U.S. and the international community has been quick to condemn the Chinese government's actions, it has been slow to craft a strategy that holds accountable those in China responsible for the abuses.

In this riveting book, bestselling author Paul Kengor and writer-director Robert Orlando show what it took to end the Cold War: leaders who refused to accept that hundreds of millions must suffer under totalitarian Communism. And no leaders proved more important than the pope and the president.

Two men who seemed to have little in common developed an extraordinary bond—including a spiritual bond between the Catholic pope and Protestant president. And their shared core convictions drove them to confront Communism.

To tell the full story of the dramatic closing act of the Cold War, Kengor and Orlando draw on their exhaustive research and exclusive interviews with more than a dozen experts, including well-known historians Douglas Brinkley, H. W. Brands, Anne Applebaum, Stephen Kotkin, John O'Sullivan, and Craig Shirley; the leading biographer of John Paul II, George Weigel; close Reagan advisers Richard V. Allen and James Rosebush; and Cardinal Timothy Dolan and Bishop Robert Barron. You can't understand Pope John Paul II and President Ronald Reagan—or how the Cold War came to such a swift and peaceful end—without understanding how much faith they put in the Divine Plan.

On Faith is an inspiring collection of the late Supreme Court justice Antonin Scalia's reflections on his own faith, on the challenges that religious believers face in modern America, and on the religious freedoms protected by the Constitution. Featuring a personal introduction by Justice Scalia's son

Father Paul Scalia, this volume will enrich every reader's understanding of the legendary justice.

Antonin Scalia reflected deeply on matters of religion and shared his insights with many audiences over the course of his remarkable career. As a Supreme Court justice for three decades, he vigorously defended the American constitutional tradition of allowing religion a prominent place in the public square. As a man of faith, he recognized the special challenges of living a distinctively religious life in modern America, and he inspired other believers to meet those challenges.

This volume contains Justice Scalia's incisive thoughts on these matters, laced with his characteristic wit. It includes outstanding speeches featured in Scalia Speaks and also draws from his Supreme Court opinions and his articles. In addition to the introduction by Fr. Scalia, other highlights include Fr. Scalia's beautiful homily at his father's funeral Mass and reminiscences from various friends and law clerks whose lives were influenced by Antonin Scalia's faith.

Mr. Scalia and Mr. Whelan previously co-edited Scalia Speaks: Reflections on Law, Faith, and Life Well Lived (Crown Forum, 2017), a New York Times bestselling collection of Justice Scalia's speeches. You can watch their talk on this book at the CIC here.

Christians in the Mirror: Stories of Courage and Faith in the Face of Persecution From Syria, Iraq, Sudan, India and Egypt

Christians in the Mirror is a documentary that reveals the intense suffering of persecuted Christians in the Middle East, Africa, Asia and beyond. Their faith and fortitude in the midst of torture and tragedy all the more underscore their inspiring witness of love. Many of us Christians in the West are focused on prosperity and convenience, often unaware or indifferent to our brothers' and sisters' plight in the universal church. This documentary is a provocation for Christians to look into their "Christian mirror" as a disciple of Christ and to see whom is reflected back.

All religious minorities, especially Christians, in the Middle East and Africa are targets of violent Islamic radicals, whose ideology seeks to annihilate. Political and religious sectarian violence threaten Christians, suffering for their faith through marginalization, persecution, loss of homeland and churches and families, or even their own martyrdom. Persecuted Christians seek greater solidarity and support from Western churches, who are a source of hope for them.

"If one part suffers, every part suffers with it." (1 Cor 12:26) Christians in the Mirror deepens the existential reality that when members of the body of Christ are left to wither, the whole body suffers fragmentation. The Christian faith persecuted in one region affects the universal church; every Christian by extension is suffering it, realized or not. The greatest suffering is one that is not even known, one of identity that rests at the core of our faith.

Negotiations between Washington and Pyongyang over North Korea's nuclear weapons program are at an impasse, and tensions are rising. And while neither side appears to want a war, the path to a diplomatic solution remains unclear. What is obvious, however, is that most U.S. policymakers have little understanding of what the Democratic People's Republic of Korea (DPRK) is or how it operates, a fact that limits America's ability to peacefully resolve the crisis.

Heidi Linton, Randall Spadoni, and Daniel Jasper, by contrast, have firsthand knowledge of the DPRK. Their organizations maintain long-term aid programs in North Korea, and all three have spent time there as part of humanitarian missions, including trips to parts of the country closed to most visitors.

Join us as Linton, Spadoni, and Jasper offer their insights into the "Hermit Kingdom."

In a conversation with incoming AEI President Robert Doar, syndicated columnist George Will discusses his new book, "The Conservative Sensibility" (Hachette Books, June 2019). The Pulitzer Prize winner, bestselling author, and television regular explains in his latest work that the history and true meaning of American conservatism are under threat, both from progressives and from within the Republican Party.

Dr. Will notes that conservatism has become untethered from the philosophy of the American founding. In addition to the destructive trends in family life and higher education seen today, America has become an administrative state with semiautonomous executive agencies wielding unaccountable power, while Congress has failed in its duty to exercise its legislative powers. Dr. Will takes readers back to the founders' vision — to their beliefs in natural rights, limited government, religious freedom, and human virtue and dignity, which ushered in two centuries of American prosperity — and reminds us that it is time to reverse America's political fortunes.

Congress passed the Congressional Review Act in 1996 to prevent agency rules from going into effect before Congress had the opportunity to expeditiously review and nullify ones that it deemed unwise. None of the three Presidents since then—Bill Clinton, George W. Bush, and Barack Obama—used the CRA to rein in the administrative state. President Donald Trump has. In April 2019, the White House Office of Management and Budget issued a memorandum reading the CRA broadly for executive and independent agencies alike. This panel will discuss the potential effect that the OMB Memorandum might have on the regulatory state.

While the Constitution is silent on the President's removal power, the First Congress concluded that Article II's vesting of executive power necessarily meant that the President must have plenary authority to remove executive branch officers. As James Madison asserted, "If the Constitution has invested all executive power in the President... the Legislature has no right to diminish or modify his executive authority." Unfortunately, the modern administrative state has continued to give rise to a "headless" fourth branch of government that exerts immense control over vast swaths of American life. The power to remove subordinates is the key means by which the President can direct how executive authority is exercised. Without it, he is in many instances powerless to ensure faithful execution of the laws.

A new bill, The Take Care Act, introduced by Senator Mike Lee (R-UT), aims to address this problem. It will eliminate all existing restrictions on the President's power to remove upper-level executive branch officers, and fully restore the original understanding of the President's power to take care that the laws are faithfully executed. Join us for an address by the Senator, as he unveils this important new legislation.

While there have been many biographies of Dwight D. Eisenhower that focus on his military career or the time of his presidency, none clearly explores the important role faith played both in his personal life and in his public policy. This despite the fact that he is the only US president to be baptized as a Christian while in office.

The book invites you on a journey that is unique in American history and is essential to understanding one of the most consequential, admired, and complex Americans of the 20th Century.

The story begins in abject poverty in rural Texas, then travels through Kansas, West Point, two World Wars, and down Pennsylvania Avenue. This is the untold story of a man whose growing faith sustained him through the loss of a young son, marital difficulties, depression, career disappointments, and being witness to some of the worst atrocities humankind has devised. A man whose faith was based in his own sincere personal conviction, not out of a sense of political expediency or social obligation.

You've met Dwight Eisenhower the soldier and Dwight Eisenhower the president. Now meet Dwight Eisenhower the man of faith.

In 2017 and 2018 the U.S. men's and women's soccer teams required players to wear an LGBT rainbow on the national U.S.A. jersey. A Christian player declined to wear the jersey and thus did not play. Using soccer as a case study, Dr. Jennifer Bryson, the founder of Let All Play, will discuss the religious freedom issues at stake in the management of U.S. and international sports. She will also examine the manner in which the politicization of sports threatens America's civic fabric.

Jennifer S. Bryson is the founder of Let All Play, a sports advocacy project. She is author of the 2019 report "Let All Play: Yes to Soccer, No to Politics" about the use of political symbols, such as the LGBT rainbow, on uniforms in international soccer. She wrote the current international CitizenGO petition to FIFA against use of political symbols in soccer. She worked previously at the Religious Freedom Institute in Washington, D.C. She has a B.A. from Stanford, an M.A. and a Ph.D. from Yale, and she is currently studying international sports law.

In his recent book, “Tell Your Children: The Truth About Marijuana, Mental Illness, and Violence” (Simon and Schuster, 2019), Alex Berenson examines the potential health risks of cannabis use. Most pointedly, he argues that cannabis can cause increased levels of psychosis and violence and that evidence of such risks has been largely covered up or ignored.

Not all researchers and drug policy experts agree with Mr. Berenson, though. As the movement to legalize cannabis gains steam in the US, policymakers at every level must pay close attention to the open debate over the risks of cannabis usage.

Join AEI as Mr. Berenson presents his findings and an expert panel of physicians and drug policy experts weigh in on what challenges legalization might present for public policy and public health.

The Supreme Court's 2018-2019 term will soon be over, but the need for serious analysis has just begun. Did the High Court get the big cases right? What will the Court's ruling in The American Legion v. American Humanist Association mean for the future of religion in the public square? How will Rucho v. Common Cause and Benisek v. Lamone, the partisan gerrymandering cases, impact the next election cycle? Will the ruling in Kisor v. Wilkie rein in administrative agencies? How have Justice Gorsuch and Justice Kavanaugh changed the balance of the Court, and have any broader themes of the Roberts Court emerged this term?

Please join us as our distinguished panels of practitioners and journalists discuss these cases and more from the 2018-2019 term.

Justice on Trial: The Kavanaugh Confirmation and the Future of the Supreme Court reveals what really happened during last year's confirmation, including never-before-released details of every aspect of the process. Exciting new stories include: Justice Kennedy's retirement, how Kavanaugh was chosen, how his explosive opening statement to the committee was composed, what Melania Trump really thought of Christine Blasey Ford, the coordination between Democrats and the anti-Kavanaugh forces on the Left, and the behind-the-scenes chaos between Senators Flake and Coons as they hammered out the FBI investigation. They also weave in the stories of major confirmation battles of recent decades, illustrating what we have learned from fights over nominees like Robert Bork and Clarence Thomas to help get nominees like Brett Kavanaugh across the finish line.

Mollie and Carrie are two insiders with unparalleled access to the major players in this national drama. They have conducted over one hundred interviews, spanning hundreds of hours, and speaking with President Trump, several Supreme Court justices, dozens of senators, and all the key figures in this battle. Join us for a discussion of their highly-anticipated book, which promises to be the definitive account of this historic event.

Speaker NANCY PELOSI spoke this morning with MARGARET BRENNAN on CBS NEWS' "FACE THE NATION" about everything from Trump's tweets to when the inquiry will be finished to whether the government will shutdown. While all signs indicated that Democrats would move in mid-December to vote on impeachment, Pelosi was noncommittal and said "maybe they have more hearings" and that she has to work with all six chairmen to decide how Democrats will proceed.

THE HIGHLIGHTS:

-- ON WITNESS INTIMIDATION: BRENNAN: "Do you think that was witness intimidation in your book?"
PELOSI: "I haven't had a lot of time to pay attention to the president's tweets and the legal implications of them. I just think that was totally wrong and inappropriate and typical of the president."

-- ON WHEN IMPEACHMENT WILL BE WRAPPED UP: BRENNAN: "Do you expect that to be wrapped up before the end of the year?" PELOSI: "I have no idea. Again, I ..." BRENNAN: "No timetable for that?"
PELOSI: "No, I mean, it is self-evident that we have open hearings for the next week. I don't know if there are any beyond that. Then we're out for Thanksgiving. Doesn't mean depositions couldn't be taken during that time. And then when we come back by then, maybe a decision or maybe they have more hearings. And then I have six committees who have been working on all of this, and those six chairmen have been very involved in what the, how we will proceed."

-- ON TRUMP INNOCENCE: BRENNAN: "Well, you point out factually, right, that vote has not taken place to proceed necessarily with impeachment. But do you think you'll go through all of this and not vote to impeach the president?" PELOSI: "The fact [is] if the president has information that demonstrates his innocence in all of this, which we haven't seen. ... If he has information that is exculpatory, that means ex, taking away, culpable, blame, then we look forward to seeing it."

-- ON A GOVERNMENT SHUTDOWN: BRENNAN: "Are you confident you can avoid one?" PELOSI: "Well, let us hope left to their own devices, the appropriators can avoid that." BRENNAN: "Does that mean Democrats will provide funding for the border wall?" PELOSI: "No, no. That's-we have well over a trillion dollars worth of decisions to make. I don't know why we would go to that. The president hasn't built any new wall in a whole term of office. I think that his comments about the wall are really an applause line at a rally, but they're not anything that he's serious about."

BRENNAN spoke with REP. JIM JORDAN (R-Ohio) after the Pelosi interview: BRENNAN: "As you heard from the speaker in that interview, she argues that the aid to Ukraine was only released because of the whistleblower. What reason were you given that the aid to Ukraine ... was eventually released?"

JORDAN: "Because President Zelensky met five times with senior U.S. officials. One, of course, was the phone call with President Trump. And then four meetings, actually face to face meetings, with U.S. senators, ambassadors, with Vice President Pence. And in each of those meetings, never was it talked about linking the security assistance dollars to any type of investigations.

"But what did happen in those meetings is they all became convinced Zelensky's the real deal. Remember, we're talking about Ukraine. One of the three most corrupt countries on the planet. And we're talking about the hard earned tax dollars of the American people. So, they became convinced that this media star, this new guy to politics, his party just won an overwhelming majority in their parliament, was the real deal. And he was legit and he was worth the risk ... and they said we'll release the aid."

ABOUT LAST NIGHT ... ALEX ISENSTADT: "Louisiana delivers Trump a black eye": "President Donald Trump campaigned hard in three conservative Southern states this fall, aiming for a string of gubernatorial wins that would demonstrate his political strength heading into impeachment and his own reelection effort. The plan backfired in dramatic fashion.

"The latest black eye came on Saturday, when Trump's favored candidate in Louisiana, multimillionaire businessman Eddie Rispone, went down to defeat. The president went all-in, visiting the state three times, most recently on Thursday. Earlier this month, Kentucky Gov. Matt Bevin lost reelection after a similar presidential effort on his behalf. Of the candidates Trump backed, only Tate Reeves in Mississippi won.

"The losses raise questions about Trump's standing as he heads into what will be a grueling 2020 campaign. By throwing himself into the three contests — each in states that Trump won by double-digits in 2016 — the president had hoped to gain a modicum of political momentum at a perilous moment of his presidency.

"Those close to the president argue that he can't be faulted for the Kentucky and Louisiana outcomes. Bevin was one of the country's least popular governors, while Rispone was a relatively unknown political newcomer who was facing a popular incumbent in Democratic Gov. John Bel Edwards. While the president can help, they contend, he can't always be expected to pull flawed candidates over the finish line." POLITICO ... More from Daniel Strauss

-- CHRIS WALLACE spoke with House Minority Whip STEVE SCALISE (R-La.) on FOX NEWS' "FOX NEWS SUNDAY" about the Republican loss: WALLACE: "You had an election yesterday in Louisiana and the Democratic governor, John Bel Edwards, was reelected. President Trump was in there campaigning hard, multiple times, and said look, if Eddie Rispone, the Republican doesn't win it's going to make me, Trump, look bad because I don't have any coattails. Does it make him look bad?

SCALISE: "What he said was he'd be made to look bad whether he came in the state or not. Eddie Rispone made up about a 22-point disadvantage over the last month because of President Trump's involvement. So, Eddie Rispone was at about 27 in the primary. He ended up at 49. So clearly President Trump's involvement made a big difference at helping close that massive gap and look, the governor's polling showed he was above 50 before President Trump first started getting involved. That forced a runoff."

Good Sunday morning. NEW ... THE PRESIDENT'S WEEK AHEAD: TUESDAY: The president will hold a Cabinet meeting and have lunch with VP Mike Pence. WEDNESDAY: Trump will visit the Apple manufacturing plant in Austin. THURSDAY: Trump and First Lady Melania Trump will present the National Medal of Arts and the National Humanities Medal. FRIDAY: The president will participate in the NCAA Collegiate National Champions Day.

TRUMP BECOMES A BIDEN DEFENDER? -- @realDonaldTrump at 9:58 a.m.: "Mr. Chairman, Joe Biden may be Sleepy and Very Slow, but he is not a "rabid dog." He is actually somewhat better than that, but I am the only one who can get you where you have to be. You should act quickly, get the deal done. See you soon!"

SUNDAY BEST ... CHUCK TODD spoke with SEN. CHRIS MURPHY on NBC'S "MEET THE PRESS" about impeachment: MURPHY: "And if there were no consequences, then the message would be clear, that this president, and any other president, can use the power of the oval office in order to try to advance themselves politically or financially, and so I think Representative Schiff is right. If you don't use impeachment for this type of offense, then I am not sure what you use it for."

-- MURPHY also spoke to JAKE TAPPER on CNN'S "STATE OF THE UNION" about Ambassador Gordon Sondland: "Mr. Sondland has to decide whether his primary loyalty is to America or whether his primary loyalty is to the president of the United States because it seems clear that he was in fact talking pretty regularly, potentially, with the president directly. And if that were the case then he needs to explain that. Ultimately this is about his legacy. And if it comes out that he misled the committee in his initial testimony or outright lied there are real consequences for him down the line."

-- TAPPER also interviewed REP. MIKE TURNER (R-Ohio): TAPPER: "Does it concern you at all that a witness found what President Trump tweeted to be intimidating?" TURNER: "Well, I mean, Jake, I think, along with most people, I find the president's tweets generally unfortunate. ... It's certainly not impeachable, and it's certainly not criminal, and it's certainly not witness intimidation. It certainly wasn't trying to prevent her or would it have prevented her from testifying. She was actually in the process of testifying."

-- ON FOX NEWS: "Steve Scalise: Trump's military pardons boost troop morale," by Evan Semones: "House Minority Whip Steve Scalise on Sunday voiced his support for President Donald Trump's pardons of two Army officers who were accused of war crimes, arguing the move boosts morale in the military."

THE LATEST ON IMPEACHMENT ...

-- "Pence aide testified that Trump's efforts to pressure Ukraine were 'inappropriate'," by Andrew Desiderio and Melanie Zanona: "A top national security aide to Vice President Mike Pence told House impeachment investigators that President Donald Trump's efforts to pressure Ukraine to investigate his political opponents were 'unusual and inappropriate,' and 'shed some light on possible other motivations' for the president's order to freeze military aid to the U.S. ally.

"Jennifer Williams, who serves as Pence's special adviser for Europe and Russia, told investigators in early November that she took notes while she listened in on Trump's July 25 phone call with Ukrainian President Volodymyr Zelensky from the White House Situation Room, adding that she viewed Trump's requests for investigations as politically motivated." POLITICO

-- "Sondland said he was acting on Trump's orders, aide told investigators," by Kyle Cheney and Blake Hounshell: "Tim Morrison, a top White House national security aide, told impeachment investigators that Gordon Sondland — a U.S. ambassador at the center of the Ukraine scandal imperiling Donald Trump's presidency — claimed to be acting on Trump's orders, and in fact was regularly in touch with him.

"Though other impeachment witnesses have suggested Sondland has overstating his relationship with the president, Morrison said he was repeatedly able to confirm that the envoy did speak directly with the Trump. 'Every time you went to check to see whether he had, in fact, talked to the president, you found that he had talked to the president?' one lawmaker wondered, according to a transcript of Morrison's testimony released Saturday. 'Yes,' Morrison replied.

"Sondland's direct access to Trump is a crucial aspect of the House's impeachment inquiry. Officially the U.S. ambassador to the European Union, he played an unofficial role in channeling and conveying the president's demands of Ukrainian leaders." POLITICO

After 3 witnesses no evidence has been presented of any offense. The first two permanent diplomats had no direct knowledge just overhearing things. The third one had no knowledge not even hearsay. This is a travesty,' he tweeted." POLITICO

-- GEORGE STEPHANOPOLOUS spoke with REP. CHRIS STEWART (R-Utah) on ABC'S "THIS WEEK": STEPHANOPOLOUS: "The evidence is building about the campaign to trade military aid and a White House meeting to investigations directly to President Trump. It's tied directly now to President Trump, isn't it?"

STEWART: "I disagree with you, George. I don't think the evidence is building at all. And I'm being sincere in this, I think the evidence is crumbling. I think the Democrats know they're in trouble on this, which is why we keep moving the goalposts. We went from some supposed quid pro quo, and as you said tying these investigations to withholding military aid, but we know that didn't happen.

"And now Mrs. Pelosi comes and says, well, we're going to impeach and remove the president for bribery, but, you know, we didn't play this clip where I asked the ambassador if you have any evidence at all the president committed bribery or was involved with that. She said no. Do you have any evidence at all that the president did anything criminal or illegal? And the answer is no. And, again, I think the longer this hearing goes on I think the less the American are going to support impeachment, I think the evidence just doesn't support it."

-- NYT'S CATIE EDMONSON: "Some of the nation's leading conservative groups — the Club For Growth, FreedomWorks, Citizens United, and Tea Party Patriots — have locked arms to serve as an unofficial war room for the president during the impeachment inquiry, the third such proceeding in modern history, but the first of the social media age.

"The coalition of more than 100 organizations, including traditional conservative fund-raisers and public relations firms, is banking on a coordinated divide-and-conquer strategy that seeks to harness its grass-roots networks' outrage — and raise money crucial to its own survival." NYT

HMM -- "Trump Went for a Medical Checkup That Was Not on His Public Schedule," by NYT's Neil Vigdor: "President Trump underwent a two-hour doctor's examination on Saturday at Walter Reed National Military Medical Center, which the White House said was part of a routine annual physical and included lab work. The appointment was not on the president's schedule, in contrast to a previous physical that Mr. Trump had in February, also at Walter Reed outside Washington.

"In a statement, Stephanie Grisham, the White House press secretary, said Mr. Trump, 73, was taking advantage of a free weekend to begin portions of his annual physical, and was anticipating a busy schedule in 2020. She did not specify what types of tests Mr. Trump had.

"The president remains healthy and energetic without complaints, as demonstrated by his repeated vigorous rally performances in front of thousands of Americans several times a week,' Ms. Grisham said." NYT

2020 WATCH ...

-- "CBS News Battleground Tracker: Buttigieg rises in Iowa and New Hampshire, Biden back atop delegate hunt," by Anthony Salvanto, Jennifer De Pinto, Kabir Khanna and Fred Backus: "The Democratic nomination race remains unsettled because many voters are conflicted between what they want and whether they think can win. Some candidates who generate excitement are also seen as risky. Progressive policies are popular but might be too liberal to win swing voters. And while voters say they are satisfied with their current selection of candidates, very few have actually settled on one.

"So, across the early primary and caucus states through Super Tuesday, voters' top pick continues to swing back and forth between Joe Biden and Elizabeth Warren, with neither able to break away." CBS

-- "Iowa Poll: Pete Buttigieg rockets to the top of the 2020 field as a clear front-runner," Des Moines Register's Brianne Pfannenstiel: "Pete Buttigieg has rocketed to the top of the latest Des Moines Register/CNN/Mediacom Iowa Poll in the latest reshuffling of the top tier of 2020 Democratic presidential candidates.

"Since September, Buttigieg has risen 16 percentage points among Iowa's likely Democratic caucusgoers, with 25% now saying he is their first choice for president. For the first time in the Register's Iowa Poll, he bests rivals Joe Biden, Bernie Sanders and Elizabeth Warren, who are now clustered in competition for second place and about 10 percentage points behind the South Bend, Indiana, mayor.

"Warren, a U.S. senator from Massachusetts, led the September Iowa Poll, when 22% said she was their first choice. In this poll, her support slips to 16%. Former Vice President Biden, who led the Register's first three Iowa Polls of the 2020 caucus cycle, has continued to slide, falling 5 percentage points to 15%. Sanders, a U.S. senator from Vermont, also garners 15% — a 4 percentage point rise." Des Moines Register

BRYAN BENDER, WES MORGAN and DANIEL LIPPMAN: "Trump's 'West Point Mafia' Faces a Loyalty Test": "On May 28, 1986, newly commissioned 2nd Lt. Michael Pompeo stood at attention in Michie Stadium at the U.S. Military Academy at West Point, first in his class. The career he was about to launch would take him from commanding a tank platoon in Germany to a seat in Congress, and ultimately to the right hand of President Donald Trump as secretary of State.

"Also on the field that day was classmate Mark Esper, who this July landed right next to Pompeo in Trump's Cabinet, confirmed as secretary of Defense. Their West Point classmates Ulrich Brechbuhl and Brian Bulatao also hold senior State Department posts as Pompeo's top lieutenants, while at the other end of the National Mall, inside the Capitol, classmate Rep. Mark Green of Tennessee has emerged as one of Trump's leading defenders on the House Committee on Oversight and Reform.

"Thanks in part to Trump's fixation on appointing current and former military officers to key posts, and in part to his tendency to take advice from a small circle of advisers, the West Point class of 1986 has grown into a profoundly influential cohort in American foreign and military policy. In the annals of the military service academies, its rise to the top puts it on a par with the class of 1915, which bred the commanders of World War II and a U.S. president.

"The link that brought them into Trumpworld is David Urban, the lobbyist, CNN commentator and Trump confidant—and another member of the West Point class of '86—whose support of his fellow cadets helped Pompeo and Esper land their Cabinet posts." POLITICO

WASHINGTON INC. -- "Barbarians' go to war with Warren," by Zachary Warmbrodt

The private equity industry, under attack from Sen. Elizabeth Warren, is defending itself with the Popeyes chicken sandwich.

"The industry is touting the fast food craze as a success attributable to private equity-backed Popeyes as it tries to ward off a bipartisan Capitol Hill assault led by Warren, including legislation that would increase the firms' liability for the companies they take over. The industry is also facing two congressional probes and a House hearing this week as lawmakers raise concerns about its impact on workers and consumers.

"Private equity's lobbying arm is trying to make the case that the iconic Wall Street industry — once dubbed 'Barbarians at the Gate' from a bestselling book for its no-holds-barred corporate raids — is good for America and that it is everywhere, including in fast food.

"The industry is running ads and op-eds touting private equity-backed jobs in Iowa and Ohio and pouring tens of thousands of dollars in contributions into the election campaigns of Warren's rivals in the Democratic primary." POLITICO

DRIVING THE DAY

WHERE WE ARE ... DEMOCRATS captured control of the Virginia House of Delegates and state Senate, the first time they've controlled the entire government "in a generation," per the WaPo.

-- NYT'S JONATHAN MARTIN: "For the first time since 1993, Democrats control both chambers in the legislature and the governor's office -- allowing them to redraw the state's legislative boundaries after next year's census.

"Linking Republican incumbents to the unpopular president and criticizing them for opposing gun control measures in the aftermath of a mass shooting in Virginia Beach in May, Democratic challengers built their victory with strong showings in suburbs stretching from outside Washington to Richmond and Hampton Roads. In Fairfax County, the state's largest jurisdiction, the last remaining Republican lawmaker was defeated." NYT

DEMOCRATS APPEAR TO HAVE TOPPLED the unpopular sitting Republican governor of Kentucky one day after a visit from President DONALD TRUMP. Democrat ANDY BESHEAR leads Republican Gov. MATT BEVIN by more than 5,000 votes, according to Steve Shepard, who is in Lexington for us. POLITICO

REPUBLICANS, THOUGH, had success throughout the rest of the state. Senate Majority Leader MITCH MCCONNELL'S former legal counsel, Daniel Cameron, was elected attorney general -- the first black person to be elected to that office. Lexington Herald-Leader

PENNSYLVANIA -- a state key to TRUMP'S re-election prospects -- is turning toward Democrats in a historic fashion.

-- PHILLY INQUIRER: "The blue wave crashed down on Pennsylvania again, as voters from Philly to Delaware County turned left," by Julia Terruso: "The political forces that shaped last year's midterm elections showed no signs of abating Tuesday, as voters turned on Republicans and establishment Democrats alike in races from Philadelphia and Scranton to the suburbs of Delaware and Chester Counties. ...

"Locally, Democrats will hold all five seats on the Delaware County Council, a Republican stronghold since the Civil War, and also assumed a majority on the legislative body in Chester County. In Bucks County, Democrats also held a late lead for control of the board of commissioners in a close race."
Inquirer

HOW DOES THIS ALL affect TRUMP'S political fortunes? Do Republicans take a look at Tuesday night's electoral results and rethink whether they want to stick with the president on impeachment? (For the most part, we doubt Rs will ditch Trump.) Will it affect Trump's 2020 campaign strategy or his governing posture? Will the president look, in any way, to try to partner with Democrats on something popular, or will he continue his current posture, which is he's being impeached for doing nothing wrong, and there's nothing really the two parties can work on?

THERE ARE TWO WAYS FOR REPUBLICANS TO LOOK AT TUESDAY NIGHT. One way: We won the Mississippi governor race, we won almost the entire slate of races in Kentucky and Bevin lost because he was unpopular. All of that's true -- but just part of the story. The other way to look at it is: Pennsylvania is slipping away, Virginia is gone and Kentucky -- a state TRUMP won by nearly 30 points in 2016 -- has elected a Democrat in a race where impeachment was center stage.

HERE'S HOW TRUMP CAST the Kentucky race in his rally for Bevin earlier this week: "If you win, they are going to make it like, ho hum. And if you lose, they are going to say Trump suffered the greatest defeat in the history of the world. You can't let that happen to me!"

-- AND HERE'S WHAT HE SAID TUESDAY NIGHT: @realDonaldTrump at 11:37 p.m.: "#ElectionNight Won 5 out of 6 elections in Kentucky, including 5 great candidates that I spoke for and introduced last night. @MattBevin picked up at least 15 points in last days, but perhaps not enough (Fake News will blame Trump!). Winning in Mississippi Governor race!"

... at 11:51 p.m.: "Congratulations to @tatereeves on winning Governor of the Great State of Mississippi. Our big Rally on Friday night moved the numbers from a tie to a big WIN. Great reaction under pressure Tate!"

FWIW: TRUMP won Mississippi by 17 points in 2016.

THE STEP BACK ... WAPO'S BOB COSTA: "[T]he Kentucky defeat has sparked concern among the party's donors and many longtime GOP leaders who are worried that the nonstop twists of the House impeachment inquiry and Trump's growing fury are making it increasingly difficult for Republicans to make a clear and compelling case to voters." WaPo

-- AP'S STEVE PEOPLES in New York: "It's difficult to draw sweeping conclusions from state elections,

each with their own unique quirks and personalities. But there's little doubt Tuesday's outcome is a warning to Republicans across the nation a year out from the 2020 election and a year after the 2018 midterms: The suburbs are still moving in the wrong direction." AP

AND YET ... NEW POLITICO/MORNING CONSULT POLL: "Poll: Majority expects Trump to win in 2020," by Caitlin Oprysko: "With less than a year to go before the 2020 election, a majority of registered voters say they think it's at least somewhat likely that President Donald Trump will secure a second term in the White House, a new poll has found, with almost a third of voters saying the president will be top of mind when casting their vote next November.

"According to a POLITICO/Morning Consult survey released on Wednesday, 56 percent of voters expect the president to be reelected next year, including 85 percent of Republicans and 51 percent of independents. By comparison, more than a third of Democrats (35 percent) say the same." POLITICO

Good Wednesday morning.

IMPEACHMENT ... IN THE EARLY DAYS OF POLITICO, our co-founders John Harris and Jim VandeHei often asked us to try to report as if we were putting our sources on truth serum. What would they say if they couldn't lie?

SO AFTER TUESDAY'S BOMBSHELL transcript release -- GORDON SONDLAND and KURT VOLKER -- we buzzed our top House Republican sources and challenged them to tell us what they were actually thinking about TRUMP'S standing at the moment.

-- THEY UNDERSTAND TRUMP IS IN DEEP TROUBLE. "Without a doubt," one House Republican told us, this is the biggest political pickle TRUMP has been in. That's why Republicans are taking the highly unusual step of putting Rep. JIM JORDAN (R-Ohio) on the Intelligence Committee to defend the president: He needs reinforcements, and fast. (We hear it will just be Jordan that gets a slot on that panel.)

-- THEIR STRATEGY IS TO OBFUSCATE. Republicans understand that they "have a tough set of facts," as one told us, and they are going to try to muddy the waters and distract from the obviously troubling testimony delivered by every witness Democrats have called. Watch for small-ball answers trying to pick apart the credibility of certain witnesses when it comes to whether they extrapolated or had firsthand information on what they were testifying about.

-- THEY'RE READY TO THROW SONDLAND UNDER THE BUS. This was, perhaps, the most surprising to us. Conventional wisdom held that SONDLAND was going to be the strongest ally for TRUMP -- a donor whose $1 million to the Trump inaugural fund should have made him a loyal figure. But Republicans are starting to turn on him. Lawmakers we spoke with called him a lackey, a chest-thumper and a rube. Of course, perhaps that's because he turned on the president. But there is no love lost for Sondland at all.

-- THEY STILL, TO THIS DAY, QUESTION THE QUID PRO QUO. The cornerstone of Republicans' defense of TRUMP is that, despite testimony indicating otherwise, there is no actual evidence of a quid pro quo. There is talk that the president wanted to hold up aid in exchange for a statement laying out an investigation into the BIDEN family. But, as several lawmakers told us, the aid was restored without the statement.

WE ASKED OUR SOURCES this simple question: If TRUMP is so concerned about corruption, can you point to other places in the world where he's withheld aid in exchange for cleaning up government, or was the Biden example unique? No one can, but people point out that he frequently has threatened to cut off aid.

-- THE PUBLIC WITNESS THE GOP FEARS: Bill Taylor is the unanimous No. 1.

INTERESTING TEXT ... TAYLOR in a text to VOLKER in May, presumably after he was asked to go to Kyiv: "I'm really struggling with the decision whether to go [to Ukraine]. HAPPENING TODAY ... AP'S MATTHEW LEE: "AP sources: State Dept. worried about defending ambassador": "The State Department's third-ranking official is expected to tell Congress that political considerations were behind the agency's refusal to deliver a robust defense of the former U.S. ambassador to Ukraine.

"People familiar with the matter say the highest-ranking career diplomat in the foreign service, David

Hale, plans to tell congressional impeachment investigators on Wednesday that Secretary of State Mike Pompeo and other senior officials determined that defending Ambassador Marie Yovanovitch would hurt the effort to free up U.S. military assistance to Ukraine.

"Hale will also say that the State Department worried about the reaction from Trump's personal attorney, Rudy Giuliani, also one of the strongest advocates for removing the ambassador. ... Hale is expected to shed more light on why the State Department did not step up to defend its top envoy in Kyiv. According to the people familiar with the matter, he will say he tried to distance himself and the department from the matter by removing himself from email chains about Yovanovitch." AP

SMART STORY ... WAPO'S ROBERT BARNES and SEUNG MIN KIM: "Senate impeachment trial to test chief justice who has tangled with Trump": "The trial would be an unfamiliar moment in the spotlight for Roberts, 64, whose evocation of the judge as impartial umpire drew praise at his 2005 confirmation hearing. His nomination by President George W. Bush capped off a career as a Republican operative in the White House, a lawyer with many appearances before the Supreme Court and an appellate judge.

"Trump's impeachment proceedings would be the first trial over which Roberts has ever presided. It provides the potential for a confrontation with a president who has already antagonized him, even as the chief justice has tried to distance himself and the court from partisan politics.

"I think [the chief justice] is going to be very uncomfortable with it," said Carter G. Phillips, a longtime Washington lawyer who is among the most prolific practitioners before the Supreme Court. 'He will look the part and will act the part, but I'm sure he'd rather not have the part.'" WaPo

HEADS UP -- "Trump OKs wider Syria oil mission, raising legal questions," by AP's Lolita Baldor: "President Donald Trump has approved an expanded military mission to secure an expanse of oil fields across eastern Syria, raising a number of difficult legal questions about whether U.S. troops can launch strikes against Syrian, Russian or other forces if they threaten the oil, U.S. officials said.

"The decision, coming after a meeting Friday between Trump and his defense leaders, locks hundreds of U.S. troops into a more complicated presence in Syria, despite the president's vow to get America out of the war. Under the new plan, troops would protect a large swath of land controlled by Syrian Kurdish fighters that stretches nearly 90 miles (150 kilometers) from Deir el-Zour to al-Hassakeh, but its exact size is still being determined.

"Officials said many details still have to be worked out. But, Trump's decision hands commanders a victory in their push to remain in the country to prevent any resurgence of the Islamic State group, counter Iran and partner with the Kurds, who battled IS alongside the U.S. for several years. But it also forces lawyers in the Pentagon to craft orders for the troops that could see them firing on Syrian government or Russian fighters trying to take back oil facilities that sit within the sovereign nation of Syria." HAPPENING TODAY -- "In Major Nuclear Step, Iran to Resume Enrichment at Underground Site," by WSJ's Laurence Norman in Brussels and Aresu Egbali in Tehran: "Iran plans to start enriching uranium at an underground facility Wednesday, Tehran officials said, in a significant step away from its commitments under the 2015 nuclear deal that could raise pressure on Europe to take action.

"A 15-year ban on any enrichment of uranium at the Fordow nuclear plant was one of the central achievements of the deal. Enriched uranium can be used as fuel for a nuclear weapon.

"The site, buried deep within a mountain, is considered impregnable to most conventional weapons, presenting a major hurdle to any military effort aimed at stopping Iran from building a nuclear weapon. Iran says its nuclear program has always been for peaceful purposes. The latest step is the most dramatic yet by Iran away from the 2015 accord." WSJ

"Flanked by Facebook COO Sheryl Sandberg and Facebook exec Nick Clegg, Zuckerberg met face-to-face at his Bay Area home with some of the company's most ardent critics to hear their concerns about how the company tackles hate speech and its policy of not fact-checking ads from politicians.

"Civil rights representatives agreed not to disclose specifics of what the Facebook executives and other attendees said at the meeting, Farhana Khera, the executive director of Muslim Advocates, who attended the dinner, told CNN. The Fence Post: Tarbert Sworn in as CFTC Chairman

The Hagstrom Report

New York City's Commodity Futures Trading Commission (CFTC) Chairman Heath Tarbert takes the oath of office in his new role from Judge Douglas G. Sotgiu at a ceremony in the Tarbert family home.

Heath Tarbert was sworn in as chairman of the Commodity Futures Trading Commission today for a term that extends until April 13, 2024.

"America's futures, swaps, and options markets are the global standard," Tarbert said in a news release.

"Their integrity is essential to the economic security of every American, particularly our farmers and ranchers. I look forward to working with each commissioner and the talented staff at the CFTC to ensure our derivatives markets remain vibrant and wrongdoers are held accountable," Tarbert said.

"At its core, the CFTC is a guardian of the American free-enterprise system. Opportunities and threats await us, and we will be ready. Whether it be unfinished business or the unwritten future, now is the time to act, and I intend to hit the ground running."

Most recently, Tarbert served as Treasury assistant secretary for international markets and subsequently as Treasury acting undersecretary for international affairs.

As Tarbert was sworn in, advocates for cryptocurrencies are searching for clues about his views on alternative currencies, Cointelegraph reported.

S&P Global: Tarbert Moves from Treasury to Lead US CFTC, Stresses Watchdog Role

By Maya Weber

HIGHLIGHTS

- Final Giancarlo actions tackled crossborder issues
- Position limits rule awaits new chairman

Washington — The leadership of the US Commodity Futures Trading Commission officially changed hands Monday, with Heath Tarbert moving from the Treasury Department to replace Christopher Giancarlo as chairman of the derivatives regulator.

Register Now As he assumed the helm Monday, Tarbert emphasized the commission's market watchdog role, saying he looked forward to working to "ensure our derivatives markets remain vibrant and wrongdoers are held accountable." "At its core, the CFTC is a guardian of the American free-enterprise system," he said in a statement released by the agency. "Opportunities and threats await us, and we will be ready."

Tarbert takes over as some long-pending rules affecting energy derivatives trading continue to hang in the balance, including a regulation on speculative position limits in 25 physical commodity futures and swaps markets. Also of interest to energy companies are pending regulations setting capital requirements for swap dealers and proposed rules on swap data reporting.

REGULATORY CHALLENGES

Prior chairmen and commissioners have promised to advance the position limits regulation, which stems from the Dodd-Frank Act financial reforms that followed the 2008 financial collapse. A regulation published in 2011 was struck down in court the following year, and former Chairman Timothy Massad faced opposition from Republican lawmakers to moving ahead with a final rule at the tail end of the Obama administration and instead released a "re-proposal."

Giancarlo in late May told lawmakers he intended to release a revised position limits proposal before he left the agency, but regulations addressing cross-border issues and other matters appeared to dominate the agenda in the final weeks.

Among those, the CFTC at its commissioners open meeting July 11 voted on proposals that would allow non-US clearinghouses to apply for an exemption from registration with the CFTC or to use alternative compliance through their home country requirements.

Action on a proposed position limits rule is seen as possible in the fall.

TARBERT BACKGROUND

Tarbert, whose term runs through 2024, comes to the CFTC after focusing on international markets at the Treasury Department. With a long list of credentials and background working for both Democrats and Republicans, he won Senate confirmation by a vote of 84-9. His prior roles include positions as legal adviser to President Barack Obama on the response to the financial crisis in 2008 and 2009; law clerk for Supreme Court Justice Clarence Thomas; and special counsel to the Senate Banking, Housing and Urban Affairs Committee during negotiations leading up to the Dodd-Frank Act. In the private sector, he worked for the law firm of Allen & Overy, as well as Weil, Gotshal & Manges.

Tarbert's views on rules of interest to energy sector interests are generally not well known. Clamor around CFTC impacts to the sector appeared to ease in the last two years as some matters affecting energy industry end users were addressed and other pending rules stayed on the backburner.

Under Giancarlo's term at the CFTC, "I think they've been very aware of the commercial end user issue and we've appreciated that focus," said Sharon Royka Theodore, Electric Power Supply Association senior director of regulatory affairs.

Jenny Fordham, senior vice president of government affairs at the Natural Gas Supply Association, said her group is looking forward to working with Tarbert. Among NGSA's top priorities are getting the hedge exemption right in the position limits rule and having limits that are "appropriately set," she said. An overarching priority is addressing how market liquidity and counterparty diversification are affected by a number of rules and lingering uncertainties that can create a barrier to market entry, Fordham added.

Crowdinsider: Dr. Heath P. Tarbert Takes Over at CFTC as Chair

By JD Alois

Dr. Heath P. Tarbert was sworn in today as the 14th Chairman of the Commodity Futures Trading Commission (CFTC) replacing J. Christopher Giancarlo.

Tarbert was nominated by President Trump for a term expiring on April 13, 2024.

Tarbert picks up the baton from Giancarlo, a staunch supporter of Fintech innovation, at a crucial time of change in the financial services industry.

Tarbert gave praise to Giancarlo's tenure:

"Chris deserves great credit for his hard work and service leading the CFTC. Thanks to his efforts, this Commission is positioned better to tackle the challenges we face today and into the future."

Tarbert added:

"America's futures, swaps, and options markets are the global standard. Their integrity is essential to the economic security of every American, particularly our farmers and ranchers. I look forward to working with each Commissioner and the talented staff at the CFTC to ensure our derivatives markets remain vibrant and wrongdoers are held accountable. At its core, the CFTC is a guardian of the American free-enterprise system. Opportunities and threats await us, and we will be ready. Whether it be unfinished business or the unwritten future, now is the time to act, and I intend to hit the ground running."

Chairman Tarbert most recently served as Assistant Secretary for International Markets and subsequently as acting Under Secretary for International Affairs at the U.S. Department of the Treasury.

Tarbert also served as the G-7/G20 Deputy Finance Minister, a member of the Financial Stability Board, and the co-chair of both the US-EU Financial Regulatory Forum and the US-UK Financial Regulatory Working Group.

Prior to his service at the Treasury Department, Tarbert was head of the bank regulatory practice of Allen & Overy LLP, a global law firm.

MondoVisione: CME Group Congratulates CFTC Chairman Heath Tarbert

CME Group today released the following statement on the swearing in of Commodity Futures Trading Commission (CFTC) Chairman Heath Tarbert:

"CME Group congratulates Dr. Tarbert as he is sworn in today as CFTC Chairman, following his strong bipartisan confirmation last month. His experience and accomplishments in the international arena in his role as Acting Under Secretary for International Affairs at the U.S. Department of the Treasury position him extraordinarily well to lead the agency. We look forward to working with the new Chairman and Commissioners Behnam, Berkovitz, Quintenz and Stump to address cross-border regulatory challenges and ensure the continued growth and integrity of U.S. derivatives markets.

"We also thank the agency's outgoing Chairman J. Christopher Giancarlo for his leadership on the many issues facing the U.S. derivatives markets throughout his tenure at the Commission, especially on the critical cross-border challenges facing the U.S. markets."

Coindesk: Another Crypto Company Wants to Offer Bitcoin Derivatives in the US

By Daniel Palmer

Institutional digital assets platform trueDigital Holdings has announced plans to offer bitcoin derivatives for U.S. investors.

In a press release on Friday, the company said it's reached an "agreement in principle" to acquire designated contract market (DCM) and swaps execution facility (SEF) registrations with the U.S. Commodity Futures Trading Commission (CFTC) from a firm called trueEX.

The deal is pending approval from the CFTC, the firm said.

If the bid is successful, the aim is to launch a "fully-regulated" cryptocurrency derivatives exchange that would list trueDigital's bitcoin physically deliverable swaps, which the firm states "have been self-certified with the CFTC."

Going forward, the company plans to add additional crypto derivatives.

TrueDigital CEO Thomas Kim said:

"A trueDigital owned and operated regulated exchange is the natural step in our evolution toward achieving our goals. Adding the exchange to our ecosystem delivers a complete end-to-end offering, currently unavailable today, that encompasses tokenization, payments, market data and settlement for the benefit of our clients and partners."

With the move, trueDigital would become one of very few entities offering regulated crypto derivatives in the U.S. If the deal goes through, its main rival would be LedgerX, which launched a bitcoin derivative offering in October 2017.

TrueDigital has previously launched an OTC reference rate for bitcoin and ether.

It has also teamed up with Signature Bank to launch a blockchain-based digital payments platform. The effort received approval from the New York State Department of Financial Services to offer services within the state last December.

Cointelegraph: TrueDigital Plans to Launch CFTC-Regulated Crypto Derivatives Exchange

By Ana Alexandre

New York-based financial technology firm trueDigital Holdings LLC is aiming to acquire the registrations of trueEX LLC in a bid to launch a fully-regulated crypto derivatives exchange, according to a press release published on July 12.

Per the release, trueDigital has concluded an agreement in principle to acquire the Designated Contract Market (DCM) and Swaps Execution Facility registrations of United States Commodity Futures Trading Commission (CFTC)-regulated exchange trueEX LLC. The deal thus is subject to CFTC approval.

Upon approval, trueDigital will roll out a crypto derivatives exchange fully-regulated by the CFTC, where it will list physically-deliverable Bitcoin derivatives for institutional investors.

TrueDigital CEO Thomas Kim said that "adding the exchange to our ecosystem delivers a complete end-to-end offering, currently unavailable today, that encompasses tokenization, payments, market data and settlement for the benefit of our clients and partners."

Earlier in July, Chicago-based crypto exchange ErisX procured a derivatives clearing organization (DCO) license from the CFTC within its plans to make digital asset futures contracts available for trade on its regulated derivatives market later this year via its new DCO.

In late June, the CFTC also approved the application of LedgerX LLC for designation as a contract market. "LedgerX has requested that the CFTC amend its order of registration as a DCO, which limits LedgerX to clearing swaps, to allow it to clear futures listed on its DCM," the official announcement read.

WSJ: Fed's Williams Calls for More Urgency in Replacing Libor

New York Fed president tells financial firms to pick up pace on adopting new SOFR benchmark

By Michael S. Derby

NEW YORK—Federal Reserve Bank of New York President John Williams said Monday financial firms need to stop dragging their collective feet and transition to a new reference interest-rate system to replace the scandal-plagued London interbank offered rate regime.

"I don't always sense urgency among market participants on this issue" of replacing what's called Libor, Mr. Williams said a speech delivered at a conference held by the Securities Industry and Financial Markets Association.

"Tellingly, contracts referencing U.S. dollar Libor, without robust fallback language, continue to be written," he said. While there remain some issues with the new system of rates, Mr. Williams said "don't wait for term rates to get your house in order. Engage with this issue now and understand what it means for your operations."

Mr. Williams' remarks addressed the effort the Fed and the financial industry have been involved in to create a new, more reliable system of reference interest rates that are critical to overall market functionality.

His speech zeroed in on what's called the Secured Overnight Financing Rate, or SOFR. This overnight rate, published daily by the New York Fed and based off Treasury bond borrowing costs, is aimed at creating a more reliable system of interest rates for financial transactions. It is supposed to replace Libor, a long-running system that has suffered from a series of scandals in which it was manipulated.

One issue with moving to SOFR for some firms is that it doesn't offer longer-term rates given that it is focused on overnight borrowing costs, the central bank chief noted. But Mr. Williams doesn't see that as an impediment as a so-called "term" structure with rates that apply to longer-term borrowing will develop over time. He also said a lot of what Libor does offer right now for markets isn't even really needed for "the vast majority" of securities offerings.

Libor will continue to exist with some consistency through 2021 but after that the banks that contribute to creating the rate system will no longer be required to participate. It raises big questions what Libor will represent after that date.

Speaking at the same event as Mr. Williams, Andrew Bailey, chief executive officer of U.K. regulator the Financial Conduct Authority, said that starting in 2022, Libor could become unpredictable and problematic for those still inclined to use it.

In 2022 and beyond, "even if [Libor] did get published, it wouldn't be the same thing," Mr. Bailey said. "The future, if you are still on Libor, will be more uncertain than ever."

Mr. Williams said "I want to emphasize that the industry must not wait for a SOFR term rate to transition away from Libor." He added, "we need a mind-set shift where firms realize that every new U.S. dollar Libor contract written digs a deeper hole that will be harder to climb out of."

Mr. Williams didn't comment on monetary policy or the economic outlook in his remarks. He spoke last Thursday in a speech that signaled he was joining with his colleagues in support of a move toward lower short-term interest rates.

POLITICO Pro: Mnuchin Voices 'Serious Concerns' About Facebook Currency

By Victoria Guida

Treasury Secretary Steven Mnuchin today became the latest U.S. government official to voice reservations about Facebook's planned Libra digital currency, saying the company must comply with the same anti-money laundering regulations that govern financial institutions.

"The Treasury Department has expressed very serious concerns that Libra could be misused by money launderers and terrorist financiers," Mnuchin said in a press briefing at the White House, adding that virtual currencies have been "exploited to support billions of dollars of illicit activities."

He said there would be more enforcement actions coming related to cryptocurrency from his department's Financial Crimes Enforcement Network, or FinCEN.

The Financial Stability Oversight Council, a body consisting of top regulators, has a working group that has met multiple times on issues related to cryptocurrencies, Mnuchin said. He and Federal Reserve Chairman Jerome Powell have discussed concerns about Libra specifically, he added.

President Donald Trump in tweets last week bashed Libra, saying it will have "little standing or dependability." He said he is "not a fan of Bitcoin and other cryptocurrencies, which are not money, and whose value is highly volatile and based on thin air."

"We have only one real currency in the USA, and it is stronger than ever, both dependable and reliable," Trump wrote.

That statement was surprising since it came against a backdrop of the president's campaign to pressure the Fed to lower rates to weaken the dollar and make U.S. exports more competitive.

Mnuchin did not comment on the strength of the dollar but said the administration takes "very seriously the role of the U.S. dollar as the world's reserve currency."

POLITICO Pro: SEC Warns LIBOR Transition Poses Risk For Those Unprepared

By Victoria Guida

The Securities and Exchange Commission today warned that market participants could suffer a "significant impact" if they are unprepared to transition away from LIBOR, in the latest warning about the probable termination of the benchmark rate.

The SEC urged companies and investors to quickly determine their exposure to LIBOR under existing financial contracts or else face the consequences.

"The expected discontinuation of LIBOR could have a significant impact on the financial markets and may present a material risk for certain market participants, including public companies, investment advisers, investment companies, and broker-dealers," SEC staff said in a statement.

"The risks associated with this discontinuation and transition will be exacerbated if the work necessary to effect an orderly transition to an alternative reference rate is not completed in a timely manner," they added.

The London InterBank Offered Rate, known as a "reference rate," is commonly used to determine the payoff for a financial contract. But the volume of transactions used to determine LIBOR, which is supposed to reflect the average interest rate that a top bank would be charged by another bank, has dwindled. The rate also became infamous in 2012 after it was revealed that some banks had been colluding to manipulate it.

Thanks to these shortcomings, the Financial Conduct Authority, the independent U.K. body that regulates financial firms, has not committed that LIBOR will be published past the end of 2021.

The SEC noted in its statement that many existing contracts did not contain a fallback in the event that LIBOR disappears, which could lead to disagreements. In other cases, "the adjustment may be inconsistent with expectations of the affected parties," such as a floating-rate contract converting to a fixed-rate contract.

"There are rarely quick fixes to these types of issues," staff added, "and the Commission staff encourages market participants to focus on them now to avoid business and market disruptions after 2021," when LIBOR will likely cease to be published.

The statement also urged market participants to consider referencing an alternative rate in future contracts, such as the Secured Overnight Financing Rate, which was selected by the Alternative Reference Rates Committee as the official replacement for U.S. dollar LIBOR.

Federal Reserve Vice Chairman Randal Quarles last month urged financial market participants to begin transitioning away from LIBOR "in earnest." And the ARRC, a group of private market participants convened by the Fed, on Thursday released a white paper outlining options for using SOFR in adjustable-rate mortgages.

POLITICO Pro: Facebook Executive Promises to Take Time with Libra

By Zachary Warmbrodt

A top Facebook executive overseeing the company's foray into digital currency will pledge to lawmakers Tuesday that "we know we need to take the time to get this right," as the social media giant faces mounting concerns from policymakers including calls for a delay.

"I want to be clear: Facebook will not offer the Libra digital currency until we have fully addressed regulatory concerns and received appropriate approvals," said David Marcus, who heads Facebook's Calibra financial services subsidiary, in written testimony submitted to the Senate Banking Committee.

Marcus will testify before Senate Banking on Tuesday followed by the House Financial Services Committee on Wednesday.

"I believe that if America does not lead innovation in the digital currency and payments area, others will," he said. "If we fail to act, we could soon see a digital currency controlled by others whose values are dramatically different."

Risk.Net: Swaps Counterparties Spooked By Emir Position Pairing

Stumble on voluntary position reporting could undermine push to reform ETD regime

By Samuel Wilkes

Swaps counterparties are struggling to pair their positions under European regulatory reporting rules, and the industry now fears the problems could undermine future lobbying efforts for reform of the current regime.

"Firms are really concerned that there is going to be inconsistency; it could lead us [into] similar problems that we currently battle with [on] transaction reporting," says an industry source.

Since 2014, European Union firms have had to report their swaps transactions to trade repositories under the European Market Infrastructure Regulation (Emir). Unlike US legislation, the EU requires both counterparties of a trade to report the swap, known as dual-sided reporting. The practice allows regulators to verify reported information is correct. Repositories are responsible for pairing up reports that have the same unique codes representing a single transaction, and then matching key details.

Swaps market participants have long complained that dual-sided reporting is cumbersome and unreliable, and have advocated either a switch to single-sided reporting, or to position reporting. They argue position reporting is more useful to regulators, because it provides a direct snapshot of each firm's exposure to the market and counterparty risk of the positions themselves.

Revisions to Emir agreed by lawmakers in February did not change the regime. However, disappointed market participants still hope to promote position reporting as a possible alternative method when Emir next comes up for review.

In particular, there is an active campaign to persuade legislators to drop trade-level reporting and only require position-level reporting for exchange-traded derivatives (ETDs). The Futures Industry Association released a position paper advocating for the rule change on June 27.

Steer from Esma

Market participants are already allowed to submit reports of open positions they have with their counterparties, but these must be on top of the normal mandatory trade reports. The option of position reporting was set out in a Q&A published by the European Securities and Markets Authority in May last year.

However, the Q&A stressed the importance of firms reporting consistently – which sources say has been interpreted as a nod to the need for pairing the two halves of a position between the two counterparties.

Trade repositories don't currently reconcile position reports, but two sources – including a source at a trade repository – say regulators are now turning up the pressure for pairing to begin as soon as possible.

The source at the repository says swap counterparties are not yet ready for pairing, and preparations have been delayed because the potential consequences of the UK's departure from the EU are keeping repositories and dealers busy.

European regulators have been the strongest advocates of dual-sided reporting, and therefore the main obstacle to any reform. At a public hearing on the Emir review in May 2016, Esma chair Steven Maijoor insisted dual-sided reporting was the best way to ensure reliable information, because it offers regulators the opportunity to identify errors if the two reports do not match. As a result, market participants fear that a stumble over pairing position reports could be pounced on by regulators as a reason to oppose industry lobbying.

Esma did not respond to questions raised by Risk.net for this piece.

Too many cooks

Position-level reports will mostly be used for exchange-traded derivatives, because reporting for contracts cleared through central counterparties must use valuations made by CCPs – a requirement that came into effect in November 2017 in a review of Emir's reporting fields by Esma. Firms had to report their own mark-to-market values of their derivatives before the change.

Information on the value of cleared derivatives is only made available by central counterparties (CCPs) in the form of end-of-day positions, thereby driving the industry's desire to switch away from trade reporting for these instruments.

The difficulty anticipated for pairing position-level reports is the reconciliation of unique transaction identifiers (UTIs) that need to be generated for each trade.

"There is a real concern because one of the points with respect to position level reports is the generation of the UTI," says an industry source. "Reporting firms need to obtain that position-level UTI from the CCP. However, there is an inconsistent generation process for generating UTIs. There is not an easy way for reporting firms to actually digest or ingest or simply obtain that UTI."

The trade repository source says some CCPs use algorithms to generate UTIs and insert them into firms' reports, whereas others don't, meaning counterparties have to manually pick out the UTIs from CCP reports and insert them into their own Emir reports.

"At the moment both sides use a UTI but it is not necessarily the same one," says David Nowell, a senior regulatory reporting specialist at consultancy Kaizen Reporting. "They haven't got that infrastructure or the systems in place to make sure they are currently using the same one."

A further issue is that clients of clearing members do not receive UTIs from their clearing members in time. As Emir requires firms to submit reports no later than the following working day after the conclusion, modification or termination of a trade, clients tend to use dummy UTIs in their reports. As the dummy UTI is different to the UTI used by the clearing member, the positions do not match.

"There are issues where you see people don't have the UTI in time," says the repository source. "People are worried about the timely reporting on a T+1 basis. Generally what will happen is that people will report the things on time but they may use a dummy UTI."

More at stake

The industry has prioritised ETDs in the push for position reporting to replace trade reporting, because firms trade hundreds of the same ETD contracts each day that can cancel each other out. Hence, according to lobbyists, Emir's original objective of allowing regulators to track systemic risk is better served in the ETD market by assessing end-of-day positions. Dropping trade-level reporting for such a high-volume market would also significantly reduce the compliance burden placed on banks.

Successful pairing of positions could strengthen their argument for legislators to abandon trade reporting, as position reporting would then meet Esma's test of being able to check the data by making sure the reports from each counterparty can be paired up.

The bar for position reporting to outperform trade reporting may not be very high, especially for ETDs. In 2014, one repository estimated pairing rates for over-the-counter derivatives stood at about one-third of trades and just 3% for ETDs.

A freedom of information request by Risk.net found that as of February 2019, 86% of trade reports were successfully paired while only 40% of trades were fully matched on their details. However, these figures were not broken down between exchange-traded and OTC derivatives.

CoinTelegraph: CFTC's New Chairman: Who Is Heath Tarbert, What He Thinks of Crypto? By: Kirill Bryanov

July 15 will mark the first day in the office for the United States Commodity Futures Trading Commission's (CFTC) new chairman, Heath Tarbert. As the crypto community is bidding farewell to the regulator's outgoing head, J. Christopher Giancarlo, his successor's stance on digital assets remains unknown. Turning to Tarbert's record as a civil servant and attorney in the financial markets field could shed some light on the direction that the agency might take under his leadership.

Giancarlo's five-year tenure saw the rise of cryptocurrency derivatives as an object of regulatory oversight. Widely regarded as the crypto industry's ally, "Crypto Dad" superintended the historic launch of regulated Bitcoin futures and advocated for a "do no harm" approach to blockchain regulation in his testimony before the U.S. Congress. At the same time, as some observers have pointed out, Giancarlo has stepped up enforcement efforts, turning the CFTC into an agency with teeth.

The news of President Donald Trump nominating Tarbert, a senior official in the Treasury Department, to serve as the new head of the CFTC emerged in December 2018. On June 5, 2019, the Senate voted to confirm his appointment by a wide margin, 84-9. Although Giancarlo's tenure expired in April 2019, he agreed to stay until mid-July to oversee the agency's transition to new leadership. In a statement, the outgoing chairman offered praise to his heritor, calling him highly qualified to continue transforming the agency "into a 21st Century regulator for today's digital markets."

Heath Tarbert: background and early career

A native of Baltimore, MD, Heath Tarbert received his bachelor's degree in accounting and international business from Mount St. Mary, a Catholic liberal arts university located in his home state. He then spent four years in law school at the Ivy League University of Pennsylvania, consecutively earning his Juris Doctor and Doctor of Juridical Science. Tarbert then received the Thouron Award, a prestigious postgraduate scholarship that allowed him to pursue yet another advanced degree: a Ph.D. in comparative law from Oxford.

Having sealed this illustrious scholarly record, Tarbert began his industry career with a series of junior positions at law firms and clerkships in the judicial branch of the U.S. government. Between 2007 and 2008, he worked for the conservative Supreme Court Justice Clarence Thomas. This appointment likely played a significant role in Tarbert's subsequent return to public service in the wake of Trump's accession to the White House. According to one estimate, about 20% of Thomas office's alumni have landed either political appointments or judicial nominations since early 2017, earning their former boss the informal status of "the Trump administration's legal godfather."

Upon concluding his clerkship with Justice Thomas, Heath Tarbert went on to serve as Associate Counsel to the President of the United States in the last months of the George W. Bush administration before leaving for the private sector early into Barack Obama's first term, with a short stop as Special Counsel to the Senate Banking Committee. Tarbert worked for the international law firm Weil, Gotshal & Manges LLP and then Allen & Overy LLP, where he spearheaded the global financial regulatory practice.

Tarbert also served on the board of advisors for the the journal "Review of Securities and Commodities Regulation." During his years in the private sector, he co-authored two articles that appeared in the journal "The Review of Banking & Financial Services." Both are on the subject of the Volcker Rule, a regulation that restricts banks' ability to use customers' deposits to make certain kinds of speculative investments.

Comeback under Trump

In April 2017, President Trump announced his intent to nominate Tarbert to fill the position of Assistant Secretary of the Treasury for International Markets and Development. In October, the nominee was sworn in. In 2017 and 2018, Tarbert served as acting U.S. executive director on the board of the World Bank Group, negotiating global institutional reforms. In April 2019, Tarbert was promoted to acting under secretary for international affairs.

Throughout his term with the Treasury, Tarbert represented the U.S. in several major international organizations in the area of financial markets regulation, such as the Financial Stability Board. He also led U.S. delegations at the G-7 and G-20 Finance Ministers' and Central Bank Governors' Deputies meetings. As policy chair of the Committee on Foreign Investment in the United States (CFIUS), Tarbert championed the Foreign Investment Risk Review Modernization Act, a bill aimed at strengthening regulation of foreign investment in the U.S. so as to better protect national security.

The latter aspect of Tarbert's Treasury career has been arguably the most publicly visible. As the CFIUS policy chair, he promoted the heightened review of foreign investments before the U.S. Senate Committee on Banking, Housing and Urban Affairs and the U.S. House Energy and Commerce Subcommittee on Digital Commerce and Consumer Protection, during which time he called for tighter standards for protecting the nation's technological edge:

"Today, the acquisition of a Silicon Valley start-up may raise just as serious concerns from a national security perspective as the acquisition of a defense or aerospace company, CFIUS's traditional area of focus."

The bill enjoyed bipartisan support and was passed by the U.S. Congress in August 2018.

One practical manifestation of this turn toward curbing foreign powers' attempts to get a hold of the U.S.-sourced technology has been the Trump administration's standoff with China. Tarbert was at the helm of this effort as well: It was him who announced in April 2018 that the government was considering invoking the International Emergency Economic Powers Act to give Trump the power to limit Chinese investment in sensitive sectors of the U.S. economy.

Domestically, following his nomination as the CFTC chairman, Tarbert managed to muster support from across the industry that is perhaps the most dependent on the health of derivatives markets: the agricultural sector. In the buildup to the confirmation vote, many agricultural groups appeared as signatories on a letter to the U.S. Senate endorsing Tarbert for the regulator's leadership. Particularly, the petition noted Tarbert's willingness to walk the extra mile to learn the ins and outs of a brand new industry and its use of derivatives products.

The new CFTC boss is inheriting a lot of work in progress: the impact of Brexit on international financial markets, another round in the fight for U.S. financial sovereignty in the face of the European Union seeking to impose new regulations on international swaps clearing houses and much more. The crypto derivatives agenda, which emerged as a major concern for the agency during Giancarlo's term, is not going anywhere, either. Some matters — for example, Bakkt's continued attempts to get regulatory clearance for its cryptocurrency futures platform — will require prompt decisions. What will these decisions look like? The evidence of where Heath Tarbert's might stand on digital assets is piecemeal and scant.

Given his enormous experience with international financial regulation, there is no way Tarbert would not realize the importance of digital technologies to derivatives markets. However, every such attestation available is accompanied by the usual cautious acknowledgement of both "opportunities and risks." In a statement before the U.S. Senate Committee on Agriculture, Nutrition and Forestry in March 2019, he said:

"We should acknowledge that our derivatives markets have recently been transformed by digital technologies that present opportunities as well as risks. The CFTC must remain committed to promulgating regulations that allow technological innovations to flourish, but also protect our markets and consumers from harm."

In June, commenting on the new U.S-United Kingdom Financial Innovation Partnership, Tarbert observed that "technology is the future of financial services and innovation drives growth."

Granted, these stock declarations are far from a ringing endorsement of fintech's role in the area of the CFTC's oversight. However, signs of formal acknowledgement are better than no signs at all. The takeaway from Tarbert's history of fighting for U.S. national technological security is also rather ambiguous: His determination to assist domestic blockchain innovators could lead him to rid them of unnecessary regulatory hurdles, but at the same time, the cross-border nature of digital assets may trigger security concerns.

Some experts argue that the personal opinions of the CFTC chair might not be of immense importance to the crypto industry. Andrew Bull, a founding partner of BullBlockchainLaw, told Cointelegraph:

"Giancarlo is favorable towards the crypto industry, but this has not really impacted how the industry functions. In other words, the compliance requirements have not changed much as applied to crypto even though he was favorable to the industry. Anyways, the agency is not nearly as involved in the crypto industry as the SEC is, but has stated through guidance that crypto based derivatives without a doubt fall under the Act. Therefore, my conclusion is that not much will change, especially due to the lack of activity the CFTC actually has in the space."

Regardless of personal factors, the CFTC holds great systemic importance for the blockchain sector's development. Antoni Trenchev, co-founder and managing partner at Nexo, attested:

"Any major move of the CFTC is a milestone in the financialization of the digital assets sector. [...] A firm but business-friendly regulatory framework paves the way for the institutional players in the crypto space and we already see this happening with Fidelity providing custodial services, traditional banking institutions such as Nomura, Goldman Sachs and J.P. Morgan are exploring offerings in the same direction. A regulated and above all liquid derivative market is a great signal with a permanent impact to retail and institutional investors that technology and cryptocurrencies built on blockchain are maturing into an asset class worth exploring."

After all, the agency's regulatory powers are vast. The CFTC has identified digital currencies as commodities in 2015, and now it has full jurisdiction over crypto derivatives and other financial products subject to the Commodity Exchange Act. These include futures, options and derivatives contracts, as well as any crypto-based trading platform that utilizes margins, leverages or financing.

Although the spot markets (in which commodities are traded in cash) underlying these instruments are outside of the commission's purview, the CFTC has the authority to intervene if it believes fraud or manipulation are involved, which renders the scope very broad. The hope is that, as he takes the reins of the regulatory agency that is immensely important for the blockchain sector, Heath Tarbert would act so as to earn the honorable title of "Crypto Dad" as well, despite what President Trump may have to say.

Regulation Asia: CFTC Eases Foreign Clearinghouse Access to US Customers

By: Manesh Samtani

An alternative compliance regime will be provided for non-US DCOs registered with the CFTC, while exempt DCOs will be allowed to offer clearing through foreign intermediaries.

The CFTC (Commodity Futures Trading Commission) has voted to accept two proposals which ease access for foreign clearing houses to US customers.

The proposals stemmed from a white paper published by outgoing CFTC Chairman J Christopher Giancarlo in October 2018, in which he advocated for a risk-based approach to cross-border swaps regulation by giving deference to comparable non-US regulatory frameworks.

Alternative compliance for non-US DCOs

At a 11 July open meeting, the CFTC Commissioners voted unanimously to approve a proposed rule to create an optional alternative compliance regime for non-US DCOs (derivatives clearing organisations) that wish to clear swaps for US persons through FCMs (futures commission merchants) and do not pose substantial risk to the US financial system.

Under the alternative compliance route, the CFTC will permit eligible non-US DCOs to comply with the legal requirements from their home jurisdictions in lieu of complying with the corresponding DCO core principles in the Commodity Exchange Act. These non-US DCOs would still be required to comply with the CFTC’s requirements around customer protection and swaps data reporting.

Currently the CFTC oversees 10 US DCOs and six non-US DCOs, including SGX DC (Singapore Exchange Derivatives Clearing), which along with other currently exempted Asian DCOs could benefit from the alternative compliance regime.

The proposal “would reduce the degree to which CFTC-registered foreign [DCOs] are subject to duplicative regulation by the CFTC and their home country regulator,” said CFTC Commissioner Brian Quintenz. “The proposal recognises that foreign regulators have a substantial interest and expertise in supervising DCOs located in their home jurisdictions.”

He noted that the proposal “contrasts starkly” with the recent ESMA (European Securities and Markets Authority) proposal to determine the systemic importance of a foreign DCO to the EU, which it plans to use to apply additional oversight on overseas clearing houses.

“I hope that, through its consultative process, ESMA decides to revise its criteria and ultimately adopts a predictable, transparent, and appropriately calibrated threshold regime for such an important and extraterritorial regulatory determination,” Quintenz said.

Exemption from DCO registration

At the meeting, the Commissioners also voted three-to-two in favour of codifying the policies and procedures the CFTC already follows with respect to granting exemptions from registration as a DCO, on the basis of “comparable, comprehensive supervision and regulation” by a home country regulator.

However, under the proposal, exempt DCOs would be allowed to only clear swaps for US customers through foreign intermediaries that are not registered as FCMs. To facilitate this, the CFTC will also permit non-US persons, without registering as an FCM, to accept funds from US persons to margin swaps cleared at an exempt DCO.

To be eligible, exempt DCOs would be required to make disclosures to their US customers clarifying that the bankruptcy protections afforded to FCMs under US law would no longer apply, while also providing a comparison of the bankruptcy protections that are available under the DCO’s home country regulatory regime.

Quintenz said the proposal “will provide greater choice and flexibility to market participants, ... with increased access to foreign markets and an enhanced ability to hedge their risk.”

Two other Commissioners, Rostin Behnam and Dan Berkovitz, opposed the proposal, saying it would put US FCMs at a competitive disadvantage against non-US intermediaries, and that it would create risks for US customers and the US financial system as a whole.

Last public meeting

Under both proposals, non-US DCOs would be able to offer customer clearing, but in different ways, Giancarlo said.

“Exempt DCOs would be able to offer customer clearing to US eligible contract participants through non-US intermediaries operating in their markets, while fully registered DCOs subject to alternative compliance would be able to permit customer clearing through US FCMs. In both cases, in terms of regulatory oversight of the DCO, the CFTC would defer to the primary regulator or regulators of the DCO.”

The 11 July open meeting was the last under Giancarlo’s leadership. He is due to step down on Monday (15 July).

Two other proposals that stemmed from the October white paper include amendments to regulations governing the offer and sale of foreign futures and options to US customers – which have already been unanimously approved – and a proposal concerning the registration and regulation of swap dealers and major swap participants, which is still under consideration.

Bloomberg: Oil Trades Near $60 on Storm Disruption as Glut Concerns Linger

By: Saket Sundria and Alex Longley

Oil traded near $60 a barrel after a storm shut almost three-quarters of U.S. Gulf of Mexico crude production, even as lingering demand concerns continue to dent the outlook.

Futures rose 0.2% in New York. About 73% of crude output in the Gulf of Mexico was halted as of Sunday but some producers are preparing to return workers to offshore platforms as storm Barry weakens after making landfall. The shutdown countered the impact of China’s economy slowing to a three-decade low in the second quarter amid a prolonged trade dispute with the U.S.

WTI stuck near psychologically key marker

Crude has gained this month because of shrinking U.S. stockpiles and rising tensions in the Middle East. The U.K. and its allies are considering beefing up their military presence in the Persian Gulf to deal with the threat to shipping posed by Iran. Still, there are concerns over the longer term outlook for the oil market with OPEC warning of a glut in 2020 while the IEA pointed to a surprise increase in global inventories in the first half of this year.

“The basic message is that the second half of this year will see some depletion in global oil inventories but this will be followed by a dismal 2020,” PVM Oil Associates analyst Tamas Varga wrote in a report.

West Texas Intermediate for August delivery added 12 cents to $60.33 a barrel on the New York Mercantile Exchange as of 10:47 a.m. London time. Brent for September settlement was 24 cents higher at $66.96 a barrel on the ICE Futures Europe Exchange. The benchmark crude traded at a premium of $6.53 to WTI for the same month.

Exxon Mobil Corp. and Chevron Corp. are among companies returning workers to their offshore platforms and restarting output in the Gulf of Mexico following storm Barry. The region accounts for 16% of total American crude oil production and under 3% of natural gas production, according to the Department of Energy.

The International Energy Agency said Friday that production cuts by OPEC and its allies failed to prevent the return of a surplus in the first half of 2019 as supply exceeded demand at a rate of 900,000 barrels a day. China’s gross domestic product rose 6.2% in the second quarter from a year earlier, below the 6.4% expansion in the first quarter.

Reuters: U.S. shale producers lock in future sales as oil prices rise to one-year high

By Devika Krishna Kumar, Jennifer Hiller

U.S. shale producers are taking advantage of the oil market's rally to levels not seen in nearly a year by locking in prices for future sales, sources familiar with the matter said.

U.S. crude futures this month jumped above $50 a barrel to the highest since February. The rally has sparked optimism among shale companies, but after a bracing year of pandemic-induced demand destruction, they are not ready to ramp up production. Instead, they are using futures markets to lock in higher sale prices.

Shale producers buy and sell contracts in the futures and options markets in a process known as hedging to secure cash flows for later-dated sales.

U.S. oil production peaked at nearly 13 million barrels per day in late 2019, but is now around 11 million bpd after the coronavirus lockdowns crushed fuel demand and oil prices. Output is not expected to rise much in 2021, but those that hedged now are guaranteed sales of barrels at more than $50 even if prices drop again.

“There’s a lot of hedging going on,” said Chris Wright, chief executive of Liberty Oilfield Services, the second-biggest fracking company in North America. “At the prices available today, producers with good acreage can do pretty well.”

Producers’ short positions in U.S. crude futures and options, an indication of hedging activity, have been rising since autumn. They hit a five-month high in mid-December, according to the U.S. Commodity Futures Trading Commission. [CFTC/]

In 2020, 46 North American exploration and production companies declared bankruptcy, according to energy law firm Haynes and Boone, while others merged to reduce debt. Investors had already been pressuring shale companies to curb spending and boost returns even before the pandemic.

“Producers locked in a certain amount of wells at a certain price and hedging at $50 makes you look like a rockstar. This year will be about free cash flow,” one executive at a U.S. shale producer said, on condition of anonymity.

Producers that are hedging are likely locking in about 15% to 20% of production at a time, said Tom Petrie, chairman at energy investment bank Petrie Partners.

Some companies are holding off because they anticipate prices to rise further, perhaps to $60 or $65. Global benchmark Brent crude, which also hit 11-month highs this week near $57, could rise to $65 per barrel by summer 2021, Goldman Sachs said this week.

“Some of them (producers) are pretty torn between hedging at a level they would have killed for six months ago and their perpetually optimistic nature,” said Steve Sinos, vice president at consultancy Mercatus Energy, which advises corporations on hedging.

Average 2021 U.S. crude prices have climbed above $52, also their highest since February.

Signs of increased hedging activity can also be seen in U.S. crude futures time spreads. The premium for U.S. crude for delivery in December 2021 has climbed to more than $2.80 a barrel over those for delivery in December 2022 this week, a signal that producers are selling the later-dated contract to fund their hedges for 2021, dealers said.

WSJ: WSJ Survey: U.S. Economic Growth Will Exceed 4% in 2021

Covid-19 vaccinations and additional government aid boost 2021 forecast by economists

By Harriet Torry and Anthony DeBarros

The U.S. economy will grow 4.3% this year, as the country exits the grip of the coronavirus pandemic, economists forecast in a Wall Street Journal survey.

Economists raised their growth prediction for 2021 U.S. gross domestic product in the January survey, saying vaccinations and the prospect of additional financial relief from Washington for individuals and businesses brightened economic prospects. The latest 2021 growth prediction, measured from the fourth quarter of the prior year, was a sharp increase from the 3.7% growth forecast for 2021 in last month's survey.

Growth this year is expected to follow a contraction of 2.5% in 2020, when the pandemic hit, according to the survey. The Commerce Department will release fourth quarter and 2020 growth estimates on Jan. 28.

Economists in this month's survey were nearly unanimous in their view that U.S. vaccination efforts will be positive for the economy. Around two-thirds of economists said Covid-19 vaccines will boost growth substantially this year, while just over a third expect vaccines will increase growth modestly.

“No vaccine, no recovery,” Joseph Brusuelas, chief economist at RSM US LLP, said. “The discovery of a vaccine will likely unleash over $1 trillion in excess savings that will satiate pent up demand.”

The labor market is also expected to benefit from Covid-19 vaccinations. Some 44% of economists said that administering shots will boost the labor-market outlook modestly this year, while 49% said it would give jobs a substantial boost.

“We expect a surge in economic activity and hiring by the second half of 2021 following mass vaccinations, with the recovery particularly strong in the services sector,” said Leo Feler, a senior economist at the Anderson School of Management at the University of California, Los Angeles.

Still, 85.7% of economists said the pace of vaccine distribution is currently proceeding too slowly, and economists' forecasts suggest they don't expect the impact of vaccine rollout to be felt until later in the year.

In the first quarter, economists on average expected GDP will advance at a 2.2% annual rate, a slowdown from their expectation of 4.3% growth in the fourth quarter of 2020. However, they see GDP growth jumping to a 4.9% annual rate in the second quarter and 5.2% in the third quarter.

Democrats will soon control the White House and both chambers of Congress and are preparing a new coronavirus aid package to follow the roughly $900 billion plan that was signed into law in December. President-elect Joe Biden will be inaugurated on Jan. 20. Democrats already control the House and won a narrow Senate majority through recent wins of two Senate seat runoffs.

While economists expected such stimulus and spending to be a boon for the economy this year and next, they also expect tax increases under the incoming Biden administration.

Some 92% of forecasters said tax increases were either somewhat or very likely. However, a number of economists said they didn't expect such increases to be enacted until 2022 or later, as the pandemic response will take priority for now.

The Journal surveyed 68 economists from Jan. 8-12, though not every economist answered every question.

PoliticoPro: Farmers denounce new rule dealing with 'grain glitch'

By Brian Faler

Farmers are blasting a tax regulation issued Thursday, accusing the Trump administration of imposing a last-minute tax increase on them.

They say a 181-page final rule dealing with the so-called "grain glitch" will end up costing many farmers who work in cooperatives.

"It's baffling why, as this administration is heading out the door, that they are going to issue a reg that imposes such a significant tax on farmers," said Lisa Van Doren, vice president for legislative affairs at the National Council of Farming Cooperatives.

A Treasury spokesperson did not respond to a request for comment.

The two sides have been at loggerheads over the issue for months. It's a somewhat surprising dispute because Trump has been eager to win the support of farmers throughout his administration, sending them billions in subsidies during his trade war with China. And rural areas overwhelmingly backed Trump in his presidential campaigns.

The dispute has to do with the details of a fix Congress approved in 2018 addressing the grain glitch, which arose from provisions in the Tax Cuts and Jobs Act that gave farmers in cooperatives an advantage over other farmers.

The NCFC complains the final regulations issued Thursday, like a previous draft of the rule, will substantially reduce the value of a new 20 percent business deduction for farmers in cooperatives. The dispute centers on how to treat so-called nonpatronage income, which arises from cooperatives doing business with non-members.

FT: Bitcoin securities trading surges as investors seek crypto exposure

German exchange traded product garners volumes matching those of popular European funds

By Steve Johnson

Investors have raced to buy and sell bitcoin-linked securities on both sides of the Atlantic, with one German exchange traded product garnering trading volumes matching Europe's most popular funds.

BTCetc Bitcoin Exchange Traded Crypto (BTCE) has recorded average daily trading amounting to €57m in the first 11 days of January, according to data from Deutsche Börse.

A similar trend has taken hold on Wall Street. Grayscale's Bitcoin Trust, which like its German counterpart tracks the price of the digital currency, has posted average daily turnover of almost $1bn in the first two weeks of this year, amounting to more than nine-times the average in 2020, Bloomberg data show. Its assets under management have boomed to $23bn from $17bn at the end of December and $2bn at the start of 2020.

The sharp rise in trading in the securities highlights how investors are increasingly looking to gain exposure to or bet against cryptocurrencies on traditional markets rather than buying the digital currencies outright.

The trading surge in BTCE this year — a sharp pick-up on the €15.5m daily average in December, the previous record — comes following a tenfold rise in the price of bitcoin since March to a peak of $42,000 earlier this month, before it gave back some gains.

Stephan Kraus, head of Deutsche Börse's ETF segment, said the structure of the BTCE exchange traded note, which eased the regulatory concerns and counterparty risk involved in trading bitcoin, had "increased the appeal of cryptocurrency investments for institutional investors", which can trade without needing to set up specialised digital infrastructure or use an "unregulated crypto platform".

Deutsche Börse's trading data show a number of trades above €30,000, which the group said were unlikely to be from day traders or other retail investors.

Bradley Duke, co-founder and chief executive of ETC Group, the issuer of BTCE, said he thought institutional investors were starting to buy the cryptocurrency as a "safe haven".

"Bitcoin has always had a retail groundswell, people who have an interest in technology, and it was seen as a 'wild west' investment. That has really changed in the last six months," he said.

"Coronavirus has played a part in that. It's starting to look like an attractive alternative to currencies that may be devalued by the stimulus packages. The packages are needed but there are real concerns they may set inflationary forces in play."

Still, the cryptocurrency market has remained dominated by retail traders and more speculative firms including hedge funds, as opposed to traditional money managers such as pension funds, which remain nervous about bitcoin's intense price swings.

The UK's Financial Conduct Authority has banned the sale of cryptocurrency-related derivatives, including exchange traded notes, to retail investors. It also this week renewed its warning that anyone investing in crypto assets "should be prepared to lose all their money".

Christine Lagarde, president of the European Central Bank, on Wednesday called for global regulation of cryptocurrencies to help combat their use in "totally reprehensible money laundering activity".

Also on Wednesday, ETC Group listed similar exchange traded notes denominated in dollars, sterling and Swiss francs on SIX, the Swiss exchange, with Mr Duke saying more products would be launched "in the next few weeks" based on other cryptocurrencies and a basket of cryptos.

Continental Europe has seen a flurry of similar launches, with VanEck and 21Shares also offering bitcoin ETNs on Deutsche Börse. The Swiss exchange now lists 34 crypto exchange traded products from six issuers.

CoinDesk: (Opinion) What Crypto Can Expect From Gary Gensler at the SEC

A ex-CFTC official on how Biden's putative pick for SEC head might approach the office and the crypto-related issues before it.

By Jeff Bandman

This week, reports emerged that Gary Gensler, the former chairman of the Commodity Future Trading Commission (CFTC) is set to be President-elect Joe Biden's choice to take over the Securities and Exchange Commission (SEC). This is good news for the digital assets industry. From my experience with Gensler, whether the subject is digital assets, swaps or market structure, I can attest that he is thoughtful and broad-minded about the future of crypto-assets and that he understands the role enlightened regulators can play in boosting innovation. I can also promise he will not simply be a cheerleader.

Comprehension

First of all, he gets it. He has clearly devoted himself immersively to understanding the space on many levels—technology, policy, economics and otherwise. He has testified on digital currencies policy and regulation before Congress, taught blockchain and digital currencies at MIT Sloan School of Management, and participated in numerous public and private discussions in the U.S. and internationally (some of which I've participated in and had exchange of views). He will step into the job shovel-ready, as well-informed and engaged with digital assets as one could possibly hope for the chair of a U.S. financial regulator to be.

Market structure

I think it is highly likely that he will make market structure a high priority. Unlike previous SEC chairs, who had enforcement or M&A backgrounds, Gensler's background is in markets and financial technology as well as policy.

Arriving at the CFTC in 2009 following the financial crisis, he led major reform of the over-the-counter (OTC) derivatives market under the 2009 G20 Pittsburgh accord, and he helped draft the Dodd-Frank Wall Street Reform and Consumer Protection Act, which reorganized the financial system. The CFTC passed over 65 rules in response to its Dodd-Frank mandate.

The industry was not always happy with the outcomes, to put it mildly. There were plenty of complaints that the CFTC's reforms would irreparably harm the swaps market.

However, the U.S. swaps market remains broadly speaking vibrant, liquid and trusted, and performed with efficiency and resilience even in March 2020, at the height of the COVID-19 pandemic. This will reinforce his conviction that investors and other stakeholders trust well-regulated markets.

Gensler was mindful of the hold enjoyed by swaps market incumbents, and sought to enable challengers and insurgents (within a strong regulatory framework). In crypto, the "incumbents" are a largely different population, but these dynamics could be repeated.

Gensler will have strong mandates and expectations from the progressive side of the aisle. Accordingly, we can expect strong focus on investor protection to balance out promotion of capital formation using crypto-assets, and a need to ensure crypto does not become a side-door or back-door to circumvent regulatory frameworks.

I expect we will see much greater clarity on market structure and infrastructure for crypto assets– the regulatory clarity that will promote adoption and investor confidence – and I would be shocked if there are not things that make the industry howl.

ETFs

Under Gensler, I think we will see the SEC green-light retail bitcoin exchange-traded funds (ETF) finally. I anticipate he will review closely, and be persuaded by, data regarding the underlying liquidity of the spot market and the integrity of selected source marketplaces where price discovery and formation are occurring.

The outlook could evolve from "I don't want anything bad to happen on my watch" to "how can these be offered safely to American investors"? Oversight of the underlying spot market could involve a greater role for the SEC as well.

The role of the Strategic Hub for Innovation and Financial Technology (or FinHub) could also be enhanced. This office, overseen by Valerie A. Szczepanik, was recently elevated to report directly to the SEC Chair (thus aligning it with LabCFTC's 2019 elevation). Chair Gensler may use FinHub not just for engagement but to drive stronger convergence of development and execution of policy across internal silos.

International cooperation

How will things play out internationally?

During Chair Gensler's CFTC tenure (ending in 2014), relationships with other national regulators were strained, to put it mildly. International regulators with long memories have already asked me about this, worried that Gensler tried to impose the U.S. approach to swaps on other jurisdictions, and that we might expect more of the same.

I don't think international conflict will be a hallmark of his approach to crypto regulation. I believe we can expect strong international collaboration and cooperation. Crypto-assets regulation is very different than the international swaps market.

First of all, the Biden Administration is widely expected to embrace multilateralism with regard to international policy and engagement. For the SEC Chair to take a different approach would strike a markedly different tone.

Second, the CFTC under Chair Gensler's leadership was either the first jurisdiction, or among the first jurisdictions, to adopt OTC reforms after the financial crisis. Much of the international friction arose because the U.S. went first, and CFTC rules, guidance and interpretations were given extraterritorial effect to fill a vacuum and deter regulatory arbitrage. Recent CFTC rule-makings on cross-border issues have referred to changed circumstances now that other G20 and non-G20 jurisdictions have largely (though not completely) implemented the 2009 Pittsburgh reforms (the SEC being among the last to do so, having completed its framework for security-based swaps trading just last month).

The global landscape of crypto-assets regulation in 2021 is far different from OTC swaps circa 2011. Although there is not a one-size-fits-all approach by any means, many jurisdictions have implemented rigorous and innovative crypto-assets regulatory frameworks already. Others, such as the EU, have comprehensive proposals under consideration.

Moreover, there are numerous international workstreams under the aegis of the FSB, BIS, FATF, G7, G20, OECD, IMF, CPMI, IOSCO and others. Although gaps and differences remain, as does potential for regulatory arbitrage in the global digital finance landscape, Chair Gensler will not encounter the regulatory vacuum he found in swaps. That said, we should not expect the SEC to be reticent to promote its perspective on international regulatory framework, or to be reluctant to advocate greater harmonization.

Nor does he have a clear statutory mandate for action with regard to crypto-assets from Congress that he did under Dodd-Frank because Congress has not adopted any crypto-assets legislation. In the absence of legislation or other oversight, he may well have considerable latitude.

Spot markets

Here's a major unanswered question. Will Gensler seek, and obtain, a mandate from Congress for the SEC to regulate and supervise the spot (or cash) market for crypto-assets that are not securities, and to oversee the markets that offer trading?

Currently there is no U.S. federal regulator that supervises trading of crypto-assets like bitcoin and Ethereum that have been deemed not to be securities. The CFTC has enforcement authority. For example, if there is fraud or manipulation in the spot market that causes distortions (or worse) in the derivatives markets that it does directly regulate. But that is not the same as regulatory or supervisory authority.

FinCEN, at the Treasury Department, has authority from an AML/BSA perspective, but again these do not equate to supervision for market integrity, business conduct and safety and soundness. The SEC and CFTC do that for their respective regulated exchanges and other markets. This leaves a major regulatory gap in the US federal framework.

Will Gensler seek this type of authority from Congress? Will Congress grant it and provide the necessary resources? Will that be the "price of admission" for retail bitcoin ETFs? If this happens, it won't be overnight.

Outlook

Having shaped the structure of the global swaps market, Gensler will likely embrace the opportunity to drive the regulatory structure of the crypto-assets market.

Of course, an SEC Chair cannot act unilaterally. He will need votes from his fellow Commissioners and support from other stakeholders to execute his vision or agenda. Non-crypto priorities may take precedence, starting with the pandemic as well as other policy initiatives of the new administration that will demand resources and attention. That said, Gensler has demonstrated his ability to drive an independent agency to execute on multiple fronts simultaneously.

Like everything else in crypto, this should be interesting, unpredictable and full of twists and turns. The regulatory certainty the industry gets may not be the exact flavor it seeks.

Reuters: Exclusive: U.S. Commodity Futures Trading Commission chair to resign early next year

By Michelle Price

Heath Tarbert will resign as chair of the U.S. derivatives market regulator early next year when Democratic President-elect Joe Biden designates an acting agency head, ensuring a "smooth transition," he told Reuters in an exclusive interview.

A former corporate attorney and senior Treasury Department official, Tarbert was nominated by President Donald Trump to be both chair and one of five commissioners at the Commodity Futures Trading Commission (CFTC), taking office in July 2019.

Commissioners are political appointees, with a maximum of three from the same party allowed at any time. The chair serves at the president's discretion, but commissioners are independent.

Tarbert, a Republican, said he wants to return to the private sector. While he will resign as chair, he expects to stay on as a commissioner after Biden takes office on Jan. 20 while he finalizes his plans.

"It's important to have a smooth handover and a smooth transition," said Tarbert. "It's obviously been a tremendous adventure and - I think - successful time in government ... but I would like to return to the private sector in some relevant leadership role," he said.

Tarbert, 44, did not speculate on his replacement. Washington analysts say Democratic commissioners Rostin Behnam and Dan Berkovitz are the front-runners, and would likely take a tougher stance on the industry.

During his tenure at the CFTC, which began policing the over-the-counter derivatives or "swaps" market after it nearly toppled the financial system in 2008, Tarbert has led an unusually active rule-making agenda, said lawyers.

The agency has finalized 40 rules and proposed 21 more, according to data provided by the agency, while juggling practical and regulatory challenges created by the COVID-19 pandemic.

"Heath is a talented negotiator. During his time at Treasury as well as at the CFTC, he has been effective in enacting critical policies," Treasury Secretary Steven Mnuchin told Reuters in a statement.

Several of the completed rules stemmed from the 2008 financial crisis, including big, contentious changes such as limits on speculative physical commodities positions and capital requirements for non-bank swap dealers.

Some have been criticized by consumer advocates and Democrats for being too weak, while lawyers say others were rushed, resulting in problematic holes and snags.

"There's always a tension between getting stuff done, getting it done in a timely fashion, and getting it absolutely perfect," said Tarbert.

Generally speaking, however, Tarbert has avoided the partisan scrapping and pro-industry accusations that have dogged other Trump regulators, with 87% of his votes passing on a bipartisan basis, according to agency data.

"He did everything he could to bring consensus to the agency, but sometimes it's impossible," said Sheila Bair, the former chair of the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation who has worked closely with Tarbert.

Tarbert's enforcement record has also surprised lawyers. In 2020, the agency imposed $1.33 billion in penalties, the third year-on-year increase, with a record 113 actions.

Notable cases include a landmark $920 million market manipulation settlement with JPMorgan Chase & Co , and the agency's first corruption-based fraud action against Houston-based Vitol Inc. [L1N2IJ2B1] [L4N2GQ3S0]

"I think that busts the myth that Republicans are soft on Wall Street," said Tarbert. Institutions should be treated "like adults" with reasonable regulation and supervision, he said. "There is no flexibility when people wantonly break the rules."

Politico Pro: CFTC's Tarbert to resign chairmanship in early 2021

By Kellie Mejdrich

CFTC Chair Heath Tarbert will resign his position as head of the commission early next year, according to a statement posted online on Thursday.

Tarbert was confirmed by the Senate in June 2019 for a term expiring on April 13, 2024. But he was expected to leave following President-elect Joe Biden's transition. SEC Chair Jay Clayton has already announced an early departure by the end of the year. Both announcements give Biden an earlier start on naming successors to lead the independent agencies.

Reuters reported Thursday that Tarbert said he would resign as chair in 2021 when Biden names an interim agency head but that he expects to stay on as a commissioner after the new president takes office while he finalizes his plans and to ensure a smooth transition.

After he resigns the chairmanship, he'll complete plans to return to the private sector, the CFTC said, confirming the Reuters report. "It's important to have a smooth handover and a smooth transition," he told Reuters.

In a statement, Tarbert said the CFTC's bipartisanship helped break through the gridlock between Republicans and Democrats in Washington.

"The partisan divisions in Washington may run deep, but the Commission's historically collegial atmosphere has continued uninterrupted," he said.

Tarbert highlighted the following during his tenure:

— A record number of open meetings held during his chairmanship; Tarbert said the 20 open meetings under his tenure were more than all the open meetings in the previous seven years combined.

— The CFTC concluded negotiations between the European Union and the U.K. related to cross-border swaps regulation.

— Tarbert declared Ether was a commodity and therefore subject to the agency's rules in October 2019.

— More than 1,000 new products were self-certified under the agency's rules for trading.

— The commission finished work on 40 final rules and advanced 21 proposals, with “nearly 90 percent of them on a bipartisan basis,” Tarbert said.

WSJ: CFTC Chairman Heath Tarbert to Resign, Remain at the Derivatives Regulator

Republicans could retain control of the commission until 2022, despite transfer of power in the White House

By Paul Kiernan

The head of the nation’s derivatives regulator will step down from his leadership role while remaining a commissioner, leaving control of the five-person panel in Republican hands, at least for now.

The Commodity Futures Trading Commission said Thursday that Heath Tarbert will resign as chairman, the latest Trump appointee to announce plans to step aside as President-elect Joe Biden prepares to enter the White House on Jan. 20. A person familiar with Mr. Tarbert’s plans said he would retain his seat until he decides on his next move. His term expires in 2024.

That means Republicans will keep their 3-2 majority at the CFTC, possibly until 2022.

Republican commissioner Brian Quintenz hasn’t said when he plans to depart and is legally allowed to remain in the role until Jan. 3, 2022, according to a CFTC official.

Mr. Biden will likely appoint one of the commission’s two sitting Democrats— Dan Berkovitz or Rostin Behnam —as acting chairman while the Senate mulls an eventual nominee. But a Democratic chairman’s ability to pass tougher rules on banks, clearinghouses or derivatives traders would be held in check by the need to get at least one Republican vote.

The fifth commissioner, Republican Dawn DeBerry Stump, has a term that expires in April 2022.

The CFTC isn’t expected to play as central a role as it did the last time a Democrat entered the White House. During President Obama’s first term, financial regulators were tasked with implementing the massive Dodd-Frank financial reform, which focused heavily on making derivatives markets less risky to the financial system.

Bloomberg: CFTC’s Tarbert Says He’ll Step Down as Chairman Early in 2021

By Lydia Beyoud and Benjamin Bain

- Tarbert has led the U.S. derivatives regulator since mid-2019
- Former law firm partner didn’t say what he plans to do next

Heath Tarbert, a Republican lawyer who has led the U.S. Commodity Futures Trading Commission Chairman since last year, is planning to step down in January, he said in a statement Thursday.

Tarbert, 44, joined the nation's main derivatives regulator in July 2019 after serving as a senior official in President Donald Trump's Treasury Department. He said in the statement that his time at the agency had been "an extraordinary privilege." He didn't say what he plans to do next.

A former partner at law firm Allen & Overy, Tarbert as CFTC chief tried to raise the agency's profile and highlight the role derivatives play in the economy. The regulator has levied significant fines against Wall Street firms accused of wrongdoing, including joining other federal agencies in a record $920 million settlement with JPMorgan Chase & Co. in September to resolve spoofing allegations.

Tarbert will step aside after pushing through a flurry of policy changes in the past year. Some of those regulations, such as limits on hedge funds' bets in oil futures and a pared-back approach to policing overseas swaps trades, were opposed by the commission's Democrats as being too deferential to industry.

It's common for a CFTC chairman to step down shortly after a presidential election. Once the head of the agency relinquishes that role, one of the other commissioners is installed as the acting leader until a permanent replacement is appointed by the president and confirmed by the Senate.

The acting chairman role historically has been filled by a member of the new president's party. Dan Berkovitz and Rostin Behnam are the two Democrats now serving on the five-member commission and both are seen as candidates for the permanent role.

In a letter to staff announcing his plans obtained by Bloomberg, Tarbert said that his office has been in touch with the incoming administration and that he was "committed to facilitating a smooth transition."

Reuters reported on Tarbert's plans earlier Thursday.

CFTC spokeswoman Rachel Millard confirmed that Tarbert plans to stay at the agency as a commissioner for a short time after stepping down when President-elect Joe Biden is inaugurated while he decides what to do next.

Law360: CFTC's Tarbert To Step Down as Chairman In 2021

By Dean Seal

Commodity Futures Trading Commission head Heath Tarbert announced Thursday that he will be resigning from the role of chairman early next year, though he said he plans to remain a commissioner at the agency.

Appointed to lead the derivatives regulator in 2019, Tarbert said in a statement that he would be stepping down in early 2021, presumably before President-elect Joe Biden takes office and formally nominates a successor.

"I am immensely proud of the agency's accomplishments in our pursuit to be the global standard for sound derivatives regulation," Tarbert said in the statement.

While he will no longer chair the CFTC, Tarbert told Reuters in an exclusive interview on Thursday morning that he plans to retain his seat as one of the CFTC's three Republican commissioners for the time being. His term is currently set to expire in 2024.

The agency's two Democratic commissioners, Dan Berkovitz and Rostin Behnam, are considered front-runners to replace Harbert as chairman, but should all three Republicans choose to stay with the regulator, the agency could remain under Republican control until 2022, when Republican Commissioner Brian Quintenz's term expires.

Tarbert is among several agency heads appointed by President Donald Trump who have announced plans to step aside before the Biden administration takes over in January. Jay Clayton, chairman of the U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission, announced similar intentions last month.

The chairmen's resignations come in tandem with the departures of their top enforcers. SEC enforcement chief Stephanie Avakian also announced on Thursday that she will be leaving the securities regulator at the end of the month, and CFTC enforcement director James McDonald left the agency in October.

Tarbert is leaving the CFTC's helm after a record-breaking fiscal year for the agency's enforcement division.

In its annual enforcement report from early December, the CFTC said it'd brought a historic 113 actions and wrangled more than $1.3 billion in civil monetary relief, with a big boost coming from a landmark $920 million spoofing settlement with JPMorgan Chase & Co. reached on Sept. 29, the day before the CFTC's fiscal year ended.

During his time as chair, Tarbert also oversaw a busy regulatory agenda, which included the finalization of revisions to the Volcker Rule's proprietary trading ban, the closing of a loophole that allowed "bad actors" to manage people's money, the expansion of anonymity protections for counterparties who trade on swap execution facilities, and, recently, the approval of rules to mitigate market disruptions caused by electronic trading anomalies.

Tarbert has also advocated for the establishment of regulatory guidance for digital assets and cryptocurrency.

President Trump nominated Tarbert to replace outgoing CFTC Chairman J. Christopher Giancarlo in late 2018, while Tarbert was still the assistant secretary for international markets at the U.S. Department of the Treasury.

Prior to joining the Treasury Department, Tarbert was a partner in Allen & Overy LLP's U.S. bank regulatory group. He also served as special counsel to the Senate Banking Committee from August 2009 to March 2010, assistant counsel to former President George W. Bush from August 2008 to January 2009, and clerk to Justice Clarence Thomas from July 2007 to July 2008.

CoinDesk: Crypto-Friendly CFTC Chairman Tarbert Intends to Resign 'Early Next Year'

Nikhilesh De

Commodity Futures Trading Commission (CFTC) Chairman Heath Tarbert announced Thursday he would resign early in 2021.

The crypto-friendly regulator took office last year, and has overseen an expansion of regulated crypto products in the derivatives space, including ether futures contracts and bitcoin (BTC, -3.00%) options products. In a public statement, he noted that ether was declared a commodity under his tenure.

Tarbert has said in various public statements that he sees the potential for much of the financial system to build on top of blockchain platforms, like Ethereum.

"With the agenda I laid out last year now complete, the Commission can fully turn its focus to the unwritten future," he said in Thursday's announcement.

"A majority of our work has taken place in the midst of COVID-19, a global pandemic that is testing the strength of our markets and our ability to adapt. Amid historic volatility, the CFTC has provided a steady hand and watchful eye while our markets act as shock absorbers. There is no doubt in my mind this has been the CFTC's 'finest hour' during our celebrated 45-year history," he said.

Tarbert did not provide a specific timeline for his departure, but he will leave as President-elect Joe Biden takes office after unseating incumbent President Donald Trump. Biden is already set to name a new Securities and Exchange Commission (SEC) chairperson after current one, Jay Clayton, announced he would depart at the end of 2020.

Biden may also name a new head for the Office of the Comptroller of the Currency. Currently, the seat is filled by Acting Comptroller Brian Brooks, who has been nominated to serve a full five-year term with the agency.

The Block Crypto: CFTC Chairman Heath Tarbert Announces Plan to Depart 'Early Next Year'

By Aislinn Keely

Commodity Futures Trading Commission (CFTC) chairman Heath Tarbert says he intends to resign his position early next year.

Tarbert firmed up crypto regulation during his tenure by asserting that ether is a commodity and falls under the CFTC's purview. Tarbert's term was set to expire in 2024, which also coincided with the deadline for the CFTC's holistic framework for crypto assets.

Tarbert began serving as the CFTC's top official in July 2019. In his announcement, he said he was humbled by the bipartisan support for his leadership and agenda across Congress.

With the transition into president-elect Joe Biden's administration, other key regulators have announced their departures including Securities Exchange Commission chairman Jay Clayton and the agency's Director of the Division of Corporation Finance Bill Hinman, who also made significant remarks on Ethereum during his tenure.

With Tarbert's exit, that opens the door for Biden to choose a new chairperson of the SEC.

In his statement, Tarbert thanked his fellow commissioners for what he says was a productive 17 months in office, and referred to the agency's COVID-19 response as the CFTC's "finest hour."

A finalized date of departure was not included in the email, nor any window into transition plans.

Cointelegraph: CFTC Chairman Tarbert announces resignation, confirms that Ether is a commodity.

Over the course of his 18-month term, Tarbert has been a consistent advocate for principles-based regulation of crypto.

By Kollen Post

In a public statement on Thursday, Chairman Heath Tarbert announced that he will be leaving the Commodity Futures Trading Commission early next year.

In listing accomplishments over the course of his term, Tarbert included that "We have promoted responsible fintech innovation and declared Ether a commodity."

This tracks with Tarbert's broader interest in the crypto markets and earlier statements affirming that Bitcoin (BTC) and Ether (ETH) should not face regulation as securities.

Tarbert, who joined the CFTC in 2019, has been a noted voice for sound crypto regulation at the federal level. He joins a laundry list of appointed regulators who are leaving their posts to make way for a new administration. Tarbert's colleague, Commissioner Brian Quintenz, is also poised to depart soon.

There is no word yet on President-elect Joe Biden's preferences for leadership at the CFTC or the related Securities and Exchange Commission, though he has made Tarbert's predecessor, Gary Gensler, a leader of his financial team.

Pensions & Investments: Tarbert To Step Down as CFTC Chairman

By Brian Croce

Heath P. Tarbert will step down as chairman of the Commodity Futures Trading Commission early next year.

"Leading the men and women of the CFTC these last 17 months has been an extraordinary privilege but, like all good things, it must come to an end," he said in a statement Thursday.

Mr. Tarbert, who previously served as acting undersecretary for international affairs at the Treasury Department, started his five-year term as chairman in July 2019, but is stepping down as Democrats prepare to take over White House. He did not indicate what he plans to do after leaving the CFTC.

During his tenure, the commission advanced 40 final rules and 21 proposals — nearly 90% of them on a bipartisan basis, according to Mr. Tarbert's statement. "The partisan divisions in Washington may run deep, but the commission's historically collegial atmosphere has continued uninterrupted," he said.

Mr. Tarbert added that the COVID-19 pandemic is testing the "strength of our markets and our ability to adapt. Amid historic volatility, the CFTC has provided a steady hand and watchful eye while our markets act as shock absorbers. There is no doubt in my mind this has been the CFTC's 'finest hour' during our celebrated 45-year history."

The CFTC consists of five commissioners appointed by the president, with the advice and consent of the Senate, to serve staggered five-year terms. No more than three commissioners at any one time can be from the same political party. The president — with Senate consent — also designates one of the commissioners to serve as chair.

The commission currently has two Democrats — Rostin Behnam and Dan M. Berkovitz — with President-elect Joe Biden set to take office Jan. 20.

Law360: Names to Watch as Biden Mulls Next SEC and CFTC Leaders

By Dean Seal and Tom Zanki

As President-elect Joe Biden's transition team continues to stock the incoming administration with new government agency leaders, several names are being tossed around as potential successors to the outgoing heads of the U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission and the Commodity Futures Trading Commission.

SEC Chairman Jay Clayton announced last month that he would follow in the footsteps of his predecessors during presidential transitions and resign from the securities regulator by the end of the year. CFTC Chairman Heath Tarbert made a similar announcement on Thursday, stating that he would leave the derivatives regulator in early 2021.

Here, Law360 takes a look at some of the possible contenders to replace the departing chairmen.

SEC

Former U.S. Attorney for the Southern District of New York

Bharara, who served as the top federal prosecutor for the Southern District of New York until President Donald Trump fired him in 2017, is now also known as a Twitter personality and host of the weekly podcast "Stay Tuned With Preet."

Appointed by former President Barack Obama in 2009, Bharara quickly made a name for himself as an unusually charismatic prosecutor who was unafraid to take on hedge fund billionaires and bigwigs in public office. While chastised for the cases he didn't bring — namely against the big bank executives whose corner offices weren't far from his own — Bharara's tenure at the top of the Southern District of New York was marked by daring and ambitious cases that have left a big mark on public life.

Two months into his presidency, Trump fired Bharara after the powerful prosecutor refused to resign his post, as he and 45 other U.S. attorneys appointed by Obama were ordered to do. The move stunned the legal community and the media, particularly given that Trump had previously asked him to stay in office.

Following his firing, Bharara joined the New York University School of Law as a distinguished scholar in residence and has maintained a vocal online presence ever since.

Gary Gensler

Former Chairman of the CFTC

Known for his hard-line approach to regulation under the Obama administration, Gensler remade the once-sleepy CFTC into one of the most aggressive financial regulators in Washington when he served as chairman between 2009 and 2014.

Gensler took a particularly tough stance in negotiations over a new regime for policing the derivatives market in the wake of the 2008 financial crisis. Swaps dealers started facing more scrutiny as a result of his efforts, with the often-complex transactions becoming subject to central clearing and the CFTC rolling out new trading platforms called swap execution facilities.

While it clashed with the industry and other agencies, the CFTC was one of the few financial regulators able to complete most of the key rules mandated by the 2010 Dodd-Frank Wall Street Reform and Consumer Protection Act by the time Gensler prepared to depart the agency in late 2013.

Currently a professor at the MIT Sloan School of Management, Gensler was tapped by Biden last month to lead his transition team's review of the government's financial regulators, including the SEC, CFTC and Federal Reserve.

Allison Herren Lee

SEC Commissioner

Appointed by Trump and confirmed by the Senate in 2019, Lee is one of the SEC's two Democratic commissioners and is expected to serve as acting chair of the agency once Clayton leaves at the end of the year.

Lee worked at the SEC in various roles from 2005 to 2018, including as senior counsel to the enforcement division's complex financial instruments unit and, from 2013 to 2015, as counsel to Commissioner Kara Stein, whose seat she later filled.

Prior to joining the SEC, Lee clerked for a Colorado Supreme Court judge and later worked at Denver-based law firm Sherman & Howard LLC. Her current term as commissioner is set to expire in June 2024.

Kara Stein

Former SEC Commissioner

Stein was a progressive voice on the commission who pushed for strong investor protections and a sweeping modernization of the securities regulator from 2013 until her departure in 2019. She notably offered the sole dissent to the SEC's then-proposed, now-enacted Regulation Best Interest and frequently favored strong corporate penalties.

Prior to joining the SEC, Stein was a top aide to Sen. Jack Reed, D-R.I., when he was chairman of a Senate securities and insurance subcommittee, and helped draft key provisions of the Dodd-Frank Act.

After her five and a half years at the SEC came to a close, Stein took positions on the faculty of multiple law schools, including Harvard Law School and the University of Pennsylvania Law School.

Robert Jackson Jr.

Former SEC Commissioner

Jackson announced in January that he would step down from the commission within the month in order to teach at New York University School of Law. Appointed by Trump in 2018, Jackson was a frequent and vocal critic of deregulatory actions that he considered a threat to investor protection.

During his tenure, Jackson dissented on many votes and gave several speeches focused on shareholder rights. Notably, he opposed a landmark SEC rule passed last June defining the relationship between stockbrokers and their clients, echoing criticisms made by his then-fellow commissioner Stein.

Prior to joining the SEC, Jackson was a senior policy adviser at the U.S. Department of the Treasury who helped develop executive compensation rules for major corporations in the wake of the financial crisis. He went on to join the faculty of Columbia Law School.

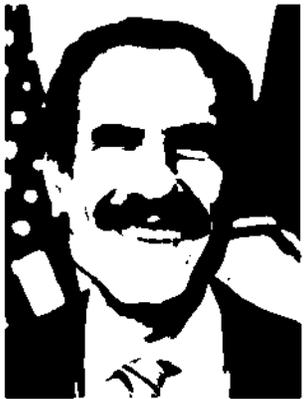

Valerie Caproni

U.S. District Judge for the Southern District of New York

By the time she was appointed to the judgeship by Obama in 2013, Judge Caproni had already built a lengthy career in and out of public service. After clerking for Judge Phyllis Kravitch in the Eleventh Circuit as a recent law school grad, Judge Caproni was an associate at Cravath Swaine & Moore LLP before becoming an assistant U.S. Attorney in New York's Eastern District.

She left a top position in the office's criminal division in 1998 to become regional director of the SEC's Pacific Regional Office, based in California, where she pushed for stronger cooperation between the regulator and federal prosecutors. After a stint at Simpson Thacher & Bartlett LLP, she was named in 2003 as general counsel of the FBI, where she served until 2011.

CFTC

Dan Berkovitz

CFTC Commissioner

Berkovitz's history with the CFTC dates back to the Obama administration, when he served as the agency's general counsel from 2009 to 2013. He was also the CFTC's deputy representative to the Financial Stability Oversight Council, a division created by Dodd-Frank in order to identify and respond to risks threatening the nation's financial stability.

Berkovitz is now serving a five-year term as CFTC commissioner that expires in 2023. He has often criticized deregulatory actions he views as favoring large banks, including his dissent from a 2019 rule to ease rules on swaps trading.

Before joining the CFTC, Berkovitz was a partner and co-chair of the futures and derivatives practice at WilmerHale. A former Georgetown University Law Center adjunct professor, Berkovitz was also vice chair of the American Bar Association Committee on Futures and Derivatives.

Rostin Behnam

Behnam is the senior Democrat on the CFTC, serving a term that expires in 2021.

Before joining the CFTC in 2017, Behnam served as senior counsel to Sen. Debbie Stabenow, D-Mich. He advised Stabenow on implementing Dodd-Frank, including matters affecting the Treasury Department, U.S. prudential regulators, and the SEC. Behnam was also Stabenow's lead adviser during the investigation of MF Global following its 2011 bankruptcy.

Since joining the CFTC, Behnam has delved into environmental matters. He sponsored a September report that provided recommendations to mitigate risks to financial markets posed by climate change, a stated focus of the Biden administration. Behnam also serves on the CFTC's Market Risk Advisory Committee, which advises the agency on market structures and risks across clearinghouses, exchanges, intermediaries, market makers and end-users.

Chris Brummer
Georgetown Law Professor

Brummer was previously nominated to serve on the CFTC by Obama. But after receiving approval from the Senate Agriculture Committee in September 2016, his nomination stalled and was later pulled by Trump.

Brummer, a former Cravath Swaine & Moore LLP attorney who is the faculty director at Georgetown's Institute of International Economic Law, lectures on financial regulation. He serves on the CFTC's Subcommittee on Virtual Currencies and the Consultative Working Group for the European Securities and Markets Authority's Financial Innovation Standing Committee.

*De'Ana H. Dow
Partner and General Counsel at Capitol Counsel LLC*

Dow, an experienced CFTC counsel and adviser, has worked since 2012 at lobbying firm Capitol Counsel, which influences government legislation and regulation on financial markets. She was also managing director at derivatives exchange CME Group Inc. and was a senior vice president and chief legislative counsel for commodity futures exchange the New York Mercantile Exchange.

The Georgetown University Law Center graduate also worked in several capacities at the CFTC from 1980 to 2002. She served as counsel to former Chairman William Rainer under the Clinton administration and special adviser to former Chairman James Newsome under the George W. Bush administration.

The Trade: US Authorities Urged to Investigate 'Illegal' Changes to CME Market Data Fee Policies

EDI has called on the CFTC, House of Representatives, and the US Senate to investigate fee changes at CME Group that would increase costs each year for the firm.

By Annabel Smith

Data distributor Exchange Data International (EDI) has urged regulators in the US to investigate derivatives exchange CME Group's proposed changes to its data fee policies.

Under the changes to fees, CME Group intends to charge redistributors like EDI a total of $120,000 per year from 2021 for redistribution of data across each of its four markets.

EDI said the changes meant CME would also be able to charge for data that was already available in the public domain, including historical prices for commodities such as corn, crude oil, and gold. EDI referred to this practice as a 'clear misuse of power'.

The data provider added that by asking redistributors to list their end clients CME Group could also charge end-users, which would negatively impact small and mid-size data vendors or cut them out of the market altogether.

The Commodity Futures Trading Commission (CFTC), the head of committees of the US House of Representatives, and the US Senate are among those that EDI has written to requesting an investigation into the fees changes by CME.

"CME Group regularly reviews its market data policies and pricing to ensure costs are aligned with the value of services our market data customers receive and expect," CME told The TRADE in response to the development.

"Vendors who are licensed to redistribute our historical data are free to give it away at no charge, price it as they see fit, or even distribute as part of a service they offer. This policy has not changed; the difference going forward is that vendors will be required to pay CME Group a redistribution fee to do so."

The issue of market data fee changes has caused an ongoing and growing divide between exchanges and the investment banks, broker-dealers, and trading firms that consume their data.

In June, US exchanges Nasdaq and the New York Stock Exchange (NYSE) managed to successfully appeal a controversial ruling in 2018 from the Securities and Exchanges Commission (SEC) that said they had failed to justify an increase in data fees.

EDI chief executive, Jonathan Bloch, added CME Groups proposed changes were an example of 'monopolistic' behaviours from exchanges that would put unfair financial pressure on vendors already struggling because of the pandemic.

"The CME's actions have not received much scrutiny from the regulators, certainly when compared to the regulation of fees imposed by the securities exchanges," said Bloch.

"As a result, the cost of obtaining data from the commodities exchanges will be exponentially higher. This is clearly anti-competitive, anti-trust, and according to our legal advisors, illegal. This must not be allowed to happen."

WSJ: Brent Crude Rises Above $50 as Oil's Turnaround Continues

Thursday's advance continues a monthslong rebound from oil's April lows around $19 a barrel during global economic shutdowns

By Amrith Ramkumar

Brent crude prices topped $50 a barrel for the first time since early March on Thursday, the latest milestone in a remarkable oil-market recovery fueled by supply curtailments and drivers returning to the road.

The global gauge of oil prices advanced 2.8% to $50.25 a barrel, continuing a monthslong rebound from its April lows around $19 during global economic shutdowns. While Brent started the year above $65, its recent rally shows how hopes for coronavirus-vaccine distribution and economic-stimulus programs are helping to heal global energy markets.

Oil has risen in tandem with stocks and other commodities in recent weeks, part of a broad market rally fueled by investors' anticipation for a 2021 global economic resurgence. Buoyant demand from China also is boosting oil prices after the world's largest commodity consumer largely contained the pandemic.

Traders are now hoping that travel picks up in the U.S. and Europe next year, boosting energy consumption while large suppliers in the Organization of the Petroleum Exporting Countries remain disciplined with production cuts.

OPEC and allies including Russia agreed to modest output increases last week, instilling faith that the group won't bring back supply too quickly and adding momentum to the oil-price rally. Recent gains come despite a recent surge in coronavirus cases around the world and data showing a drop-off in U.S. fuel demand, showing how investors are looking past those concerns and instead focusing on vaccine hopes.

"It's been that inflection point that turned everything," said Rebecca Babin, senior energy trader at CIBC Private Wealth Management. Upbeat vaccine trial results are pushing traders to buy when prices fall, a reversal from earlier in the year, she said.

U.S. crude futures added 2.8% to $46.78 a barrel Thursday, also extending their recent advance.

The gains are a boon for beleaguered energy producers who have been among the sectors hardest hit by the coronavirus and been forced to slash jobs and drilling activity. The S&P 500 energy sector advanced Wednesday, lifted by companies including Exxon Mobil Corp. and Chevron Corp. Even with a roughly 35% rally since the end of September, the sector is still down more than 30% in 2020.

With U.S. stocks recently hitting records and bond yields near all-time lows, some investors are increasing their exposure to commodities and shares of producers, which remain well below recent peaks. Hedge funds and other speculative investors have lifted net bets on higher U.S. crude prices in four consecutive weeks through Dec. 1, Commodity Futures Trading Commission data show, signaling more optimism filtering through the market.

Many analysts remain wary of more volatility ahead, particularly after recent data indicating an uptick in U.S. gasoline consumption is fading. Government data released Wednesday showed a big rise in U.S. inventories as gasoline demand crumbled to its lowest level since May last week, the latest figure showing that the domestic economic recovery is slowing.

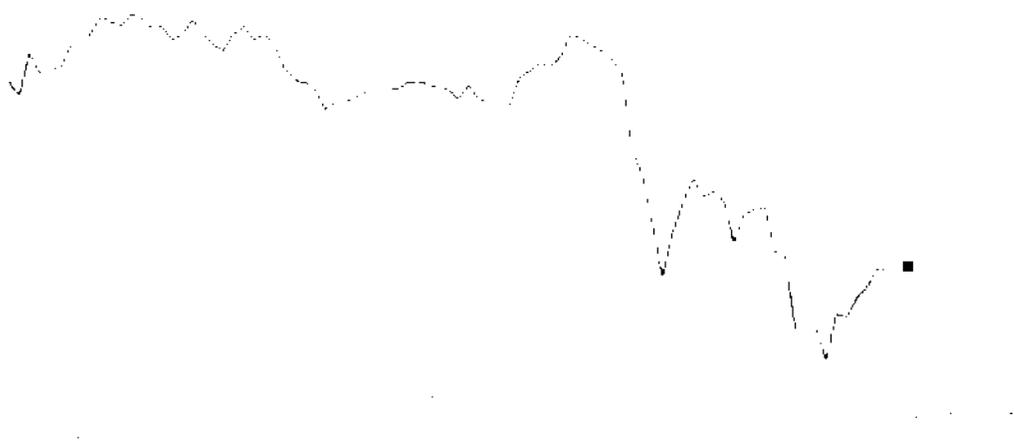

Yet oil still surged on Thursday, the latest sign that rosy demand figures from Asian consumers are offsetting weakness in other parts of the world.

"That demand is just better than we thought it would be," Ms. Babin said.

WSJ: U.S. Stock Futures Dip Amid Talk of Disruptive Brexit

Investors watch Brexit talks closely after U.K. Prime Minister Boris Johnson warned last-ditch negotiations could fail
By Will Horner

U.S. stock futures and European indexes slipped Friday as politicians signaled an increased likelihood of a disruptive break between the U.K. and European Union.

Futures tied to the S&P 500 fell 0.9% while Dow Jones Industrial Average futures declined 0.8%. Nasdaq-100 futures fell 0.9%. The moves suggest that both the S&P 500 and the Dow were on course for a third consecutive daily decline. All three indexes are on track to end the week lower.

In premarket trading, Disney was up 7%. The entertainment giant said Thursday world-wide subscriber count for its flagship streaming service Disney+ could triple to 260 million by 2024.

In Europe, the Stoxx Europe 600 fell 1.4% after U.K. Prime Minister Boris Johnson said there was a "strong possibility" that efforts to reach a last-minute deal on trade with the EU would fail. European Commission President Ursula von der Leyen cautioned Friday that "positions remain apart on fundamental issues." The British pound fell 0.9% against the dollar to $1.3181.

"We've been thinking for a long time that these comments are a negotiating tactic and that it is important for both sides to get a deal," said Seema Shah, chief strategist at Principal Global Advisors. "But we've seen concerns starting to creep in this week that if the gap is too wide between the two sides then maybe it can't be breached."

The U.K.'s current commercial and trading ties with the EU expire on Jan 1. Intensive talks are meant to take place this weekend. If a deal can't be struck, both sides are preparing for significant border disruption affecting trade worth close to $900 billion a year. A hard split between the U.K. and EU could pile on pain to a global economy that has already been reeling this year under the stress of Covid-19.

While negotiations would likely go down to the wire, investors are largely betting on a last-minute compromise, said Alfat Kassam, head of investment strategy at State Street Global Advisors in Europe.

"We do think that politicians are economically pragmatic and a last-minute save is on the card," he said.

U.K. banks, seen as most exposed, led losses among European financials. NatWest Group fell 6.1%, Barclays was down 4.5% and Lloyds Banking Group was 4.6% lower.

Also weighing on markets: U.S. talks on a Covid-19 relief package faced fresh setbacks. After signs of progress amid a bipartisan push for a roughly $900 billion stimulus deal, Senate Republicans suggested Thursday that they couldn't accept some aspects of the proposals.

Investors have largely priced in a stimulus deal, said Jeff Mills, chief investment officer of Bryn Mawr Trust, meaning negative news could have more of an impact than positive news.

"There is a nontrivial chance that we get a deal in the coming weeks," said Mr. Mills. "If it doesn't come by late January, when the new congress is sworn in, then I think we could see markets starting to get a bit nervous."

Despite lingering concerns about weak growth, stimulus talks and the pandemic, investors are betting that widespread rollout of Covid-19 vaccines could be well under way by next year.

Vaccines are “giving markets the possibility to look through the negative noise,” said Ms. Shah. “A lot of investors are looking through to a six month horizon where they can see things getting back to normal.”

A Food and Drug Administration panel Thursday recommended approving a Covid-19 vaccine developed by Pfizer and BioNTech, paving the way for the FDA to grant emergency-use authorization as early as Friday.

In Europe, shares of Ericsson fell 6.7% after filing a lawsuit against Samsung alleging the South Korean company had violated contractual commitments and warned that legal costs could cost it up to 1.5 billion Swedish kronor, equivalent to $177.2 million, a quarter. Shares of Rolls-Royce Holdings fell 8.3% after the engine maker warned that it continued to suffer from reduced air travel.

Investors later in the day will parse figures from University of Michigan consumer confidence survey, for clues on whether positive news on Covid-19 vaccines has lifted sentiment. The data are due at 10 a.m. ET. Economists expect the university's consumer confidence index to fall to 75.5 from 77.0 in October.

Data from the Bureau of Labor Statistics on the cost of goods sold by producers last month will also be released at 8:30 a.m. ET. The Producer Price Index is forecast to have risen by a modest 0.1% in November.

In Asia, stocks were mostly lower with the Nikkei 225 closing down 0.4% and the Shanghai Composite Index ending the day down 0.8%.

FT: Banks Lead European Stocks Lower As UK-EU Trade Concerns Mount

British lenders fall more than 5% as leaders warn 'no deal' likely

By Naomi Rovnick

European stocks fell further on Friday after strong warnings from EU and UK leaders that trade talks might fail to produce an agreement, with London-listed bank and travel-related shares bearing the brunt of the selling.

The Stoxx 600 was down 1.2 per cent by lunchtime in London after European Commission president Ursula von der Leyen told EU leaders that a no-deal outcome was the most probable scenario from the trade talks. This followed a similar statement from UK prime minister Boris Johnson on Thursday evening, after last-minute discussions between Westminster and Brussels stumbled on disagreements about competition laws and fishing rights.

The FTSE 350 index of bank shares fell 2.7 per cent. Lloyds and NatWest, two retail banking groups with a large domestic bias, suffered heavy sell-offs. NatWest's 7 per cent fall put it on track for its worst day of trading since June, while Lloyds' 5 per cent drop was its deepest since July.

Meanwhile, aeroplane engine maker Rolls-Royce dropped 7 per cent and British Airways owner IAG lost 4 per cent of its value.

Markets were potentially overreacting, said Peter Westaway, chief European economist at Vanguard, because there was “little upside” for the UK economy if a trade deal were to be agreed.

“The deal that is being discussed would be a bare bones trading arrangement,” he said. “We are going into a much less harmonious world whatever happens.”

The pound fell 0.8 per cent against the dollar, taking its drop for the week to 1.9 per cent, heading for its worst performance since September. The week’s political developments have driven the currency’s implied one-month volatility to its highest since March’s market tumult.

The pound’s weakness softened the fall of the UK’s FTSE 100 — which is stacked with dollar earners — to 1 per cent, and Germany’s Xetra Dax fell 1.7 per cent.

Most analysts and investors still believe some form of deal can be reached before the Brexit transition period expires at the end of the month. “Our base case remains that a deal is more likely than not,” strategists at Credit Suisse said.

“Market expectations are around 60-40 that there will be a deal,” said Jason Borbora-Sheen, multi-asset portfolio manager at fund manager Ninety One.

“The way this wrangling plays out is either very last minute or with extended deadlines. It’s in no one’s interest to storm off, so I think it will ultimately resolve itself.”

Piling the pressure on the pound and UK lenders were remarks made by Andrew Bailey, Bank of England governor, that it was undertaking “extensive work” on how to implement negative interest rates. Mr Bailey made the comments following the BoE’s release of its latest financial stability report.

The prospect of another UK rate cut prompted a further rally in British government debt, sending the yield on UK 10-year sovereign bonds down 0.04 percentage points to 0.16 per cent. Gilts are on track for their best weekly performance since March.

Brent crude slipped 0.2 per cent by Friday lunchtime, after the international oil benchmark on Thursday rose above $50 for the first time since March, supported by progress on coronavirus vaccines.

Futures markets signalled the S&P 500 would fall 0.7 per cent when New York opens for trade later in the day.

WSJ: Metals Markets Steel for Price Rises as Australia Pushes to Save Cultural Sites

Delays to mining projects in Western Australia could push commodity prices higher and exacerbate shortages

By Rhiannon Hoyle

Rio Tinto RIO 2.20% PLC's destruction of two ancient caves in Australia to expand an iron-ore mine could have ramifications for global commodity markets if local lawmakers intensify scrutiny of mining activities that threaten heritage sites.

Among the most controversial recommendations made by a federal-government inquiry into the destruction of the rock shelters at Juukan Gorge in Western Australia in May is a moratorium on expansions of existing mines or new pits that encroach on sites of cultural or historical significance. Even if lawmakers opt for a less hard-line approach, experts warn of potential delays to production and higher costs that could affect supply of key raw materials such as iron ore, used to make steel.

None of the recommendations handed down by the inquiry in its interim report on Wednesday are binding, but miners risk inflaming tensions with some investors who feel the industry needs to show greater sensitivity to environmental and cultural issues if they don't accept them. They also face sensitive negotiations with indigenous groups that are the traditional owners of the land.

Metals prices have been rallying as China's economy bounces back strongly and other major markets recover from the coronavirus crisis. Copper prices have risen to their highest level in almost eight years. Iron ore is one of the best-performing assets this year, fetching $150.75 a metric ton on Wednesday, its highest price since early 2013.

China's unexpectedly strong appetite for these commodities has raised concerns over whether there is enough supply, with many analysts predicting market deficits for iron ore and copper through at least the middle of next year.

Delays to mining projects in Western Australia, where companies dig up metals including copper and gold, could push commodity prices higher and exacerbate shortages already worsened by pandemic-driven disruptions to operations elsewhere. Iron ore is considered to be most at risk because Australia accounts for more than half of the world's trade in the commodity by sea.

"This could be a watershed moment for the Western Australia mining industry and could impact Western Australia iron-ore production, and possibly other commodities, in 2021 and beyond," Goldman Sachs said.

Already there are tensions between miners and some investors following the report into the loss of the Juukan caves, which contained a trove of artifacts that indicated they had been occupied by humans more than 46,000 years ago.

Fortescue Metals Ltd. , the world's fourth-largest iron-ore exporter by volume, rejected the idea of a voluntary moratorium on new heritage consents. "We do not believe that this is either a feasible or practical solution," Elizabeth Gaines, Fortescue's chief executive, said.

Fortescue said it had worked with indigenous groups to protect and avoid nearly 6,000 heritage sites threatened by its mining activities.

Miners must balance the need to replace the ore that they unearth with respecting the interests of indigenous groups. Fortescue pointed out that the iron-ore industry has been a pillar of Australia's economy as it emerges from a first recession in 29 years.

"A moratorium would unnecessarily stall mining, infrastructure and other activities for an unknown and possibly extended period," said Tania Constable, chief executive of Minerals Council of Australia, an industry group.

Still, many investors feel the industry needs to do more, and have pushed for leadership changes when standards fall short. Rio Tinto Chief Executive Jean-Sébastien Jacques and two other executives were ousted after several investors criticized the company's initial response to the caves' destruction because no one had been held accountable.

Hesta, an Australian pension fund for health-care workers, said it strongly supports the recommendation that companies with existing heritage approvals, known as Section 18 permissions, suspend related works until they can verify consent by traditional landowners.

"The inescapable findings of the inquiry are that Aboriginal heritage sites remain vulnerable to destruction," said Debby Blakey, Hesta's chief executive. "It would be unacceptable to investors that boards of mining companies are not actively and transparently seeking to understand their exposure to this risk."

Kim Christie, an iron-ore analyst at Wood Mackenzie, said a near-term squeeze on commodities supply from Australia isn't likely. The final report from the inquiry won't be completed until next year. Still, there is a risk of higher mining costs and delays to expansions or new mines later as miners sharpen their focus on heritage issues and consultation with traditional owners, she said.

“Certainly moving forward if there is going to be that greater level of tightness [in supply] it could support prices higher than we otherwise would have thought,” Ms. Christie said.

Scrutiny will especially fall on Rio Tinto. A moratorium on new heritage consents could affect up to 12 projects that Rio Tinto has planned over the next five or so years to maintain its iron-ore production at current rates, Goldman Sachs said. That means there is a risk that Rio Tinto won't ship 327 million tons of iron ore next year as the bank had earlier forecast.

Rio Tinto said it is reassessing its mining operations in places with identified heritage sites that could be affected over the coming two years.

“I think Rio Tinto would rather forgo a few tons than their reputation,” said Ms. Christie, of Wood Mackenzie.

FT: Pound Slides as Brussels Warns ‘No Deal’ Is Most Likely Brexit Outcome

Sterling on track for worst performance since September as European Commission president offers gloomy assessment
By Jim Brunsten and Naomi Rovnick

The pound dropped on Friday as Brussels told EU leaders that no-deal appears to be the most likely outcome of trade talks with the UK, echoing a warning from Boris Johnson.

Sterling slipped 0.6 per cent against the dollar to $1.3216, taking its loss this week to 1.6 per cent — putting the currency on track for its worst performance since September.

The slide came as Ursula von der Leyen, European Commission president, told an EU summit on Friday that there was a “higher probability” that talks would fail rather than succeed, although she did not want to give a percentage, according to people briefed on the presentation.

Her gloomy assessment in Brussels echoed a warning on Thursday from UK prime minister Mr Johnson that there was a “strong possibility” talks would fail because Brussels wanted to keep the country “locked in the EU’s orbit”.

Mr Johnson’s visit to the Belgian capital earlier this week failed to yield a breakthrough. Although both sides have given negotiators until Sunday to try to engineer a breakthrough, one ally of Mr Johnson said: “They aren’t moving at all. It’s screwed.”

Failure in the trade negotiations would bring with it economic upheaval, including the introduction of tariffs on EU-UK trade after the end of the Brexit transition period on December 31, which would strike an especially hard blow to agriculture.

But it is an outcome that both sides say they are prepared to accept if a compromise cannot be found on the central sticking point of how to ensure fair competition between companies.

The EU has insisted that any deal must guarantee a “level playing field” that endures over time. It has proposed that either side should be allowed to reduce access to its market if EU and UK rules in areas such as environmental law diverge to a point where companies are placed at a competitive disadvantage.

But Mr Johnson has said the plans amount to an attempt by Brussels to force the UK to continue to follow its regulations.

“They’ve brought back the idea of equivalence between the UK and the EU,” the prime minister said in a Downing Street TV clip on Thursday. “Basically that means that whatever new laws they brought in we would have to follow, or else face punishment, sanctions, tariffs, whatever,” he added.

An EU official said that Ms von der Leyen made clear at the summit that the situation was difficult and that the “main obstacles remain”. The commission president was debriefing leaders on her Wednesday dinner with Mr Johnson, an encounter that it had been hoped would give talks fresh momentum.

She said that negotiations would resume today in Brussels between EU chief negotiator Michel Barnier and his UK counterpart, David Frost.

Trade experts insist that, despite the dire warnings from both sides, there is in principal a compromise zone to be explored between Britain's position — a willingness to pledge not to water down regulatory standards as they stand at the end of its Brexit transition period — and the EU's quest to future-proof any trade deal.

The consensus among market analysts and investors remains that some form of deal can still be sealed.

Sterling could suffer further if a deal is not agreed, said Mark Haefele, chief investment officer at UBS Global Wealth Management. "But next week remains in play, and our base case is that a deal will be reached," he added.

EU leaders devoted only a few minutes to Brexit at their meeting, with no discussion after Ms von der Leyen's presentation. French president Emmanuel Macron, German chancellor Angela Merkel and other heads of government spent the entire night debating the bloc's future climate policy after Poland raised objections to new targets.

The summit, which began on Thursday, is the leaders' last scheduled meeting of 2020, with issues including eurozone reform, the EU budget and future relations with Turkey also on the agenda.

Risk.Net: Cross-Currency Swaps Will Use RFRs on Both Legs, says JP Exec

Despite slow start, all-RFR swaps will become the market standard within a year, according to Tom Prickett Ben St.
By Ben St.

Clair Intercontinental Exchange (Ice) View more Cross-currency swap markets have yet to embrace alternative risk-free rates (RFRs), such as the US secured overnight financing rate (SOFR), but these overnight benchmarks will become the standard on both legs of a trade by the end of next year, according to a senior JP Morgan rates trader.

Months after the first RFR-linked cross-currency swaps were struck across various currency pairs, reported volumes remain sparse, with the majority of volume still transacted using Libor rates on both legs of the trade.

"So far, cross-currency markets have not really changed. You are still transacting 99% Libor/Libor swaps," said Tom Prickett, co-head of rates trading for Europe, the Middle East and Africa at JP Morgan, speaking at Risk.net's Libor Telethon on December 8.

Only 21 cross-currency swaps referencing SOFR – totalling less than $1 billion in notional – have been reported to the Depository Trust & Clearing Corporation's (DTCC) trade repository, which captures trades involving at least one US-regulated firm.

The first recorded trade hit the market in November 2019 and involved a cross between SOFR and the euro short-term rate (€STR), Europe's RFR. Since then, SOFR-based cross-currency swaps have been recorded against a number of overnight rates, including Sonia; the Canadian overnight repo rate average; and the Hong Kong Dollar Overnight Index Average. A SOFR versus fixed trade was also struck in April, where the fixed leg was denominated in onshore renminbi.

The first recorded Libor-versus-SOFR cross-currency trade was struck in December 2019, using Australia's Bank Bill Swap Rate.

But despite the slow start, JP Morgan's Prickett is optimistic the market will move to using RFRs for cross-currency swaps, starting with the interdealer broker market, which he said already has screens displaying quotes for RFR-linked crosses.

Despite the disjointed timetable of benchmark reform across some jurisdictions, Prickett said there was little interest in the interdealer market to trade cross-currency swaps referencing Libor on one leg and an RFR on the other, and that the market will coalesce around using RFR rates on both legs of a cross-currency swap.

Ice Benchmark Administration, which oversees the Libor fixings in London, announced in November that it would consult on the planned cessation of sterling, euro, Swiss franc, Japanese yen and one-week and two-month US dollar Libor fixings at the end of 2021. The remaining five US dollar settings, however, would continue to be published for an additional 18 months, the consultation proposes.

While certain US dollar Libor tenors have a short reprieve, regulators are clear that market participants should not enter new positions referencing the benchmark after 2021, meaning the market will have to transition over to SOFR in the meantime.

For swaps with euro legs, Prickett said that while Euribor is staying around in the medium term, €STR will most likely end up being the standard benchmark.

“It seems very clear to me that [an RFR versus RFR swap] will be the standard product that is traded in the brokers, even when you have a currency like euros where there’s still an existing Ibor that is the most liquid product in the interest rate swap market,” he said.

As the interbank market becomes comfortable with trading RFR cross-currency basis swaps, the products will become “the standard cross-currency risk management tool by the end of next year”, said Prickett, especially as debt issuance linked to these alternative rates increases, along with client demand to cross-currency swap exposures back to their home currencies.

For legacy trades, the possibility that Libor fixings in different currencies and tenors would cease publication at separate times had already been a point of concern for cross-currency swap traders. Different cessation announcements will lead to differences in fallback periods and situations where the fallback spread – a median difference between the designated risk-free rate and Libor – is known for one leg and not for the other.

Speaking on the Libor telethon, the Financial Conduct Authority’s director of markets and wholesale policy, Edwin Schooling Latter, said the regulator could officially announce that all Libor currencies and tenors will cease – including the lagging US dollar tenors – at the same time, triggering all the fallbacks at once. But he did not say explicitly that this was the plan.

If the cessation announcements for the remaining US dollar Libor tenors are delayed, this could create issues in the cross-currency swap market, given a vast majority of the market’s $26 trillion notional includes a US dollar leg, according to data of outstanding nationals published by the Bank for International Settlements.

Elsewhere, Prickett said trading in the underlying SOFR swaps market also has a way to go, even if “meaningful progress” has been made. The recent discounting switch, which saw CME and LCH change the rate used for valuing future cashflows and calculating interest on cash collateral from federal funds to SOFR in mid-October, was another milestone for the transition.

The market initially saw a surge of trading after the switch, but the growth rate has fallen since. Volumes have remained elevated, though – the week ending December 6 saw $42 billion in notional traded, compared with $26 billion the week ending the Sunday before the discounting switch, according to data from DTCC.

Activity in the interdealer market has focused mainly on fed-funds/SOFR basis swaps, he said. “You can generally hedge whatever you need to particularly up to 10 years,” said Prickett, but liquidity further along the curve can be more challenging.

“I think the big bang was a point that we all hoped would really see a bit of a step-change in usage, and probably it’s fair to say that didn’t happen,” he added.

MLex: Brexit Disruption to Financial Services Can't Be Ruled Out, BOE's Bailey Says

By Fiona Maxwell

Financial services may see some disruption from next year after the UK’s Brexit transition period expires, Bank of England Governor Andrew Bailey acknowledged today, but he ruled out risks to financial stability arising.

Bailey told a press conference today that “I can’t give you assurance” that there won’t be disruption for customers transactions across borders as he questioned how large an impact there would be from Brussels not granting EU member states access to London’s markets.

“London is a global financial center — it has been for a long time and will continue to be so. I would have thought it would be in the best interest of people in the EU to have access to that global financial center — but they have to decide that.”

Bailey’s comments came as officials in the UK and EU have warned of wider political negotiations of failing to reach an agreement on a trade deal (see here).

In the financial-services world, the UK has told parties that if they depend on access to the bloc's financial system then "we're not going to put any roadblocks in your way to ensure you've got continuity," Bailey said.

But the EU has not reciprocated, with just two access arrangements put in place from Jan. 1, or equivalence decisions which deem the UK's rulebook as stringent as Brussels legislation.

"The EU haven't matched us in that respect. What I can't say to citizens and the rest of the EU is that if you've got that sort of arrangement and you've been depending on it, if you've got an insurance contract in London, if you're making a payment to an institution in the UK, I can't give assurance there won't be some form of disruption because we're not in control of that end of it," Bailey said.

"I don't want to overdramatize this because it's not about financial stability really. But it is about the access of people to financial services that they quite reasonably depended on and relied on," he added.

Bailey stopped short of predicting how the markets might respond to Brexit in whatever form it comes from January, but noted the BOE's response to market disruption at the height of the Covid-19 shock in March.

"I'm not predicting that will happen again, but I'm using it as a benchmark. What has the Bank of England got in its armory? The answer is a lot. We will use our tools as we did in March, should we be in that situation," Bailey said. "We have a very substantial array of responses we can make. Of course in any situation like that we'll put them to work."

— Derivatives —

Should no trade deal be agreed between the UK and EU, that would be "not news" for the BOE in terms of the preparations it has been making for the last three years, said Jon Cunliffe, a deputy governor.

Although "you can never be entirely sure what will happen in markets," the BOE has "looked closely where the disruptions might come and do they rise to the level of financial stability and the evidence we have is that they don't," Cunliffe added.

While financial stability risks can be ruled out from any form of Brexit, market disruption may still arise, particularly given the lack of equivalence arrangements offered to the UK from Brussels.

One such area raised as a concern by the BOE is a regulatory obligation for some derivatives users to trade on a platform. Absent an equivalence decision, some institutions will be subject to duplicative and conflicting obligations, and trading in some circumstances may be forced to move to the US (see here).

In a report from the BOE's Financial Policy Committee today, officials noted the 200 billion pounds of derivatives trading that is caught up by the trading obligation (see here), with Cunliffe acknowledging the impact the lack of equivalence could have particularly for the branches of EU banks located in the UK who are subject both to the UK and EU's Derivatives Trading Obligations.

"For that subset, as things stand they won't be able to trade in the EU but also won't be able to trade in the UK and they will have to use third-country jurisdictions, particularly the US [platforms] which have been recognized by the UK and EU. The disruption is really primarily in that area," Cunliffe said.

Financial institutions have been preparing this disruption, he said. "But the question is whether that will work smoothly if things continue and the approach continues in that sense."

WSJ: SEC Enforcement Chief to Depart as Regulator Prepares for Turnover

Fines rose during Stephanie Avakian's tenure; move will allow Biden to put stamp on agency
By Dave Michaels

The Securities and Exchange Commission's top enforcement official will step down this month after four years in the role, a move that allows the incoming Biden administration to put its own stamp on Wall Street policing.

Stephanie Avakian, who joined the SEC as its second-ranking enforcement official during the Obama administration and took the top job in 2017, will exit from the agency by the end of December, she said. She will be succeeded on an acting basis by Marc Berger, a former federal prosecutor in Manhattan and former head of the SEC's New York office.

Ms. Avakian and her former co-director, Steven Peikin, who stepped down in August, oversaw a program that ramped up fines for conduct that harmed individual investors, including hundreds of cases against investment advisers who picked costly mutual funds when cheaper ones were available.

The SEC also brought dozens of enforcement actions during her tenure against startups that raised money by selling new cryptocurrencies while skirting investor-protection laws. The SEC's crackdown on digital coins chilled the nascent industry and prompted a backlash from parts of Silicon Valley, but regulators were largely successful in court battles with cryptocurrency developers.

SEC enforcement fines rose during Ms. Avakian's tenure, despite initial concerns that a Republican-led SEC would water down enforcement. A handful of cases with outsize fines, such as a $200 million agreement announced Wednesday with General Electric Co. , typically accounted for a high share of annual penalties, showing how an emphasis on certain types of investigations can influence the SEC's statistics.

The median fine in market-regulatory enforcement cases rose to $435,000 in 2019, the second-highest level in the past 20 years, according to the Committee on Capital Markets Regulation, a research organization based in Cambridge, Mass. That measure includes fines imposed by the Commodity Futures Trading Commission, a smaller agency that polices derivatives markets.

SEC Chairman Jay Clayton has said he will step down by the end of the year. Former SEC commissioners Kara Stein and Robert Jackson Jr., as well as former CFTC Chairman Gary Gensler, are seen as possible successors under the Biden administration.

The Biden administration is expected to put additional focus on Wall Street businesses such as private equity and more scrutiny on how companies disclose their future costs and other risks related to climate change. But the agency's enforcement program brings many of the same types of cases from year to year, given the high volume of cases regulators settle and the tens of thousands of tips they get annually.

During Ms. Avakian's tenure, the SEC quickly resolved a major enforcement action against Tesla Inc. and its chief executive, Elon Musk, which each paid $20 million to settle claims that Mr. Musk misled investors about taking Tesla private.

The SEC sued Tesla and Mr. Musk within two months of Mr. Musk's tweets about going private, and the case was settled weeks after the lawsuit was filed. Under the agreement, Mr. Musk also agreed to step down as Tesla's chairman and limit his use of Twitter.

The Tesla investigation and court case proceeded at warp speed for the SEC, which typically takes years to wrap up investigations. Another significant case, a probe of German luxury car maker BMW AG's U.S. sales volumes, was finished in 10 months.

SEC investigations still take, on average, about two years from start to finish, according to agency figures.

Ms. Avakian, who also worked at the SEC earlier in her legal career, said she stressed the need to speed up investigations and settlement negotiations. Enforcement attorneys were urged to move fast by insisting on fines that reflect what they think a case merits, instead of engaging in drawn-out negotiations, she said in an interview.

"This enables us to credibly say, 'If you don't come to the table on these terms, we are going to move forward against you' " with a lawsuit, Ms. Avakian said.

Mr. Peikin left the SEC in August and returned to his former law firm, Sullivan & Cromwell LLP. Ms. Avakian said she hasn't interviewed for any other jobs and doesn't know yet what she will do next.

CoinDesk: SEC Enforcement Director to Step Down by End of Year

By Danny Nelson

Stephanie Avakian, the U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission (SEC) enforcement director who led investigations since 2017, including during the entirety of SEC's initial coin offering (ICO) crackdown, plans to leave the agency this year.

SEC said Thursday that Avakian created the Cyber Unit responsible for managing crypto-related securities violations, especially the ICO projects that attempt to raise capital without filing.

A CoinDesk review of SEC enforcement filings shows the regulator initiated at least 46 actions against ICOs during Avakian's tenure as director.

Avakian took over the Enforcement Division in June 2017. She had previously served as deputy enforcement director from June 2014.

BNN Bloomberg: Yellen Gets a Shot to Throw Treasury's Clout into Climate Fight

By Saleha Mohsin and Jennifer A. Dlouhy

Janet Yellen has promised to make fighting climate change a priority as Treasury secretary, spurring hope among activists she will put the issue at the center of U.S. economic policy for the first time.

Yellen, President-elect Joe Biden's nominee to lead the Treasury Department, has already endorsed a tax on carbon dioxide emissions and urged countries to set up independent councils that can pursue aggressive climate policies without political interference.

Advocates are appealing for her to go even further if confirmed, seizing her role as one of the most powerful people in finance to wield fiscal policy in the campaign against global warming. Some have outlined plans for how Yellen could trigger tighter regulation of oil and gas company finances under the Dodd-Frank Act -- even going so far as to require them to sell off fossil fuel assets.

"Yellen will have the power to help move trillions of dollars out of fossil fuels and trillions more into renewables," said Jamie Henn, director of the non-profit advocacy group Fossil Free Media. "She could do more for the Green New Deal than nearly any other cabinet position."

Yellen declined to be interviewed for this article. Biden's transition team said the incoming administration intends to turn the threat of climate change into a way to bolster the economy and create jobs.

Yellen's Treasury Department is expected to play a central role in that effort by helping shape stimulus spending to pull the U.S. out of recession and fulfill Biden's promise to invest as much as $2 trillion on clean energy.

Both Biden and Yellen's ambitions for big clean-energy spending could be constrained by Congress, where Republicans will hold at least 50 seats in the Senate. Conservatives have assailed congressional Democrats' ambitions for a wave of spending to propel clean power and energy efficiency, including through expanded tax cuts and investments, as a socialist wish list.

Clinton Administration

Yellen's interest in addressing climate change dates to her time in the Clinton administration, when she was the head of the Council of Economic Advisers. And she doesn't mince words about the threat.

"It will have absolutely devastating consequences for humanity if we don't address it, and time is running out to take the steps that are necessary," she said in an October interview with Bloomberg News.

Climate change is already affecting energy investments, raising the risk that oil, gas and coal reserves will lose value or be barred from development as governments clamp down on the greenhouse gas emissions generated by burning fossil fuels. Even non-energy investments in commercial buildings and real estate are at greater peril with the encroachment of rising seas and more intense storms fueled by climate change.

Yellen "understands the critical links between the country's economic health and climate change," said Andrew Steer, president of the World Resources Institute. As Treasury chief, "Yellen would have strong authority to bring climate risks and opportunities more centrally into U.S. economic and financial systems."

Progressive Democrats argue that enlisting the Treasury Department in the battle against climate change is consistent with Biden's plan to take a whole-of-government approach to the issue.

"The private sector won't take this seriously unless the government takes a stand," said Rhiana Gunn-Wright of the Roosevelt Institute.

Congressional Role

Critics of the approach say Congress -- not the Treasury Department -- should take the lead in addressing climate change and the financial risks it poses.

"Significant new policy, like that addressing climate, shouldn't be set by financial policy or any other statute that was never intended to address such a major issue," said Kyle Isakower, a senior vice president at the American Council for Capital Formation, a free-market think tank. With legislation specifically designed to address the risks of climate change, "financial policy can play an appropriate role."

Any aggressive moves would invite conflict with the U.S. oil and gas industry, which is already bracing for the Biden administration to tighten environmental mandates on drilling and block development on federal lands.

Some options, such as greater capital holding requirements for banks that have fossil investments, are "a terrible idea," said Norbert Michel, director of Heritage Foundation's Center for Data Analysis.

"If we are going to talk about a climate disaster where the Earth burns up, a bank holding an extra 2% capital or not lending to certain companies isn't going to change that," Michel said.

The Treasury Department can have global influence by charting new climate finance strategies through the Group of 20, the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank. Financing can be directed toward emissions-lowering projects overseas, with the Treasury encouraging the phaseout of fossil fuels subsidies as well as increased funding focused on closing coal plants.

Yellen in October joined former Bank of England Governor Mark Carney in urging governments to establish climate change councils empowered to confront the problem. The G30 Working Group led by Yellen and Carney emphasized that the scale of the challenge "means that carbon prices alone are not enough," and must be buttressed by investments in low-carbon infrastructure and clean energy research.

Yellen can start by simply addressing the issue -- making the case to American workers and businesses that climate policies "can spur economic growth, ensure strong employment and resilient financial markets," Duke University's Tim Profeta and former White House officials Joseph Aldy and Himamauli Das wrote in a 24-page memo for the Biden-Harris transition.

"The secretary of the Treasury and the Treasury Department are crucial to the success of the administration's efforts to move the U.S. and global economy to a low-carbon trajectory and to protect the economy from climate change shocks," the three wrote in their blueprint for the agency.

Activists say one key platform Yellen will have is as head of the Financial Stability Oversight Council, which brings together the Fed, Securities and Exchange Commission, the Commodity Futures Trading Commission and other agencies. The panel can direct individual agencies and regulators to better address specific risks, such as global warming.

FSOC is "supposed to be a mechanism to force financial regulators to do their job" and address "emerging risks" and get "the entire financial system to focus on those, to regulate them better," said Graham Steele, director of Stanford University's Corporations and Society Initiative.

As Treasury chief, Yellen could push the council to develop recommendations for climate-focused financial regulatory reform and regulations. She also could encourage the FSOC to label oil and gas companies as non-bank systemically important financial institutions, or SIFIs, a designation that would trigger enhanced regulation and supervision by the Fed.

The Dodd-Frank Act requires the Fed to craft "enhanced prudential standards" for any designated non-bank SIFIs, and the council has the authority to recommend what the standards should be.

Applying such a designation could allow the Fed to require stress testing on the oil and gas industry -- with company portfolios evaluated under scenarios involving strict greenhouse gas emissions limits or rapid global temperature change.

The Fed could use the findings to set capital limits and restrict fossil fuel investments on the basis of their prospective risks to financial security.

The idea has gotten a boost from corporate watchdogs and environmental activists, including the Evergreen Action group founded by former aides to Washington State Governor Jay Inslee's presidential campaign.

"The Treasury Department has the power to disentangle our financial system from fossil fuel investments which put us all at risk, make substantive green investments and stabilize our financial system," Evergreen Action said in a policy memo.

The Federal Reserve Bank is taking steps to address the issue, with a Federal Reserve Bank of San Francisco conference last year, and in November, the Fed's first-ever declaration that climate change poses a risk to financial stability.

Yellen, a former Fed chair who understands that governments and companies prefer certainty, said in the Bloomberg News interview that a "predictable path" is the best course.

It's "not saying we need to tear down every power plant that still uses coal," she said. "But when new power plants are built the incentives need to be there to do something that's emits fewer greenhouse gases."

lending to businesses and households during a severe recession." However, due to "material uncertainty" regarding the "trajectory of the economic recovery and its effects on the financial health of banking organizations," the Board required the firms to resubmit their capital plans and limited capital distributions in the third and fourth quarters. The Fed observes that, while net income declined in 2020, firms reduced net common capital distributions and retained more of that income, and finds that the Board's capital distribution restrictions, "[c]ombined with firms' voluntary capital distribution reductions, . . . helped to maintain, and slightly increase, aggregate capital levels during a year in which firms also built loss absorbing capacity by more than doubling loan-loss reserves." Although the Fed reports that projected losses under both new hypothetical scenarios exceed $600 billion (approximately $79 billion higher than in the June 2020 stress test under the "severely adverse" scenario), it concludes that the "large reserve buildup during the first half of the year helped cushion some of the increase in losses, and all firms remain above their minimum risk-based capital requirements." In particular, the Fed's model projections for the "severely adverse" scenario are characterized by "severe decline in global economic activity accompanied by financial market distress" and include: (1) aggregate losses over the projection horizon of $629 billion, including $514 billion in accrual loan portfolio losses; (2) $95 billion in "trading and counterparty losses" at the 13 firms with "substantial trading, processing, or custodial operations"; and (3) aggregate projected pre-provision net revenue of $371 billion. Notwithstanding general improvements in macroeconomic and financial conditions since June 2020, the Fed notes that, because "future economic conditions and the ultimate path of the current recovery remain uncertain," it is extending its limits on capital distributions into Q1 2021, "with certain modifications." Specifically, the Board is authorizing each U.S. bank holding company (BHC) to: (1) pay common stock dividends and make share repurchases that, "in the aggregate, do not exceed an amount equal to the average of the firm's net income for the four preceding calendar quarters" (provided that the firm does not increase the amount of its common stock dividends to be larger than the level paid in Q2 2020); (2) "make share repurchases that equal the amount of share issuances related to expensed employee compensation"; and (3) "redeem and make scheduled payments on additional tier 1 and tier 2 capital instruments." In addition, a BHC may pay common stock dividends of one cent per share if its average net income for the four preceding quarters does not exceed one cent per share. The Board's authorization is "modified" for U.S. intermediate holding companies of foreign banks due to their "unique payout behavior" where a firm's U.S. operations "tend to pay a lump sum to the parent foreign bank at the end of the year, instead of quarterly payments." Notably, "as a result of a capital plan resubmission, the Board may elect to recalculate" a firm's stress capital buffer (SCB) and must provide notice of whether the firm's SCB will be recalculated "within 75 calendar days after the date on which the capital plan is resubmitted, unless the Board provides notice to the firm that it is extending the time period." In light of the "uncertainty about future economic conditions and the ultimate path of the current recovery," the Board is extending the time period to notify firms whether their SCBs will be recalculated until March 31, 2021. THE WEEK AHEAD

(the "Further Additional Continuing Appropriations Act, 2021"), a resolution extending federal government funding through Dec. 20, 2020. Prior to the Senate's passage of the resolution, Majority Leader McConnell (R-KY) commented that, although "both sides of the aisle are firmly committed to finalizing another major pandemic rescue package for the American people," negotiators "have not yet reached a final agreement" and said "all sides feel [they are] making good progress on a major [COVID-19] relief bill that would travel with [a] full year appropriations measure." On Thursday, Leader McConnell discussed the ongoing bipartisan, bicameral negotiations relating to the "Phase IV" economic stimulus package and reported that, "in broad strokes," negotiators have "been discussing": (1) a "targeted second round" of the SBA's Paycheck Protection Program; (2) "many tens of billions of dollars for distributing vaccines, COVID testing, and equipping safe schools"; (3) "extending important unemployment programs"; (4) "more direct impact payments for individuals, plus [a] bonus for families with children"; and (5) "repurpos[ing] more than $400 billion in unspent funds which [Congress] already allocated in the CARES Act." Speaking at a press conference following the release of the Federal Open Market Committee statement and accompanying economic projections, Fed Chair Powell discussed, among other topics, the economic outlook in light of the COVID-19 pandemic and climate change. Observing that the Fed's emergency lending facilities "serve as a backstop to key credit markets and have helped to restore the flow of credit from private lenders through normal channels" and that the Fed has "deployed these lending powers to an unprecedented extent, enabled in large part by financial backing and support from Congress and the Treasury," Chair Powell stressed that, although CARES Act funds "will not be available to support new loans or new purchases of assets" after Dec. 31, Treasury "could authorize support for emerging lending facilities, if needed, through the Exchange Stabilization Fund." Asked whether the Fed would consider establishing additional "facilities, if that became necessary, without Treasury backing," he replied that the Fed "[has] the authorities [it has]" and "will use them if they're needed and if the law permits [it] to do so," but emphasized that the Board "do[es] not have any plans for the future about this." Observing that the "fiscal policy actions . . . taken thus far have made a critical difference to families, businesses, and communities across the country," he cautioned that "[i]t will take a while to get back to the levels of economic activity and employment that prevailed at the beginning of this year" and that "it may take continued support from both monetary and fiscal policy to achieve that." He added that, "with the expiration of . . . some of the unemployment benefits [and] the expiration of eviction moratoriums with the virus spreading the way it is, there's a need for households and businesses to have fiscal support" and said "that is widely understood." Asked about the Fed's decision to join the Network of Central Banks and Supervisors for the Greening of the Financial System (NFGS), Chair Powell commented that, while Congress "hasn't explicitly assigned [the Fed] or other financial regulators a role" with respect to mitigating climate risks directly, "one of [the Board's] jobs is to regulate and supervise banks and to look after the stability of the financial system," as well as to ensure "institutions will be resilient against the many risks that they face," and said

"climate change is an emerging risk to financial institutions, the financial system, and the economy." Asked whether the Treasury market can, in the long-run, "operate smoothly without some sort of active Fed presence" given the "size of government . . . borrowing" and "different regulatory changes in the financial sector," Chair Powell said he doesn't "think it's at all a foregone conclusion that there needs to be a permanent Fed presence" and that it's "not something [the Fed is] planning on or intending." He stressed, however, that regulators "need to be thoughtful about the structure of the Treasury market, and look at ways to make sure that the capacity is there for it to be handled by the private sector," noting that "this should be handled by the private sector and can be" and that "there may be a central clearing angle that would . . . net a lot of risk." The Fed announced the extension of its temporary U.S. dollar liquidity swap lines and the temporary repurchase agreement facility for foreign and international monetary authorities (FIMA repo facility) through Sept. 30, 2021. Return to Top

Rep. Shalala (D-FL) and Congressional Oversight Commission Commissioner Ramamurti sent a letter to Acting Treasury Inspector General Delmar requesting that his office "investigate the Treasury Department's process for deciding to terminate the emergency lending programs established under Section 4003" of the CARES Act and expressing concern that the agency's "decision to terminate the programs may have preceded a comprehensive legal analysis of the CARES Act's requirements." Specifically, they urge the office to "investigate the timeline and process surrounding the Treasury Department's determination that the CARES Act legally required it to terminate the emergency lending programs, including, but not limited to, when Secretary Mnuchin first requested legal advice on the matter, whether his decision to terminate the programs preceded that advice, and whether and why other Treasury Department officials believed the CARES Act programs could lawfully be extended into 2021." House Select Subcommittee on the Coronavirus Crisis Chairman Clyburn (D-SC) and House Financial Services Committee Chairwoman Waters (D-CA) sent a letter to Treasury Secretary Mnuchin requesting that he extend the Main Street Lending Program (MSLP) and Municipal Liquidity Facility (MLF) and "rescind[] [his] request to the Fed to return CARES Act funds that have already been invested in these lending facilities, consistent with [his] authority." Noting that Secretary Mnuchin has "stated that the CARES Act requires [the Treasury Secretary] to end the Fed lending facilities supported by the CARES Act by the end of 2020, and to request the return of all unused CARES Act funds," the lawmakers assert that a "new legal analysis" issued by the Congressional Research Service (CRS) "directly contradicts [his] claim." Specifically, they cite a CRS analysis finding that Section 4029(a) of the CARES Act "appears to establish only the expiration date for the Treasury Secretary's authority to make new investments of CARES Act funds" in the facilities' special purpose vehicles (SPVs) and "does not appear to impose any limitations on the Secretary's discretion to extend the operation of SPVs in which the Secretary has invested CARES Act funds" before Dec. 31, 2020. Accordingly, they urge Secretary Mnuchin to extend the MSLP and the MLF and request that he produce (1) all "legal opinions, memoranda, analyses, and guidance" and (2) all "documents and communications, including communications with the White House," regarding his "decision to terminate the emergency lending facilities" on Dec. 31, 2020, or his "request to the Fed to return CARES Act funds." Return to Top

The Fed unanimously voted to affirm the countercyclical capital buffer (CCyB) at the current level of 0%. In making this determination, the Board: (1) "followed the framework detailed in the Board's policy statement for setting the CCyB for private-sector credit exposures located in the United States"; and (2) consulted with the FDIC and OCC. The FDIC held an open meeting at which it approved, by a vote of 3 to 1 (Director Gruenberg dissenting), final rules that: (1) impose conditions and commitments with respect to transactions "result[ing] in an insured industrial bank or industrial loan company becoming a subsidiary of a company that is not subject to consolidated supervision" by the Fed; and (2) revise the FDIC's regulations governing brokered deposits. The FDIC also unanimously voted to issue: (1) a proposed rule, to be issued jointly with the Fed and OCC, that would require banking organizations to "promptly notify their primary federal regulator whenever they experience a computer-security incident that they believe in good faith could materially disrupt, degrade, or impair their operations or may threaten the financial stability of the United States"; (2) a proposed rule that would permit the FDIC, in conjunction with FinCEN, to "issue case-by-case exemptions" from suspicious activity report filing requirements to firms that "develop innovative solutions to meet Bank Secrecy Act requirements more efficiently and effectively"; and (3) a final rule amending the FDIC's debt collection procedures to "include provisions for the collection of delinquent civil money penalties." In addition, the FDIC unanimously approved final rules rescinding and removing transferred regulations governing: (1) the supervision and governance of state savings associations (SSAs)"; (2) certain "nondiscrimination requirements for [SSAs]" and expanding the applicability of FDIC regulation part 338 entitled "Fair Housing" to SSAs; (3) certain activities of subordinate organizations of SSAs; and (4) prompt corrective action (PCA) directives and enforcement at SSAs and amending sections of existing FDIC regulations regarding the "issuance and review of orders pursuant to the [PCA] provisions of the Federal Deposit Insurance Act to [clarify] that such rules apply to all insured depository institutions for which the FDIC is the appropriate Federal banking agency." More on certain of these rulemakings below. Return to Top

The FDIC adopted, by a vote of 3 to 1 (Director Gruenberg dissenting), a final rule to revise its regulations governing brokered deposits promulgated pursuant to Section 29 of the Federal Deposit Insurance Act by: (1) creating a "new framework for analyzing certain provisions of the 'deposit broker' definition, including 'facilitating' and 'primary purpose'"; (2) narrowing the definition of "deposit broker" by providing that a third party that places, or facilitates the placement of, deposits exclusively with one insured depository institution (IDI) would not be engaged in the business of placing, or facilitating the placement of, deposits; (3) expanding the availability of the "primary purpose" exception by including several bright-line tests for business relationships that qualify for the exception; and (4) establishing an application process for entities that seek a primary purpose exception but do not meet one of the "designated exceptions." The final rule differs from the FDIC's Dec. 2019_proposed rule in a number of key respects. Among other changes, the final rule: (1) includes 11 business relationships that qualify for the primary purpose exception that were not included in the proposal; and (2) eliminates the proposed application process with respect to specific business relationships that qualify for the primary purpose exception. In addition, with respect to interest rate restrictions, the final rule amends the FDIC's methodology for calculating the national rate, the national rate cap, and the local market rate cap. Specifically, the final rule defines: (1) the "national rate" as the weighted average of rates paid by all IDIs and credit unions on a given deposit product (for which data are available) based on each institution's market share of domestic deposits; and (2) the "national rate cap" as the higher of (i) the national rate plus 75 basis points or (ii) for maturity deposits, 120% of the current yield on similar maturity U.S. Treasury obligations and, for nonmaturity deposits, the federal funds rate plus 75 basis points. The final rule will become effective on April 1, 2021, with an extended compliance date of Jan. 1, 2022. Return to Top

The FDIC_approved, by a vote of 3 to 1 (Director Gruenberg_dissenting), a_final rule that requires certain conditions and commitments for each deposit insurance application approval, non-objection to a change in control notice, or merger application approval that would result in an insured industrial bank or industrial loan company (ILC) becoming a subsidiary of a company that is not subject to consolidated supervision by the Fed (a "Covered Company"). The final rule is_intended to "codify the FDIC's current supervisory processes and policies with respect to industrial banks," "ensure the safe and sound operation of these institutions," and "provide the necessary transparency regarding the FDIC's supervisory practices." The final rule is "largely consistent" with the FDIC's March 2020_proposal, but makes several "substantive changes" in response to public comment. In contrast to the proposal, the final rule: (1) requires compliance by covered entities on or after the effective date of the rule; (2) mandates "additional reporting by Covered Companies regarding systems for protecting the security, confidentiality, and integrity of consumer and nonpublic personal information"; (3) raises the "threshold regarding the limitation of a Covered Company's representation on the board of a subsidiary industrial bank" from 25%, as proposed, to less than 50%; and (4) "modifies the restrictions on industrial bank subsidiaries concerning the appointment of directors and senior executive officers to apply to the industrial bank only during the first three years after becoming a subsidiary of a Covered Company." The final rule requires a Covered Company to enter into one or more written agreements with the FDIC and the proposed subsidiary industrial bank prior to the industrial bank becoming a subsidiary of a Covered Company. Such written agreements would require a Covered Company to make commitments to: (1) maintain the industrial bank's capital and liquidity "at such levels as deemed appropriate and take such other action to provide the industrial bank with a resource for additional capital or liquidity"; (2) consent to the examination of the Covered Company and its subsidiaries; (3) execute a tax allocation agreement; and (4) in certain circumstances, "provide, adopt, and implement a contingency plan that sets forth strategies for recovery actions and the orderly disposition of the industrial bank without the need for a receiver or conservator." The final rule also prohibits an industrial bank controlled by a Covered Company from engaging in certain activities without prior FDIC approval, which include: (1) making a "material change" to its business plan; (2) adding or replacing a member of its board of directors, board of managers, or a managing member within three years after becoming a subsidiary of such Covered Company; and (3) entering into "any contract for services material to the operations of the industrial bank (for example, loan servicing function) with such Covered Company or any subsidiary thereof." Notably, an industrial bank that, on or before the final rule's effective date, is a subsidiary of a Covered Company (a grandfathered industrial bank) is "generally not subject to the [final] rule." However, a grandfathered industrial bank and its parent company will be subject to the final rule if: (1) the parent company "acquired control of the grandfathered industrial bank pursuant to a change in bank control transaction that closes after the effective date of the final rule"; or (2) the grandfathered industrial bank is the "surviving institution in a merger transaction that closes after the effective date of the final rule." The final rule will become effective April 1, 2021. Return to Top

The Fed, FDIC, and OCC issued a proposed rule that would require: (1) a banking organization to notify its primary federal regulator within 36 hours of when it believes "in good faith" that a "computer-security incident" that rises to the level of a "notification incident" has occurred; and (2) a bank service provider of a service described under the Bank Service Company Act (BSCA) to "notify at least two individuals at affected banking organization customers immediately after experiencing a computer-security incident that it believes in good faith could disrupt, degrade, or impair services provided subject to the BSCA for four or more hours." The proposed rule would define a "notification incident" as a "computer-security incident" that a banking organization "believes in good faith could materially disrupt, degrade, or impair": (1) the "ability of the banking organization to carry out banking operations, activities, or processes, or deliver banking products and services to a material portion of its customer base, in the ordinary course of business"; (2) "any business line of a banking organization, including associated operations, services, functions and support, and would result in a material loss of revenue, profit, or franchise value"; or (3) "those operations of a banking organization, including associated services, functions and support, as applicable, the failure or discontinuance of which would pose a threat to the financial stability of the United States." Noting that they "do not expect that a banking organization would typically be able to determine that a notification incident has occurred immediately upon becoming aware of a computer-security incident," the agencies instead "anticipate that a banking organization would take a reasonable amount of time to determine that it has experienced a notification incident" and clarify that only once the organization "has made such a determination would the requirement to report within 36 hours begin." Notably, because the proposed notification requirement is intended to "serve as an early alert to a banking organization's primary federal regulator about a notification incident” and not intended to include an assessment of the incident, “no specific information is required for the notice.” A firm’s notice could be provided through “any form of written or oral communication, including through any technological means,” to a “designated point of contact identified by the banking organization’s primary federal regulator (e.g., an examiner-in-charge, local supervisory office, or a cyber-incident operations center).” Comments on the proposal will be due 90 days following its publication in the Federal Register. The Fed, FDIC, and OCC announced the annual adjustment to the asset-size thresholds used to define “small bank” and “intermediate small bank” under the Community Reinvestment Act (CRA) regulations as a result of the 1.29% increase in the CPI-W for the period ending in Nov. 2020. In addition, the agencies announced the availability of 2019 small business, small farm, and community development lending data reported by certain commercial banks and savings associations, pursuant to the CRA. Speaking at the Center for American Progress, Fed Governor Brainard discussed the implications of climate change and the “transition to a sustainable economy” for the financial system and financial stability, cautioning that a “lack of clarity about true exposures to specific climate risks for physical and financial assets, coupled with uncertainty about the size and timing of these risks, creates vulnerabilities to abrupt repricing events.” Specifically, she reported that the Fed is “improving [its] understanding of climate risks and their impact on financial stability through staff research and engagement with other central banks on topics like climate scenario analysis,” which she said is “distinct from established regulatory stress tests at banks” in part because of the “different nature of climate-related risks relative to financial and economic downturns and the significantly longer planning horizon.” Further, she explained that climate scenario analysis “identifies climate-related physical and transition risk factors facing financial firms, formulates appropriate stresses of those risk factors under different scenarios, and measures their effects on individual firms and the financial system as a whole.” Although she acknowledged that the “transmission channels through which climate risks affect banks are increasingly apparent,” Governor Brainard observed that the “quantification of those risks remains challenging,” noting that, to date, “measurement efforts have been hampered by data gaps and methodological hurdles, many of which are unique to climate change and contribute to elevated uncertainty in estimates of climate-related risks.” In addition, she stressed that climate change “poses distinct modelling challenges” because (1) the “decades over which climate risks are projected to materialize far exceed a bank’s typical risk management and planning time horizon” and (2) “financial risk models are often backward-looking and extrapolate historical trends” and “predicators of future outcomes” with respect to such risks. Accordingly, she concluded that “[n]ew tools and forward-looking approaches will be required” and underscored the importance of, over time, “develop[ing] a framework for evaluating how banks are taking into account climate-related risk in their modelling and management of credit, market, liquidity, and operational risk.” Return to Top

The OCC issued an interpretive letter (1) outlining how it interprets the procedural requirements and three standards codified in 12 U.S.C. 25b under which federal law may preempt a “[s]tate consumer financial law” and (2) summarizing the agency’s “framework for compliance with these standards and requirements.” Return to Top

The OCC issued a proposed rule that would amend the agency’s suspicious activity report (SAR) regulations to permit the OCC to “issue exemptions from the requirements of those regulations” and, therefore, “grant relief to national banks or federal savings associations that develop innovative solutions intended to meet Bank Secrecy Act requirements more efficiently and effectively.” A national bank would be required to submit its request for an exemption to the OCC in writing, and “[i]n reviewing such requests, the OCC would consider whether the exemption is consistent with safe and sound banking, and any other appropriate factors, such as any outstanding supervisory concerns related to BSA/AML, including informal and formal enforcement actions.” For “exemption requests from the OCC’s SAR regulation that would also require an exemption from FinCEN’s SAR regulation, a national bank and federal savings association would need to seek an exemption” from both agencies. Comments on the proposed rule will be due 30 days following its publication in the Federal Register. Return to Top

The OCC released its quarterly report examining the Q3 2020 trading and derivatives activities of U.S. commercial banks and federal savings associations and finding that: (1) trading revenue was $9.0 billion ($5.7 billion, or 38.9% less than the previous quarter); (2) although four large banks held 87.3% of the “total banking industry notional amount of derivatives, a total of 1,371 insured U.S. commercial banks and savings associations held derivatives” at the end of Q3 2020; (3) derivative contracts “remained concentrated” in interest rate products, which represented 72.7% of total derivative notional amounts; and (4) the “percentage of centrally cleared derivatives transactions decreased quarter-over-quarter” to 38.9% in Q3 2020. The OCC issued its quarterly Mortgage Metrics Report presenting data on “first-lien residential mortgage loans serviced by seven national banks with large mortgage-servicing portfolios” in Q3 2020 and finding that: (1) 92.5% of mortgages included in the report were “current and performing” at the end of the quarter, compared to 96.4% a year earlier; (2) the percentage of “seriously delinquent mortgages” (i.e. “mortgages that are 60 or more days past due and all mortgages held by bankrupt borrowers whose payments are 30 or more days past due”) was 5.8% in Q3 2020, compared to 6.8% in the prior quarter and 1.5% a year ago; (3) servicers initiated 369 new foreclosures during Q3 2020, a 48.2% increase from the previous quarter and a 98.3% decrease from a year ago; and (4) servicers completed 14,097 mortgage modifications in the quarter, and 40.8% of the modifications “reduced borrowers’ monthly payments.” Return to Top

FinCEN issued a notice of proposed rulemaking that would require banks and money service businesses (MSBs) to “submit reports, keep records, and verify the identity of customers” in relation to transactions involving convertible virtual currency (CVC) or digital assets with legal tender status (legal tender digital assets or LTDA) held in (1) CVC/LTDA wallets not hosted by a financial institution (i.e. “unhosted wallets”) or (2) “wallets hosted in a jurisdiction identified by FinCEN.” Specifically, the proposal would require banks and MSBs to: (1) file a report with FinCEN "containing certain information related to a customer's CVC or LTDA transaction and counterparty," including name and physical address, and "verify the identity of their customer, if a counterparty to the transaction is using an unhosted or otherwise covered wallet and the transaction is greater than $10,000" (or the transaction is "one of multiple CVC transactions involving such counterparty wallets and the customer flowing through the bank or MSB within a 24-hour period that aggregate to value in or value out of greater than $10,000"); and (2) maintain records of a "customer's CVC or LTDA transaction and counterparty, including verifying the identity of their customer, if a counterparty is using an unhosted or otherwise covered wallet and the transaction is greater than $3,000." Comments on the proposal are due by Jan. 4, 2021. Return to Top

The CFPB released a report presenting the findings of its Small Business Review Panel regarding the Bureau's small business lending data collection rulemaking mandated by Section 1071 of the Dodd-Frank Act. In addition to summarizing the CFPB's proposals under consideration (which were detailed in the Bureau's Sept. 2020_outline), the report details the panel's findings and recommendations relating to, among other topics: (1) the "number and type of small entities likely impacted by the proposals under consideration"; (2) "projected compliance requirements of all aspects of the proposals under consideration"; and (3) "alternatives to the proposals under consideration that may accomplish the stated objectives of the Bureau's rulemaking and that may minimize the economic impact on small entities of the proposals under consideration." Notably, the Bureau finds that the small entity representatives selected to advise the panel: (1) "were generally supportive of the Bureau's statutory mission to enact rules under Section 1071" and stated that such a rulemaking is "necessary to better understand the small business lending market"; and (2) requested that the Bureau, among other measures, "issue implementation and guidance materials specifically to assist small financial institutions in complying with an eventual Section 1071 rule" and "consider providing sample disclosure language." The CFPB issued a final rule revising Regulation F, which implements the Fair Debt Collection Practices Act, by: (1) clarifying the "information that a debt collector must provide to a consumer at the outset of debt collection communications" and providing a "model validation notice containing such information"; and (2) addressing "consumer protection concerns" related to "passive collections" (i.e. the practice of "furnishing information about a debt to a consumer reporting agency before communicating with the consumer about the debt") and time-barred debt. Specifically, the final rule requires debt collectors to, among other measures: (1) provide, at the outset of collection communications, "detailed disclosures about the consumer's debt and rights in debt collection, along with information to help consumers respond"; and (2) "take specific steps to disclose the existence of a debt to consumers, orally, in writing, or electronically, before reporting information about the debt to a consumer reporting agency." The final rule, which follows the Bureau's Nov. 2020_final rule "regarding debt collection communications," also prohibits debt collectors from "bringing or threatening to bring a legal action against a consumer to collect a time-barred debt." The final rule will become effective on Nov. 30, 2021. Return to Top

prohibited transaction restrictions of the Employee Retirement Income Security Act (ERISA) and the Internal Revenue Code of 1986 (the Code) that "align[s] with [the advice] standards of other regulators," including the SEC's Regulation Best Interest. Specifically, the final exemption, which is based on an "existing temporary policy" adopted after the 5th Circuit Court of Appeals vacated DOL's 2016 Fiduciary Rule, would permit investment advice fiduciaries under both ERISA and the Code to: (1) receive a "wide variety of payments that would otherwise violate the prohibited transaction rules," including "commissions, 12b-1 fees, trailing commissions, sales loads, mark-ups and mark-downs, and revenue sharing payments from investment providers or third parties"; and (2) engage in principal transactions that would otherwise violate the prohibited transaction provisions. The exemption's relief extends to "prohibited transactions arising as a result of investment advice to roll over assets" from an employee benefit plan (Plan) to an individual retirement account or annuity (IRA). The final exemption is available to registered investment advisers, broker-dealers, banks, and insurance companies (Financial Institutions) and their individual employees, agents, and representatives (Investment Professionals) that provide fiduciary investment advice to Plan participants and beneficiaries, IRA owners, and Plan and IRA fiduciaries (Retirement Investors). The exemption is conditioned on the Investment Professional and Financial Institution providing advice in accordance with the "Impartial Conduct Standards," which consist of three components: (1) a "best interest standard"; (2) a "reasonable compensation standard"; and (3) a "requirement to make no misleading statements about investment transactions and other relevant matters." The exemption also requires Financial Institutions to, among other measures: (1) "acknowledge in writing their and their Investment Professionals' fiduciary status under Title I and the Code, as applicable, when providing investment advice to the Retirement Investor"; (2) "describe in writing the services to be provided and the Financial Institutions' and Investment Professionals' material conflicts of interest"; and (3) "adopt policies and procedures prudently designed to ensure compliance with the Impartial Conduct Standards and conduct a retrospective review of compliance." Notably, the exemption does not create additional private rights of action for Retirement Investors. In addition, the release implements the 5th Circuit's order vacating the 2016 Fiduciary Rule by reinstating DOL's "interpretation of the five-part test of investment advice fiduciary status" for purposes of the exemption. In adopting the exemption, DOL incorporated a "number of important changes" to its July 2020_{proposed} exemption. Specifically, in contrast to the proposal, the final exemption: (1) narrows the proposed recordkeeping requirements to "allow only [DOL] and [Treasury] to obtain access to a Financial Institution's records as opposed to plan fiduciaries and other Retirement Investors"; (2) revises the disclosure requirements to "include written disclosure to Retirement Investors of the reasons that a rollover recommendation was in their best interest"; (3) modifies the "retrospective review provision" to "provide that certification can be made by any Senior Executive Officer, as defined in the exemption, rather than requiring certification by the chief executive officer (or equivalent officer)" as proposed; and (4) adds a "self-correction provision" under which Financial Institutions will be able to correct certain violations of the exemption. The exemption will become effective 60 days following its publication in the Federal Register, allowing the incoming administration to potentially delay its

The SEC adopted, by a vote of 3 to 2 (Commissioners Lee and Crenshaw dissenting), a final rule and form amendment requiring "resource extraction issuers" (and any subsidiary or entity "controlled" by such an issuer) to annually furnish a Form SD that includes information about payments related to the commercial development of oil, natural gas, or minerals that are made to a foreign government or the U.S. federal government. The final rules are the third time the SEC has attempted to implement Section 1504 of the Dodd-Frank Act, which added Section 13(q) to the Exchange Act and directed the Commission to issue rules requiring such disclosures, including information on the type and total amount of payments made for each project and to each government. Rules adopted in Aug. 2012 were vacated by the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia. A second set of rules adopted in June 2016 was subsequently disapproved by a joint resolution of Congress in Feb. 2017 pursuant to the Congressional Review Act, which bars an agency from issuing a new rule that is "substantially the same" as the disapproved rule or reissuing the same rule in "substantially the same form." The Commission is now adopting, "largely as proposed," its Dec. 2019 re-proposed rules that sought to "achieve an appropriate balance between implementing the statute as required by Congress and addressing the concerns expressed by commenters and members of Congress" about the rules' potential adverse competitive effects. Although "certain elements of the final rules remain unchanged" from the 2016 rules, the final release incorporates several key changes. Most notably, the new rules revise the definition of "project" to require disclosure at the "national and major subnational political jurisdiction, as opposed to the contract-level disclosure as required by the disapproved rule." In addition, the final rules, among other measures: (1) require public disclosure of company-specific, project-level payment information; (2) add two new conditional exemptions for "situations in which a foreign law or a pre-existing contract prohibits the required disclosure"; (3) define "control" to "exclude entities or operations in which an issuer has a proportionate interest"; (4) "limit the liability for the required disclosure by deeming the payment information to be furnished to, but not filed with, the Commission"; and (5) add a conditional exemption for smaller reporting companies and emerging growth companies and include "transitional relief for issuers that have recently completed their U.S. initial public offerings." The final rules do not provide an exemption for foreign private issuers, but allow issuers to meet the prescribed requirements, in certain circumstances, by providing disclosures that comply with a foreign jurisdiction's reporting regime if the SEC has determined that the alternative reporting regime requires disclosure that satisfies the "transparency objectives of Section 13(q)," similar to a provision in the 2016 rules. In conjunction with the release, the Commission also issued, by a vote of 3 to 2 (Commissioners Lee and Crenshaw dissenting), an order recognizing the resource extraction payment disclosure requirements of the European Union, the United Kingdom, Norway, and Canada as acceptable alternative reporting regimes. Rule 13(q)(1) will become effective 60 days after publication in the Federal Register. Following a two-year transition period, an issuer will be required annually to submit Form SD no later than 270 days following the end of its most recently completed fiscal year. Return to Top

The SEC unanimously voted to adopt new Exchange Act Rule 17Ad-24, which exempts certain activities of security-based swap execution facilities (SBSEFs) and security-based swap dealers (SBSDs) from "triggering the requirement also to register as a clearing agency, in line with similar exemptions for broker-dealers and national securities exchanges." Specifically, new Rule 17Ad-24 exempts from the definition of "clearing agency" in Section 3(a)(23) of the Exchange Act certain activities of a registered SBS, a registered SBSEF, and a person engaging in dealing activity in SBSs that is "eligible for an exception from registration as a security-based swap dealer because the quantity of dealing activity is de minimis." The final rule will become effective 60 days following its publication in the Federal Register. Return to Top

The SEC released two staff reports on national recognized statistical rating organizations (NRSROs) which: (1) summarize the examinations of each NRSRO conducted by SEC staff; and (2) detail the "state of competition, transparency, and conflicts of interest among the firms." Among other findings, the reports conclude that "most NRSROs": (1) "have continued to refine, as needed, and maintain, as appropriate, their policies, procedures, and controls related to NRSRO rules and the Staff's recommendations from Section 15E examinations"; and (2) generally "continue to improve their compliance monitoring and internal audit functions." SEC Chairman Clayton and Commissioners Peirce, Roisman, Lee, and Crenshaw issued a statement announcing that the Commission's Office of Compliance Inspections and Examinations (OCIE) has been renamed the "Division of Examinations" to "better reflect" its "overall role at the Commission" and "important contributions" in "promot[ing] a strong culture of compliance within the financial services industry." The SEC announced the establishment of the Security-Based Swaps Joint Venture, a "collaborative venture among several SEC divisions and offices that will be responsible for coordinating functions related to the regulation of security-based swaps (SBS) and oversight of certain entities that will be required to register with the SEC." GAO published a study examining: (1) the "extent to which financial institutions are exposed to leveraged lending activities"; (2) financial regulators' "assessments of the potential risks to financial stability stemming from leveraged lending activities before and after the COVID-19 shock"; and (3) the "extent to which FSOC has established approaches for identifying, monitoring, and mitigating potential risks to financial stability arising from broad-based market activities such as leveraged lending." Observing that, "[p]rior to the economic shock associated with [COVID-19], demand for leveraged loans had steadily increased," which "shift[ed] the negotiating power in borrowers' favor and result[ed] in weaker investment protections for lenders," GAO notes that "[t]hese developments had raised concerns that an economic downturn could set the stage for increased leveraged loan default rates and that stress in the leveraged loan markets could disrupt other markets." Despite these concerns, GAO concludes that, although "loans suffered record downgrades and increased defaults" following the COVID-19 shock, the "highest-rated CLO securities remained resilient" and that “regulators monitoring the effects of the pandemic . . . had not found that leveraged lending presented significant threats to financial stability” as of Sept. 2020. Specifically, the regulators’ assessments indicated that: (1) “leveraged lending activities had not contributed significantly to the distress of any large financial entity whose failure could threaten financial stability” and that the leveraged lending exposures of large banks, insurers, and other investors “appeared manageable”; (2) “[m]utual funds experienced redemptions by investors but were able to meet them in part by selling leveraged loan holdings,” which “may have put downward pressure on already-distressed loan prices,” but “did not pose a potential threat to financial stability”; and (3) “[p]resent-day CLO securities appear to pose less of a risk to financial stability than did similar securities during the 2007–2009 financial crisis.” Nevertheless, GAO stresses that, because “FSOC does not conduct tabletop or similar scenario-based exercises,” it is “missing an opportunity to enhance preparedness and test members’ coordinated response to financial stability risks.” Accordingly, GAO recommends that the Treasury Secretary, as FSOC Chair, “conduct scenario-based exercises intended to evaluate capabilities for responding to crises.” Noting that “FSOC does not generally have clear authority to address broader risks that are not specific to a particular financial entity, such as risks from leveraged lending,” GAO also reiterates its 2016 recommendation that Congress “consider legislative changes to align FSOC’s authorities with its mission,” which the agency maintains “would help FSOC respond to risks from activities that involve many regulators, such as leveraged lending.” Return to Top

The Fed and Treasury published a report, pursuant to the Economic Growth, Regulatory Relief, and Consumer Protection Act, detailing the agencies’ efforts “with respect to global insurance regulatory or supervisory forums” in 2019 and emphasizing that they will “continue to advocate for insurance regulatory and supervisory standards that are appropriate for the United States and . . . report to Congress on their efforts.” The report notes that, “[i]n their international engagement on insurance issues, Treasury and the [Fed] work to promote the interests of U.S. consumers and the well-being of U.S. insurance markets,” including by “coordinat[ing] closely with each other and with the other members” of the U.S. delegation to the IAIS (Team USA). Specifically, the report highlights that Team USA members participate in (1) the International Capital Standard (ICS) and Comparability Task Force, which “provides strategic steering on the further improvement of the ICS and oversight of the comparability assessment” and will “determine whether the [aggregation method] can be recognized as an alternative implementation of the ICS,” (2) the Policy Development Committee, and (3) “the subcommittees involved in ICS development, monitoring, and the data collection exercises.” Return to Top

FHFA issued a proposed rule that would establish four quantitative liquidity requirements for Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac (the Enterprises) that “address the short, intermediate and long-term liquidity needs of the Enterprises.” In addition to requiring daily reporting to FHFA of the “Enterprises’ liquidity positions and other information, as well as monthly disclosures to the public,” the proposed rule would establish two “cash-flow based requirements,” (1) a short term (30-day) requirement “substantially similar” to the U.S. banking regulator’s liquidity coverage ratio and (2)

an intermediate-term (365-day) liquidity requirement designed to "promote intermediate-term management of liquidity risks and to encourage an appropriate amount of longer-term funding to reduce debt rollover risks." The 30-day condition would require the Enterprises to "maintain a liquidity portfolio" consisting of high quality liquid assets (HQLA) large enough to cover the sum of: (1) the "highest cumulative daily net cash outflows over 30 calendar days under certain specified stressed market assumptions"; and (2) an excess requirement in the amount of $10 billion. The 365-day requirement is "substantially similar to the 30-day requirement and based on similar stressed assumptions, except that certain stressed assumptions last 365 days." Under this requirement, the Enterprises would be required to maintain a "portfolio of [HQLAs], together with mortgage-backed securities (MBS) eligible to be pledged as collateral to the Fixed Income Clearing Corporation (FICC) (subject to a haircut), large enough to cover the worst daily cumulative net cash outflow over 365 calendar days under those stress assumptions" (FHFA does not propose to include an excess requirement in connection with the 365-day requirement). The proposal would also impose two long-term liquidity and funding standards under which the Enterprises would be required to maintain ratios of: (1) "long-term unsecured debt to less-liquid assets" exceeding 120%; and (2) the "spread duration of unsecured debt to the spread duration of retained portfolio assets" exceeding 60%. Because the Enterprises do not have access to the Fed's Discount Window or a "stable customer deposit base," FHFA proposes to define HQLAs as: (1) cash held in a Fed account; (2) U.S. Treasury securities; (3) short-term secured loans through U.S. Treasury repurchase agreements that clear through the FICC or are offered by the Federal Reserve Bank of New York; and (4) a "limited amount of unsecured overnight deposits with eligible U.S. banks." Finally, the proposal would establish a supervisory framework to address Enterprise liquidity shortfalls and "non-compliance with the minimum liquidity requirements when an Enterprise's 30-day liquidity coverage metric falls below the $10 billion excess requirement or any of the other three liquidity and funding requirements." The proposed rule, once finalized, would be effective as of Sept. 2021. Comments on the proposal will be due 60 days following its publication in the Federal Register. Return to Top

WHITE HOUSE

President Trump signed S. 945 (the " Holding Foreign Companies Accountable Act"), legislation that prohibits the "securities of a company from being listed on any of the U.S. securities exchanges if the company has failed to comply with the Public Company Accounting Oversight Board's (PCAOB) audits for three years in a row." Following the President's action, SEC Chairman Clayton issued a statement noting that, prior to the Act's enactment, Commission "staff were finalizing recommendations for proposed rules regarding enhanced listing standards for U.S. securities exchanges and auditor qualifications for the Commission's consideration." Due to the "substantial overlap between the staff's proposal and the Act," he has "directed the staff to consider providing a single consolidated proposal for the Commission's consideration on issues related to the PCAOB's access to audit work papers, exchange listing standards, and trading prohibitions." Further, he has asked the staff to "consider additional issues relating to the Act's implementation," including "how the Act's disclosure requirements can be implemented expeditiously and how any actual or perceived uncertainty can be addressed in a manner consistent with congressional intent as well as investor protection and the fair and orderly operation of our markets."

The FSB published the results of its tenth annual exercise to "assess global trends and risks in non-bank financial intermediation" (NBFi), with a particular focus on "those parts of NBFi that may pose bank-like financial stability risks and/or involve regulatory arbitrage" (the so-called narrow measure of NBFi). Among other conclusions, the report finds that, as of end-2019: (1) the "narrow measure" of NBFi was $57.1 trillion in 2019, an annual increase of 11.1% and equivalent to 14.2% of total global financial assets; (2) collective investment vehicles with "features that make them susceptible to runs" grew by 13.5%, accounting for 72.9% of the narrow measure; (3) securitization-based credit intermediation increased by 2.5% to represent 8.4% of the narrow measure, as "increases in assets of [structured finance vehicles], which include [collateralized loan obligations], offset a decrease in assets of Chinese trust companies"; (4) intermediation of market activities dependent on short-term funding grew by 5.4%, representing 8.2% of the narrow measure; and (5) loan provision that is "typically dependent on short-term funding" grew by 6.1% in 2019, accounting for 6.8% of the narrow measure. Although the report is "based on end-2019 data and therefore predates the COVID-19 pandemic," it also includes two case studies analyzing the "impact of the COVID-19 shock on the NBFi sector in general and on money market funds specifically." The IAIS published its 2020 Global Insurance Market Report discussing the impact of COVID-19 on the "global insurance sector from a supervisory perspective" and finding that, "despite the considerable volatility in financial markets during the first half of the year, the global insurance sector has remained both financially and operationally resilient, aided by supervisory measures providing operational relief and by monetary and fiscal support measures in financial markets in certain regions." Specifically, the report observes that: (1) the "most significant prudential impact on the insurance sector was on solvency and profitability, primarily through losses on the asset side," but that "solvency ratios generally remained well above jurisdictional requirements"; (2) with regard to liability, the "results vary greatly, depending on the business model"; and (3) the impact on liquidity "has been limited, raising no immediate concern on the sector's ability to fulfill obligations at this point." The IAIS cautions, however, that "[v]ulnerabilities remain" given "uncertainties about the duration and impact" of the pandemic, including the "potential for decreasing credit quality of insurers' fixed-income portfolios and the impact of the deepened low yield environment," and notes that it "will continue to actively monitor and assess how the insurance sector is affected." The SBA, in consultation with Treasury, released a "simpler" Paycheck Protection Program (PPP) loan forgiveness application (SBA Form 3508S) and related instructions for loans of $50,000 or less that "requires fewer calculations and less documentation for eligible borrowers" than the full-length or "EZ" forgiveness applications (SBA Form 3508 and SBA Form 3508EZ). Eligible borrowers using SBA Form 3508S are: (1) "exempt from reductions in loan forgiveness amounts based on reductions in full-time equivalent . . . employees or in salaries or wages"; and (2) not required to "show the calculations used to determine their loan forgiveness amount." However, the SBA "may request information and documents to review those calculations as part of its loan review process." A borrower that, together with its affiliates, received PPP loans totaling $2 million or more may not utilize the new form. The agencies note that SBA Form 3508S is intended to "strike[] an appropriate balance between the need for simplification in the forgiveness process with the responsibility to protect the integrity of the program and safeguard taxpayer funds." the SBA and Treasury issued an interim final rule (IFR) revising previously-issued IFRs governing loan forgiveness and review procedures and providing additional guidance on: (1) "lender responsibilities with respect to the review of borrower documentation of eligible costs for forgiveness in excess of a borrower's PPP loan amount" for loans of all sizes; and (2) the forgiveness and loan review processes for PPP loans of $50,000 or less. The IFR clarifies that, whether a borrower submits SBA Form 3508, 3508EZ, 3508S, or a lender's equivalent form, a lender "should confirm receipt of the documentation the borrower is required to submit to aid in verifying payroll and nonpayroll costs, and, if applicable (for SBA Form 3508, 3508EZ, or lender's equivalent form), confirm the borrower's calculations" on the borrower's loan forgiveness application, "up to the amount required to reach the requested [f]orgiveness [a]mount." Comments on the IFR will be due 30 days following its publication in the Federal Register. In addition, the SBA announced that it "began approving PPP forgiveness applications and remitting forgiveness payments to PPP lenders" on Oct. 2, 2020 and "will continue to process all PPP forgiveness applications in an expeditious manner." The SBA, in consultation with Treasury, issued a new PPP FAQ clarifying that: (1) the extension of the deferral period for borrower payments of principal, interest, and fees provided by the PPP Flexibility Act of 2020 "automatically applies to all PPP loans"; (2) lenders are required to "give immediate effect to the statutory extension and should notify borrowers of the change to the deferral period" and that the SBA "does not require a formal modification to the promissory note"; and (3) a modification of a promissory note to "reflect the required statutory deferral period under the Flexibility Act will have no effect on the SBA's guarantee of a PPP loan." Speaking at the National Association for Business Economics Virtual Annual Meeting, Fed Chair Powell provided an "assessment of the response to the economic fallout" of the COVID-19 pandemic, concluding that "fiscal and monetary policy actions have so far supported a strong but incomplete recovery in demand and have for now substantially muted the normal recessionary dynamics that occur in a downturn." Observing that the "recovery has progressed more quickly than generally expected," Chair Powell cautioned that there is a "risk that the rapid initial gains from reopening may transition to a longer than expected slog back to full recovery as some segments struggle with the pandemic's continued fallout." Specifically, he argued that the "risks of policy intervention are still asymmetric" and warned that "[t]oo little support would lead to a weak recovery, creating unnecessary hardship for households and businesses." He stressed, moreover, that the "risks of overdoing it seem, for now, to be smaller," arguing that, "[e]ven if policy actions ultimately prove to be greater than needed, they will not go to waste” and emphasizing that the “recovery will be stronger and move faster if monetary policy and fiscal policy continue to work side by side to provide support to the economy until it is clearly out of the woods.” In addition, Chair Powell warned that a “prolonged slowing in the pace of improvement over time could trigger typical recessionary dynamics” and that a “long period of unnecessarily slow progress could continue to exacerbate existing disparities in our economy,” which he said “would be tragic, especially in light of our country’s progress on these issues in the years leading up to the pandemic.” _Return to Top

The Fed submitted a report to Congress on the Primary Dealer Credit Facility (PDCF), the Commercial Paper Funding Facility (CPFF), the Money Market Mutual Fund Liquidity Facility (MMLF), the Primary Market Corporate Credit Facility (PMCCF), the Secondary Market Corporate Credit Facility (SMCCF), the Term Asset-Backed Securities Loan Facility (TALF), the Municipal Liquidity Facility (MLF), the PPP Liquidity Facility (PPPLF), and the Main Street Lending Program (MSLP). Among other metrics, the report notes that, as of Sept. 30, 2020: (1) the total outstanding amount of Federal Reserve Bank of New York (FRBNY) loans under the PDCF was $233,000,000 (down from $243,000,000 on Aug. 31); (2) the outstanding amount of FRBNY loans to the CPFF’s special purpose vehicle (SPV) was $29,909,533 (unchanged from Aug. 31); (3) the total outstanding amount of Federal Reserve Bank of Boston (FRBB) loans under the MMLF was $7,131,905,624 (down from $9,708,856,450 on Aug. 31); (4) the total outstanding amount of FRBNY loans under the PMCCF and SMCCF was $12,874,501,572 (up from $12,470,176,517 on Aug. 31), with all loans extended under the SMCCF; (5) the total outstanding amount of FRBNY loans to the TALF’s SPV was $3,206,645,041 (up from $2,639,177,058 on Aug. 31); (6) the total outstanding amount of FRBNY loans to the MLF’s SPV was $1,650,720,000 (unchanged from Aug. 31); (7) the total outstanding amount of all advances under the PPPLF was $67,573,003,014 (down from $68,205,588,517 on Aug. 31); and (8) the total outstanding amount of FRBB loans to the MSLP’s SPV was $2,195,078,482 (up from $1,072,475,936 on Aug. 31). In addition, the Fed published transaction-specific disclosures for the MSLP, SMCCF, TALF, MLF, and PPPLF. _Return to Top

The SEC published a staff report examining the “interconnections among the various U.S. credit markets” and analyzing the “extent to which [they] contributed to or mitigated risk, including systemic risk, during the recent period of market stress during and following the COVID-19 global economic shock of March 2020.” Specifically, the report: (1) “identifies approximately $54 trillion of credit issued and outstanding in the U.S. financial system at the end of 2019” and “broadly traces the flow of approximately $52 trillion of that credit through various intermediaries and prior holders to the ultimate holders of the credit at that time”; and (2) examines “interconnections across six key U.S. credit markets,” which account for more than $40 trillion in outstanding credit. Among other observations, the report concludes that: (1) banks and the banking system “have been resilient to the COVID-19 shock to date notwithstanding their exposure to several trillions of dollars of residential and commercial mortgages and leveraged loans to corporations”; (2) the “combination of the [Fed]’s intervention and the CARES Act . . . was extremely important in stabilizing prices” and “sustaining economic activity,” which, “in turn[,] added stability to the credit markets”; and (3) the ability of intermediaries, such as market makers, to “absorb significant, rapid shifts in investor sentiment (e.g., a 'dash for cash') is limited in absolute terms and may become more limited as spreads widen and volatility increases during periods of stress and uncertainty.” Notably, the report suggests that “[o]ne area worthy of greater focus is the relationships among, and the varying stresses in, the cash, futures, and repo markets in U.S. Treasuries in March 2020,” observing that, as the U.S. Treasury market “came under stress, and as short-term repo liquidity deteriorated and pricing increased, the economics of [hedge funds]’ cash-futures basis trades worsened and trades were unwound,” which “resulted in more outright sales of U.S. Treasuries [and] add[ed] further stress,” including “constraints on continued dealer intermediation due to volume and pricing dynamics.” Noting that “dealers had already expanded their Treasury inventories in response to the general shift to liquidity,” the report finds that dealers’ “ability to conduct additional market-making activities in response to the unwinding of these trades was constrained.” The SEC stresses that the report “should not be viewed as making or endorsing any particular policy recommendation” and notes that, instead, it is intended to “inform and assist in the framing of policy discussions by providing an evidentiary understanding . . . of the U.S. credit-based financial system and certain of the observed market stresses in the system.” In conjunction with the report’s release, the SEC announced that it will hold a roundtable on Oct. 14 to “discuss the interconnections within our capital markets and the impact of the COVID-19 economic shock.” Return to Top

Senator Warren (D-MA) sent letters to the 14 largest firms subject to the Fed’s 2020 stress tests raising concerns that the results of the June 2020 “sensitivity analyses” do not “contain the transparency needed to provide the American people with confidence that [the] financial system will continue to function during this ongoing and unprecedented pandemic” and requesting that each firm “provide additional information about [its] preparedness for the continued economic fallout from COVID-19.” Although she describes the Fed’s decision to publicly release the results of its forthcoming round of stress tests “on a bank-level basis” by the end of the year as “a welcome step,” Sen. Warren expresses concern that the Fed is “making decisions today based on the information from the first round of stress tests” and argues that “families and businesses should not have to wait for up to three additional months for basic transparency about our banking system.” Accordingly, she asks whether the “results of the Fed’s COVID-19 first round of sensitivity analyses [were] provided to [each] institution” and, if so, requests “copies of all results.” Further, she requests information on, among other topics: (1) whether each firm has “received any communications from the Fed regarding the findings of the current round of sensitivity analyses”; (2) the “economic scenarios [the firms] have . . . accounted for in [their] internal capital planning models since March 1, 2020,” including the “values of individual macroeconomic variables used in these scenarios”; and (3) the impact of such economic scenarios on the firms’ capital levels, including their common equity tier 1 capital ratios. The CFPB issued a policy statement establishing a process by which an entity subject to an administrative consent order (Consent Order) “may apply for early termination” of the typical five-year term of CFPB Consent Orders, and outlining the “standards that the Bureau intends to use when evaluating applications.” Acknowledging that “there may be exceptional circumstances when early termination of a Consent Order against an entity is appropriate and can be accomplished in a manner that minimizes the risk of new violations of law or harm to consumers,” the Bureau’s policy statement is designed to “facilitate such early terminations” and “provide[] entities with an incentive to fully and promptly comply with Bureau Consent Orders.” In particular, the Bureau intends in its discretion to grant applications for early termination of Consent Orders if it determines that an entity meets certain threshold eligibility criteria (detailed below) and has: (1) “complied with the terms and conditions of the Consent Order”; and (2) a “satisfactory” compliance position in the “institutional product line . . . or compliance area (e.g., fair lending) for which the Order was issued.” Under the policy statement, the Bureau will only consider applications from entities, not natural persons. Court orders are excluded from the policy. Entities may apply for early termination after the later of at least six months after all compliance and redress plans have been fully implemented, or a year after the Consent Order is entered. Further, entities are not eligible for early termination when (1) the Consent Order “imposes a ban on participating in a certain industry,” (2) the Consent Order “involves violations of an earlier Bureau Order,” or (3) “there has been . . . criminal action related to the violations found in the Consent Order.” Upon an entity’s application, the Bureau intends to, “[i]f it has not already done so, . . . expeditiously review the entity’s compliance with the Consent Order and conduct follow-up work as needed to determine the entity’s compliance” and generally “complete this compliance review within six months of receiving an application that the Bureau determines is complete.” In addition, the policy statement emphasizes that, while Bureau staff will “review applications and make recommendations to the Director,” the “sole authority to terminate a Consent Order remains with the Bureau’s Director and the termination decision is at their discretion.” The policy statement became applicable on Oct. 8, 2020. The CFPB released a report on “agreements between credit card issuers and institutions of higher education or certain organizations affiliated with such institutions in connection with the issuance of credit cards” and finding that: (1) in 2019, the “number of [such] agreements and open accounts pursuant to agreements continues to contract,” a trend that “appears poised to continue into 2020”; and (2) agreements with “alumni associations continue to represent the large majority of agreements, accounts, and payments by issuers.” Return to Top

The SEC unanimously voted to adopt new Investment Company Act rule 12d1-4 and related amendments intended to “streamline and enhance” the regulatory framework for “fund of funds” arrangements by allowing a fund, subject to certain conditions, to acquire the shares of another fund in excess of the limits prescribed in section 12(d)(1) of the Investment Company Act without obtaining an individual exemptive order. The final rule was adopted nearly two years after it was originally proposed and includes “several modifications designed to increase the workability of the rule’s requirements, while enhancing protections for investors in fund of funds arrangements.” Notably, in a departure from the proposal, the Commission did not adopt the proposed redemption limits that would have prohibited an acquiring fund that acquires more than 3% of an acquired fund’s outstanding shares from redeeming more than 3% of the acquired fund’s total outstanding shares in any 30-day period. As proposed, the final rule will not permit private funds and unregistered investment companies, such as foreign funds, to rely on the rule as acquiring funds. The SEC also declined to act on commenters’ requests that it address the disclosure of acquired fund fees and expenses in its rulemaking, noting that it is considering modifications to the disclosure regime for such expenses as part of its separate Investor Experience Proposal.

Although rule 12d1-4 “contains elements” from the Commission’s current exemptive orders allowing fund of funds arrangements, it is “tailored to enhance investor protections while providing funds with flexibility to meet their investment objectives in an efficient manner.” For a fund to rely on rule 12d1-4, it must comply with certain conditions designed to “limit the acquiring funds’ undue influence over the acquired funds, limit duplicative fees for acquiring fund investors, limit the creation of complex fund structures, and ultimately encourage effective oversight of fund of funds structures.” Specifically, rule 12d1-4: (1) prohibits an acquiring fund from controlling an acquired fund (except in limited circumstances); (2) requires an acquiring fund and its “advisory group” to use “mirror voting” if it holds more than 25% of an acquired open-end fund or unit investment trust (UIT) “due to a decrease in the outstanding securities of the acquired fund” and if it holds more than 10% of a closed-end fund, “with the ability to use pass-through voting when acquiring funds are the only shareholders of an acquired fund”; and (3) generally bars funds from creating three-tier fund of funds structures. In response to concerns raised by commenters relating to investments to equitize cash and the use of central funds, the final rule permits an acquired fund to invest up to 10% of its assets in other funds (including private funds) without restriction. In lieu of adopting the proposed redemption limits, while still “address[ing] concerns that an acquiring fund could exert undue influence over an acquired fund or charge duplicative fees and expenses,” rule 12d1-4 requires that: (1) “certain evaluations and findings be made before the acquiring fund invests in an acquired fund,” which “differ depending upon whether a fund is the acquiring or acquired fund and whether it is a management company, [UIT], or a separate account funding variable insurance contracts”; and (2) funds that do not share the same investment adviser “enter into a fund of funds investment agreement memorializing the terms of the arrangement.” In connection with the adoption of new rule 12d1-4, the Commission is also rescinding: (1) rule 12d1-2, which allows funds that “primarily invest in funds within the same fund group to invest in unaffiliated funds and non-fund assets”; and (2) certain exemptive orders permitting fund of funds arrangements. The SEC also adopted proposed amendments to rule 12d1-1 to allow funds that primarily invest in funds within the same fund group to continue to invest in unaffiliated money market funds. In addition, with respect to reporting requirements, the SEC is amending Form N-CEN to require funds to report “whether they relied on rule 12d1-4 or the statutory exception in section 12(d)(1)(G) of the Investment Company Act during the applicable reporting period.” The final rule will become effective 60 days following its publication in the Federal Register. However, to “facilitate a transition period,” the compliance date for the amendments to Form N-CEN will be 425 days after publication. The rescission of rule 12d1-2 and the SEC’s exemptive orders will be effective one year from the effective date of the rule. Return to Top

The SEC issued, by a vote 3 to 2 (Commissioners Lee and Crenshaw dissenting), a proposed exemptive order that would grant a conditional exemption from the broker registration requirements of Section 15(a) of the Exchange Act for natural persons who “assist issuers with raising capital in private markets from accredited investors” (so-called “Finders”). Citing concerns that “regulatory uncertainty associated with playing even a limited role in a capital raise” may have resulted in individuals “potentially . . . engaging in unregistered brokerage activity, or alternatively, not serving the market,” the proposed exemption would “provide clarity to investors and issuers” and “establish clear lanes for both registered broker activity and limited activity by [F]inders that would be exempt from registration.” Specifically, the Commission is proposing to exempt two “classes” of Finders, “Tier I Finders” and “Tier II Finders,” based on the types of activities in which they would be permitted to engage and “with conditions tailored to the scope of their activities.” Under the proposed order, a Tier I Finder would be limited to providing contact information of potential investors in connection with only one capital raising transaction within a 12 month period and “could not have any contact with a potential investor about the issuer.” A Tier II Finder would be permitted to engage in “solicitation-related activities on behalf of an issuer” that are limited to: (1) “identifying, screening, and contacting” potential investors; (2) distributing issuer offering materials to investors; (3) discussing issuer information included in any offering materials, “provided that the Tier II Finder does not provide advice as to the valuation or advisability of the investment”; and (4) “arranging or participating in meetings with the issuer and investor.” The proposed exemption for both Tier I and Tier II Finders would be available only where: (1) the issuer is not required to file reports under Section 13 or Section 15(d) of the Exchange Act; (2) the issuer is seeking to conduct the securities offering in reliance on an applicable exemption from registration under the Securities Act; (3) the Finder does not engage in general solicitation; (4) the potential investor is an “accredited investor” as defined in Rule 501 of Regulation D or the Finder “has a reasonable belief” that the potential investor is an “accredited investor”; (5) the Finder provides services under a written agreement with the issuer that “includes a description of the services provided and associated compensation”; (6) the Finder is not an “associated person” of a broker-dealer; and (7) the Finder is not subject to a statutory disqualification, as defined in Section 3(a)(39) of the Exchange Act, at the time of their participation. Further, Tier I and Tier II Finders would not be permitted to, among other measures: (1) “be involved in structuring the transaction or negotiating the terms of the offering”; (2) “perform any independent analysis of the sale”; or (3) engage in any “due diligence” activities. Due to the potential ability of Tier II Finders to “participate in a wider range of activity” and “engage in more offerings with issuers and investors,” the Commission is also proposing “heightened requirements” for Tier II Finders including a requirement to provide “appropriate disclosures of the Tier II Finder’s role and compensation” prior to or at the time of the solicitation, receipt of a written acknowledgment from the investor of the required disclosures prior to or at the time of any investment, and other conditions. Comments on the proposed exemptive order will be due 30 days following its publication in the Federal Register. Return to Top

The staff of the SEC’s Divisions of Investment Management and Trading and Markets published new FAQs on Item 4 of Form CRS, which presents information on whether or not a firm or its financial professionals have a reportable disciplinary history. Chairman Clayton, Investment Management Division Director Blass, and Trading and Markets Division Director Redfearn also issued a joint statement highlighting the updated staff FAQs and stressing that the Commission “remain[s] committed to providing feedback and assistance so that firms can produce relationship summaries that meet the Commission’s goals of reducing retail investor confusion in the marketplace for brokerage and investment advisory services and otherwise enhancing the quality and transparency of retail investors’ relationships with their financial professionals.” Return to Top

Addressing the annual “SEC Speaks” program, Chairman Clayton discussed the Commission’s FY 2020 operations and activities, reporting that, although the COVID-19 pandemic “significantly impacted how [the Commission] do[es] [its] work, it did not negatively impact the work itself” and that the “planned oversight, examination, rulemaking, and enforcement work continued with vigor, rigor and transparency.” In addition to presenting statistics on the SEC’s enforcement, oversight, and rulemaking activity, he highlighted the Commission’s “external engagement with domestic and international regulatory partners focusing on market and systemic risks,” including the FSOC and the President’s Working Group on Financial Markets (PWG). In particular, he commented that the PWG has “worked collaboratively during this time of market stress, both in connection with regulatory responses to COVID-19, as well as in formulating a series of recommendations focused on the risks of investing in emerging markets, including China.” Noting that the PWG has recommended, among other measures, the establishment of “enhanced listing standards at U.S. exchanges that would require as a condition to initial and continued exchange listing, sufficient PCAOB access to audit workpapers,” Chairman Clayton reported that he has “directed Commission staff to actively consider the PWG recommendations,” which are intended to “strengthen protections for investors and promote the integrity of our capital markets” by: (1) “leveling the playing field for all companies listed on U.S exchanges”; and (2) “improving disclosure regarding, and consideration by fiduciaries and other market professionals of, the risks of investing in emerging markets, including China.” _Return to Top

The CFTC unanimously approved amendments to Commission Regulation 4.27 and Form CPO-PQR, which govern and implement the collection of data from certain commodity pool operators (CPOs). The final rule, among other measures: (1) amends the information in existing Schedule A of Form CPO-PQR to (i) solicit Legal Entity Identifiers (LEIs) for CPOs and their operated pools that have them and (ii) eliminate “questions regarding pool auditors and marketers”; (2) removes the “pool-specific reporting requirements in existing Schedules B and C of Form CPO-PQR,” other than the pool schedule of investments (i.e. question 6 of Schedule B); and (3) implements certain conforming changes due to the rescission of Schedules B and C, including the “elimination of all existing reporting thresholds.” Under the final rule, CPOs are permitted to file the National Futures Association’s Form PQR instead of the revised Form CPO-PQR; however, as proposed, the Commission eliminated the “ability of dually registered CPO-investment advisers filing . . . Form PF to file such form in lieu of the [r]evised [f]orm.” The Commission adopted its May 2020 proposal “largely as proposed,” with certain modifications in response to public comment, which include revising Form CPO-PQR’s Instruction 3 to “remove all references” to parallel managed accounts and parallel pools to “focus[] solely on reporting information concerning pools in a Master-Feeder Arrangement.” The final rule will become effective 30 days following its publication in the Federal Register, although reporting CPOs will not be required to file the revised form with respect to their operated pools until Q1 2021 (the filing deadline for that reporting period is 60 days after the quarter-end, or May 30, 2021). In addition, CFTC Chairman Tarbert and Office of Financial Research (OFR) Director Falaschetti signed a memorandum of understanding that: (1) “establishes a framework” for the CFTC to share information and data reported on Form CPO-PQR with OFR; and (2) “confirms both agencies’ commitment to working together to fulfill their statutory and regulatory mandates.” _Return to Top

The ISDA Board of Directors issued a statement announcing the Oct. 23, 2020 launch of the IBOR Fallbacks Supplement to the 2006 ISDA Definitions and the ISDA 2020 IBOR Fallbacks Protocol. The supplement and the amendments made by the protocol will take effect on Jan. 25, 2021, and derivatives contracts “existing as of this date will incorporate the new fallbacks if both counterparties have adhered to the protocol or otherwise bilaterally agreed to include the new fallbacks in their contracts.” In addition, on this date, “all new derivatives contracts that incorporate the 2006 ISDA Definitions and reference one of the covered IBORs will contain the new fallbacks.” The protocol will “remain open for adherence after this effective date.” Following ISDA’s announcement, the Alternative Reference Rates Committee issued a statement “encourag[ing] market participants to adhere to the Protocol before it takes effect, and for those dealers and market participants with significant derivatives exposures to do so during the two-week escrow period” ahead of the Oct. 23 launch date. The Fed also published a Supervision and Regulation (SR) letter noting that the Protocol “provides an efficient mechanism to amend a large number of derivatives contracts with many counterparties” and stressing that examiners should (1) “alert supervised firms to announcement of the Protocol” and (2) “encourage those that are active in the derivatives market particularly those with large LIBOR denominated derivatives exposures to give strong consideration to adhering to the Protocol.” Similarly, the FSB issued a statement “strongly encourag[ing] widespread and early adherence to the Protocol” by affected financial and non-financial firms. The Fed, FDIC, OCC, and NCUA, with the concurrence of FinCEN, issued an order granting an exemption from the requirements of the customer identification program (CIP) rules for “loans extended by banks and their subsidiaries to all customers to facilitate the purchase of property and casualty insurance policies” (premium finance lending). The order, which supersedes the agencies’ Sept. 2018 order that granted such an exemption only to loans extended to commercial customers, stresses that banks “engaging in premium finance lending must continue to comply with all other regulatory requirements,” including the regulations implementing the Bank Secrecy Act that mandate the filing of suspicious activity reports. DOJ released a report, produced by the Attorney General’s Cyber-Digital Task Force, outlining the Department’s “enforcement framework” relating to cryptocurrency and providing a “comprehensive overview of the emerging threats and enforcement challenges associated with the increasing prevalence and use of cryptocurrency.” Notably, the report presents a “detailed threat overview” and identifies the “three categories into which most illicit uses of cryptocurrency typically fall”: (1) financial transactions “associated with the commission of crimes”; (2) money laundering and the “shielding of legitimate activity from tax, reporting, or other legal requirements”; and (3) “crimes, such as theft, directly implicating the cryptocurrency marketplace itself.” In addition to detailing the “important relationships that the [DOJ] has built with regulatory and enforcement partners both within the [U.S.] government and around the world,” including the SEC, the CFTC, and Treasury, the report also examines the “ongoing challenges the government faces in cryptocurrency enforcement,” particularly with respect to business models “employed by certain cryptocurrency exchanges, platforms, kiosks, and casinos” and to activities that “may facilitate criminal activity.” Return to Top

Treasury's Federal Insurance Office (FIO) issued a request for information (RFI) on a “future study by FIO (FIO Study) to evaluate the potential effects of the [IAIS’s] insurance capital standard (ICS) on U.S. insurance markets, U.S. consumers, and U.S. insurers” and “how U.S. insurers operating overseas may be affected by the potential implementation of the ICS in other jurisdictions.” In particular, the RFI solicits public input on, among other topics: (1) whether the ICS “could create regulatory capital arbitrage opportunities or have procyclical effects, leading to increased volatility in U.S. insurance markets”; (2) how the “FIO Study [should] consider the potential effects of implementing the [aggregation method] in U.S. insurance markets as compared to implementing the ICS”; (3) whether the FIO study should “consider the potential impact upon U.S. insurance markets if credit rating agencies were to accept the ICS as a global standard”; and (4) the information that “should be considered in evaluating the impact of ICS implementation on the various business lines and the cost and availability of different product types in the U.S. insurance market.” Comments on the RFI are due by Jan. 15, 2021. Speaking at the Atlantic Council Geoeconomics Center, Treasury Deputy Secretary Muzinich discussed the response to the COVID-19 pandemic in both the United States and Europe and identified “several [t]ransatlantic policy areas where cooperation based on shared values is essential,” including investment security, cryptocurrency, and sanctions. Noting that, prior to the pandemic, the “United States and many of [its] European partners were already collaborating on investment security,” he commented that the “pandemic has only increased the sense of urgency,” observing that there “has been a recent groundswell of action by [the United States’] transatlantic partners to either establish or update their investment review regimes” and reporting that “[m]any have reached out to [Treasury] to benefit from [its] expertise given [its] work through CFIUS.” Deputy Secretary Muzinich also stressed that “cooperation is critical” with respect to cryptocurrency, cautioning that “digital currencies can potentially be used to evade existing legal frameworks,” including “those governing anti-money laundering” (AML) and “the countering of terrorist financing.” He emphasized, moreover, that, “even if [regulators] could be assured that the private sector is complying with the letter and spirit of AML laws, there are important remaining concerns that government must consider, such as a digital currency’s potential effects on the monetary base and financial stability.” Although he acknowledged that the “speed and cost advantages of stablecoins are clear,” he argued that, “depending on their structure, [they] can shift some functions traditionally performed by government to the private sector” and said “policymakers on both sides of the Atlantic must continue to work together to take a very hard look at these issues.” With respect to sanctions, he noted that, “[t]hrough the hard work of both the United States and Europe at the Financial Action Task Force, virtually all countries are subject to a rigorous peer review that examines their ability to prevent money laundering and terrorist financing,” but observed that the pandemic “has tested the global financial environment, creating conditions ripe for money laundering, corruption, and fraud,” and reiterated Treasury’s commitment to “ensuring that bad actors do not take advantage of this pandemic to enrich themselves.” Return to Top

Senators Warner (D-VA) and Rounds (R-SD) sent a letter to Treasury Secretary Mnuchin and FHFA Director Calabria seeking to “better understand the Administration’s intentions with respect to the treatment of the taxpayers’ ownership interest in Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac.” Noting that taxpayers have “invested approximately $222 billion to keep GSEs solvent coming out of the Great Recession and committed to purchasing an additional $254 billion as a backstop going forward,” the senators stress the importance of “honoring the taxpayers’ ownership interest in the GSEs in future administrative actions” and argue that, if the “ownership interest of the taxpayers is to be reduced, they must be paid a fair market value for whatever interests they are giving up.” Accordingly, they request information on: (1) what the officials consider to be “a fair rate of return . . . for taxpayers if taxpayer ownership interest is reduced”; and (2) whether such compensation will be “sufficient given the taxpayers’ support over the last decade.” Return to Top

The BIS and seven central banks, including the Fed, published a report examining the “feasibility of publicly available” central bank digital currencies (CBDCs) in “helping central banks deliver their public policy objectives” and highlighting certain “CBDC design and technology considerations.” Noting that “CBDC issuance and design are sovereign decisions to be made by each jurisdiction,” the report “does not give an opinion on whether to issue” a CBDC and, instead, outlines the “common principles and the key features a CBDC and supporting infrastructure would need in order to contribute” to such policy objectives. Specifically, the principles emphasize that: (1) a central bank “should not compromise monetary or financial stability by issuing a CBDC”; (2) a CBDC “would need to coexist with and complement existing forms of money”; and (3) a CBDC “should promote innovation and efficiency.” Although it acknowledges the “possible adverse impact of a CBDC on bank funding and financial intermediation, including the potential for destabilizing runs into central bank money,” the report stresses that “[a]ny decision to launch a CBDC would depend on an informed judgment that these risks can be managed” and concludes that a CBDC “robustly meeting these criteria” and “delivering the features set out by [the] group could be an important instrument for central banks to deliver their public policy objectives.” The group of central banks pledges to “continue to work actively and collaboratively on CBDC, further exploring the practical implications of the core features” outlined in the report. The FSB released a report addressing the “use of supervisory (SupTech) and regulatory (RegTech) technology by FSB members and regulated institutions” and the associated “opportunities, risks and challenges” and finding that “SupTech and RegTech tools could have important benefits for financial stability.” In particular, for authorities, the report concludes that the use of SupTech “could improve oversight, surveillance and analytical capabilities, and generate real-time indicators of risk to support forward looking, judgement based, supervision and policymaking.” With respect to regulated institutions, it finds that the use of RegTech could “improve compliance outcomes, enhance risk management capabilities and generate new insights into the business for improved decision-making.” The report also includes the results of a survey of FSB members, which found that: (1) most respondents “had a SupTech, innovation or data strategy in place, with the use of such strategies growing significantly since 2016”; and (2) the “growth in SupTech strategies could be explained by both supply and demand side drivers.” Notwithstanding the opportunities and benefits of SupTech and RegTech, the report notes that “authorities are vigilant to possible risks that could arise from the use of such technologies,” including cyber risk, reputational risk, data quality issues, and “over reliance on SupTech tools.” Finally, the report identifies “areas which might benefit from further exploration and consideration by authorities,” including: (1) the “importance of senior management buy in”; (2) “collaborations both between authorities, but also with technology vendors and regulated institutions”; and (3) the “importance of effective governance frameworks for the use of SupTech and RegTech.” Return to Top

The FSB and IMF published their fifth progress report on the implementation of the second phase of the G20 Data Initiative (DGI-2), which finds that: (1) participating economies “continued to make progress despite the challenges that the COVID-19 pandemic poses to the compilation of many key statistics and data”; (2) “many participating economies support maintaining an organized international collaboration process” to “continue addressing data needs beyond 2021”; and (3) the COVID-19 pandemic “has increased policymakers’ needs to obtain more granular, relevant, and reliable data.” Noting that “[e]merging data needs may include statistics to assess the economic impact” of, among other developments, the COVID-19 pandemic, “climate change and sustainable economic development and finance,” and “fintech and financial stability data issues,” the report concludes that a “new possible organized international collaboration could help address such new data needs” and suggests that the “general framework of a possible new mandate should be considered and defined in the course of 2021,” allowing for a “presentation of the transition toward a new framework in the sixth progress report of the DGI-2.” Return to Top

HOW CAN YOU SAY you trust scientists, and then tell scientists their standards are too onerous?

HOW CAN YOU SAY Covid is not a big deal as your doctors say when you're not yet out of the woods less than a week after you get the virus?

HOW CAN YOU SAY don't let Covid "dominate" your life -- as President DONALD TRUMP did in a video Monday night -- when you've just left a hospital in which you were pumped with experimental medicine that almost no one can get, under the care of a team of world-class physicians in a hospital wing that's for you and you alone?

CNN'S JAKE TAPPER on the TRUMP VIDEO: "I would like to know who at the White House watched this and said, 'Yes, that's great, he caught the virus to lead, this is a winning message, post it.'"

N.Y. POST: "FACE OFF" ... NYT: "LEAVING HOSPITAL, TRUMP MINIMIZES VIRUS RISK" -- with an ANNA MONEYMAKER photo of TRUMP taking his mask off.

NYT'S MAGGIE HABERMAN and ANNIE KARNI, with a Political Memo bug: "Trump's Campaign Saw an Opportunity. He Undermined It": "On Friday, even as President Trump had trouble getting enough oxygen and aides prepared to move him to the nation's top military hospital, some of his campaign advisers saw a potential opportunity.

"If Mr. Trump recovered quickly from his bout with the coronavirus and then appeared sympathetic to the public in how he talked about his own experience and that of millions of other Americans, he could have something of a political reset. The health crisis, one campaign official said, was a setback in a re-election campaign that polls have shown him losing for months, but also a chance to demonstrate a new stance toward the virus that might win over some voters.

“And the president could use that to show from now until the second presidential debate, scheduled for Oct. 15, that the disease is serious but can be combated, and that he was ready to re-enter the campaign.

“While that was the hope, it was severely undermined over the last few days by the president’s own behavior — no more so than Monday when he tweeted to the nation ‘Don’t be afraid of Covid. Don’t let it dominate your life!’ without acknowledging that, as president, he gets far better care than the average citizen. His comments signaled a far likelier reality: that the erratic handling of his illness by Mr. Trump and his aides will remind voters of his administration’s failures and efforts to play down the deadly pandemic for six months.”

HAPPY TUESDAY. We have some personal news. (Is that how this goes?)

AFTER FOUR YEARS at the helm of Playbook, and 11 years for JAKE and nine for ANNA at POLITICO, we’ve decided it’s time for a new adventure. We’ll pass the baton and leave POLITICO at the end of this year.

WHEN WE TOOK OVER in July 2016, we knew we were taking over a unique platform -- but we didn’t quite understand how special it was. Playbookers hail from all over the planet, come from all walks of life and have been waking up every morning, rain or shine, holiday, weekday or weekend, to the POLITICO Playbook for 13 years.

WE’RE REALLY PROUD of what we’ve all been able to do here: Playbook readership has tripled since 2016, we created a popular audio briefing and afternoon edition, hosted events across the country and in D.C. with governors, the vice president, senators, members of the House and nearly every congressional leader. Tax reform. Impeachment. The midterms. USMCA, which was, as you’ve heard, the president’s top legislative priority. The wall. The shutdown. Infrastructure weeks (plural). Two presidential elections. And Covid.

WE'RE VERY GRATEFUL that you have come along for the ride. And what a wild ride it's been -- more than 1,500 Playbooks, dozens of events and a best-selling book.

POLITICO is a massive newsroom filled with loads of talented journalists -- a crew we've been very proud to have been a part of. But, as a smart man once said, this has all been wonderful, now I'm on my way. Thanks to Robert Allbritton, Carrie Budoff Brown, John Harris, Matt Kaminski and Patrick Steel. Most of all, our gut check and terrific editor Blake Hounshell, John Bresnahan and the Hill team and our intrepid Playbookers Eli Okun and Garrett Ross.

WHAT'S NEXT? Playbook has grown significantly over the last four years, and we have no doubt that will continue. As for us -- Anna and Jake -- we're excited to take on a new challenge and we'll have more to say about our next steps soon enough. But first, we have an election to cover, a post-election to report on, a lame duck to help navigate and leadership elections to get in the middle of. Buckle up, it's going to be a hell of a ride. Read the note to staff from Matt and Carrie here

AND NOW back to our regular programming. ... 28 DAYS until Election Day -- four weeks from today.

NEW: SPEAKER NANCY PELOSI told House Democratic leaders on a conference call Monday evening that her negotiations with Treasury Secretary STEVEN MNUCHIN were going "very slowly," according to sources on the call. MNUCHIN and PELOSI are scheduled to speak again today.

HAPPENING THIS MORNING: JAKE and ANNA will interview House Democratic Whip JIM CLYBURN (D-S.C.) and former A.G. ERIC HOLDER at 9 A.M. in the latest Playbook Interview. Watch

MARKET WATCH ... WSJ: "U.S. Stocks Close Higher on Signs of Muted Political Risk," by Anna Isaac and Logan Moore

FIRST IN PLAYBOOK ... THE LINCOLN PROJECT is launching a $1 million digital ad campaign in Texas focusing on Trump's "encouragement of violence, extremism, and white supremacist organizations as well as the malice he has shown in both his initial response" to the coronavirus and "his blatant disregard for others when he knowingly exposed countless people to the virus after he knew he was infected." Some ads will be released in Spanish and they will run for a week, with the potential to continue through November. The three ads

GOP DIGS IN ... WAPO'S BOB COSTA: "Republican recalcitrance about the virus persists even as GOP faces growing turmoil": "Widespread Republican recalcitrance about federal health guidelines showed few signs of waning on Monday, even as the party faces growing turmoil following President Trump's hospitalization and as more White House aides test positive for the novel coronavirus.

"White House press secretary Kayleigh McEnany and at least two of her deputies have now contracted the virus, further derailing the functioning of a West Wing plunged into crisis and adding to a long list of top Republicans who have been infected. But many Republicans continue to dismiss calls for alarm — and for changes to the party’s message on the virus and its operations.

“Sen. Ron Johnson (R-Wis.), who tested positive last week, said in an interview with a conservative talk-show host that there is ‘a level of unjustifiable hysteria’ about a virus that has killed nearly 210,000 Americans and asked, ‘Why do we think we actually can stop the progression of a contagious disease?’”
WaPo

-- “A U.S. senator kept taking off his mask on a Delta flight, raising questions about safety oversight,” by WaPo’s Michael Laris and Lori Aratani: “The chairman of the Senate committee that oversees airlines and U.S. transportation policy had his mask off for extended periods on a Delta flight to Mississippi on Thursday night, according to another passenger, and the company said he had to be reminded twice by a flight attendant to follow the airline’s mask requirement.

“The next day, the Trump administration rejected a union petition calling for a federal mandate requiring masks be worn on planes, trains and buses, saying the Department of Transportation ‘embraces the notion that there should be no more regulations than necessary.’”

UP NEXT ... THE VP DEBATE ... CHRIS CADELAGO: “Harris preps to take on Pence”: “Harris’ tone toward the laid-up president is expected to mirror Biden’s of late, according to aides and allies. The Democratic presidential contender and Harris have wished the president a speedy recovery. Their campaign pulled negative TV ads and implored staff to refrain from piling on to reporters and on social media, though as Trump emerged from the hospital late Monday, Biden suggested he would not let him off the hook for not wearing a mask and flaunting social distancing protocols.

“The grim circumstances don’t change Harris’ overarching objective: to methodically yolk Pence to the Trump administration’s months of failures to contain the virus, zeroing in on his role as chair of the White House Coronavirus Task Force. The legal threat to the Affordable Care Act — clarified by the battle over the late Supreme Court Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg’s seat — will be another focal point for Harris. And after Justices Clarence Thomas and Samuel Alito lamented Monday the ‘ruinous consequences for religious liberty’ of the court’s decision that granted marriage rights — and signaled that the ruling should be reconsidered — the VP contenders’ sharply divergent records on same-sex marriage are likely to surface.

“Harris’ aides view Pence as a far more polished and disciplined orator than the president. Unlike with Trump, they say, when Pence says something untrue it is packaged in language that makes it harder to spot and counter in real time. But Harris will attempt to pin him down on Trump’s stewardship of the sputtering economy and explosive remarks on race and groups tied to white supremacy.”

THE FIGHT FOR FLORIDA ...

-- AP'S WILL WEISSERT and BILL BARROW in Miami: "The Democratic presidential nominee made his second trip to Florida in a little over two weeks on Monday. His visit to Miami was designed to encroach on some of Trump's turf, even swinging through Little Havana, a typically conservative area known for its staunch opposition to the communist government that Fidel Castro installed in Cuba."

-- SABRINA RODRÍGUEZ and MARC CAPUTO in Miami: "Biden mounts late fight for Miami": "After months of dire warnings that Donald Trump is making gains in this liberal bastion, Joe Biden is finally listening to South Florida Democrats. For much of the campaign, Miami Democrats have been sounding the alarm at Biden's relatively tepid support among Democratic-leaning, non-Cuban Hispanic voters here and throughout Florida. The problem was compounded by Trump's outsized support among Cuban Americans."

"Without a big winning margin and high turnout in populous Miami-Dade County, Biden would have little chance of winning the state. So over the past two months, Biden's campaign responded by embarking on a hiring spree in South Florida, giving more local-press interviews and, in combination with outside groups, pouring $23 million into TV commercials in the Miami media market, according to data from the tracking firm Advertising Analytics."

"Ad Analytics data show that Biden's campaign significantly outspent Trump in Spanish-language television ads in Florida over the last five weeks — spending a total of $3.1 million to Trump's $2 million — and is blanketing African American newspapers and Jamaican and Haitian radio stations with ads."

TRUMP'S TUESDAY -- The president has no public events.

ON THE TRAIL -- JOE BIDEN will attend a virtual fundraiser in the afternoon. Afterward, he will travel to Gettysburg, Pa., to deliver a campaign speech.

-- WHAT BIDEN WILL SAY, per an aide: "Biden will call on Americans to come together. He'll highlight the need for people to work together and to reach across the aisle in order to address the crises we face. He'll remind voters that we are in a battle for the soul of the nation -- but it's a battle that we've won again and again throughout American history, and that we can and will come together and win again."

ACB WATCH -- “I’ll go in a moon suit”: Covid outbreak leaves GOP unfazed in SCOTUS fight. by Marianne LeVine: “Senate Republicans are still moving forward with confirming Amy Coney Barrett to the Supreme Court — and they’re making no apologies for it. Senate Republicans, in statements and interviews Monday, defended their decision not to slow down their timeline for Barrett’s confirmation even as the coronavirus rips through Washington. ...

“The majority of Republicans want to see Barrett confirmed before the Nov. 3 election and not a single GOP senator suggested Monday that the coronavirus cases in the Senate would throw them off track. ‘I don’t think anything’s changed, I think Senator Schumer wants to vote in February, most of my Republican colleagues want to vote Thursday,’ said Sen. John Kennedy (R-La.), a member of the Senate Judiciary Committee, who plans to attend the hearing in person. ‘I figure we’ll meet in the middle and vote some time before the election.’ ...

“[Sen. Ron] Johnson (R-Wis.), who revealed Saturday he has coronavirus and will stay isolated until his doctor gives him the all-clear, said in an interview with The Ross Kaminsky Show that he would do whatever it takes to vote for Barrett, even with a positive diagnosis. ‘If we have to go in and vote, I’ve already told leadership I’ll go in a moon suit,’ said Johnson, who canceled his in-state events to prevent having to go into self-quarantine before the vote. ‘I would certainly try to find a way, making sure that everybody was safe ... where there’s a will there’s a way.’”

NYT’S ANA SWANSON: “Top China Critic Becomes Its Defender”: “For decades, Robert E. Lighthizer, the United States trade representative, was reliably one of Washington’s toughest critics when it came to China and its trade practices.

“But since brokering a trade deal with Beijing in January, he has become one of China’s biggest defenders within the administration, emerging as an obstacle to lawmakers and other top White House officials who want to punish China over its treatment of ethnic Muslims and begin trade talks with Taiwan.

“Over the past several months, Mr. Lighthizer has pushed back on several proposed policy measures that rankled Beijing, arguing those efforts could disrupt the U.S.-China trade pact that he and President Trump spent more than two years trying to forge, according to several former government officials and other people familiar with the conversations. Mr. Lighthizer has also curtailed his public criticisms of China, instead touting Beijing’s efforts to uphold the trade pact and live up to its end of the deal.”

SWAMP READ -- “IRS Investigating NRA’s Wayne LaPierre for Possible Tax Fraud,” by WSJ’s Mark Maremont and Aruna Viswanatha: “The Internal Revenue Service is investigating longtime National Rifle Association CEO Wayne LaPierre for possible criminal tax fraud related to his personal taxes, according to people familiar with the matter.

“Mr. LaPierre was paid $2.2 million by the NRA in 2018, the most recent year available, the nonprofit group’s public filings show. His total reported pay from 2014 to 2018 was $11.2 million.

“In August, he was charged in a civil suit by New York Attorney General Letitia James with taking millions of dollars of allegedly undisclosed compensation from the NRA and its vendors, in the form of free yacht trips, private jet flights for his family, exotic safaris and other benefits.

“Asked at a news conference announcing the lawsuit whether she believed Mr. LaPierre had evaded personal taxes, Ms. James declined to comment but said she was referring the matter to the IRS.”

BEYOND THE BELTWAY -- “‘It is not acceptable’: Cuomo, de Blasio at odds as Covid surges in New York,” by David Giambusso, Sally Goldenberg and Amanda Eisenberg in New York: “New York City is reliving some of the nightmares it endured earlier this spring as coronavirus cases begin to surge, and once again Gov. Andrew Cuomo and Mayor Bill de Blasio are pointing fingers and offering conflicting guidance.

“The latest outbreaks have sparked fears of a second wave in America’s biggest city, once the national epicenter of the Covid-19 outbreak. Nine zip codes with large Orthodox Jewish communities have formed the nucleus of rising cases, and city officials have warned for weeks that it’s begun to spread to surrounding neighborhoods — a Pandora’s Box that could send the city back to the days of overflowing morgues and war-zone hospitals.” POLITICO MEDIAWATCH -- “L.A. Times Editor Norman Pearlstine to step down,” by LAT’s Meg James: “Los Angeles Times Executive Editor Norman Pearlstine announced that he would soon step down and that the paper was launching a search for a new top editor. Pearlstine, who celebrated his 78th birthday over the weekend, made the announcement Monday morning during a meeting with top editors and then in a note to staff members. ...

“In his two years at the top, Pearlstine stabilized a newsroom that had been battered by years of layoffs, cost-cutting and mismanagement under its former owner Tribune Publishing ... He led a dramatic hiring spree, replenishing the paper’s beleaguered ranks, recruiting top editors and working to improve technology used to generate a larger audience for its journalism. But Pearlstine’s efforts became overshadowed in the last six months by a series of controversies.”

DRIVING THE DAY

HAPPY MONDAY ... 43 DAYS until Election Day.

THE WHITE HOUSE is considering nominating the following women for the Supreme Court, according to a source with knowledge of the process:

-- AMY CONEY BARRETT, the 7th Circuit appeals judge from Indiana. She is a clear favorite at the moment. More from Ben Schreckinger ... NYT's Elizabeth Dias and Adam Liptak on the conservative love for Barrett

-- KATE TODD, the White House deputy counsel who helps vet federal judges. She was a clerk for Justice CLARENCE THOMAS.

-- BARBARA LAGOA, the federal appeals judge from Florida. There seems to be a lot of outside energy around LAGOA, and that energy isn't exactly matched in some corners of the White House. More from Gary Fineout, Marc Caputo and Matt Dixon about how she could clinch Florida for President Donald Trump

-- ALLISON RUSHING, a federal judge from North Carolina who formerly worked at Williams and Connolly.

EXPECT A NOMINATION announcement this week -- PETER BAKER and MAGGIE HABERMAN wrote on A1 of the NYT that it could come as soon as Tuesday. Driving this process: White House chief of staff MARK MEADOWS and White House counsel PAT CIPOLLONE. ALSO THIS WEEK: government funding on the floor of the House, and maybe -- just maybe! -- new Covid relief talks?!

FOR THOSE COUNTING AT HOME ... ANDREW DESIDERIO and NOLAN MCCASKILL: "On Sunday, [Senate Majority Leader Mitch] McConnell (R-Ky.) won the support of Sen. Lamar Alexander (R-Tenn.), who is retiring and was viewed as a potential swing vote as McConnell seeks to confirm Ginsburg's replacement as soon as possible.

“No one should be surprised that a Republican Senate majority would vote on a Republican president's Supreme Court nomination, even during a presidential election year,' Alexander said in a statement. 'The Constitution gives senators the power to do it. The voters who elected them expect it.'

“Sen. Roy Blunt (R-Mo.), a member of McConnell's leadership team, also backed the majority leader over the weekend, as did Sen. Rob Portman (R-Ohio), a moderate.” POLITICO

WATCH THE SWARM: The person every reporter will be looking to talk to today is Sen. MITT ROMNEY (R-Utah). He has not yet weighed in on whether Trump's nominee should get a vote this year.

HERE'S A QUESTION WORTH PONDERING: Does the Supreme Court fight make Covid relief more or less likely? We can argue it either way. More likely: Everyone's eyes are somewhere else, so MEADOWS/Treasury Secretary STEVEN MNUCHIN can quietly approach the Democrats. Less likely: A Supreme Court vacancy is all-consuming. It sucks up all the oxygen, especially so close to the election.

REMEMBER: 9 DAYS until the government shuts down.

Good Monday morning.

BATTLE FOR THE SENATE ... SABATO'S CRYSTAL BALL is moving Sen. SUSAN COLLINS' (R-Maine) race to lean Democrat and Sen. LINDSEY GRAHAM'S (R-S.C.) from likely Republican to lean Republican.

WSJ: “Biden Leads Trump Among Latino Voters, Poll Shows.” by Tarini Parti and Madeline Ngo: “Democratic presidential nominee Joe Biden holds a significant lead over President Trump among registered Latino voters, garnering 62% of support, compared with Mr. Trump's 26%, according to a new Wall Street Journal/NBC/Telemundo poll.

“The survey finds Mr. Trump's support among Latinos to be roughly in line with his standing in 2016. Former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton won 66% of the Latino vote, exit polls found that year, while Mr. Trump received 28%. About 12% of Latino voters remain undecided this year, the new survey finds.”

-- DETROIT FREE PRESS: "Kamala Harris to visit Michigan on Tuesday." by Nisa Khan: "U.S. Sen. Kamala Harris, the Democratic vice presidential nominee, will be visiting Detroit and Flint on Tuesday."

WORRYING TRENDLINE FOR TRUMP ... DAVID SIDERS: "It's a big, big swing': Trump loses ground with white voters": "Donald Trump is making modest inroads with Latinos. Polls suggest he's pulling slightly more Black support than in 2016. But Trump is tilting at the margins with those groups. His bigger problem is the demographic that sent him to the White House — white voters, whose embrace of Trump appears to be slipping in critical, predominantly white swing states.

"In Minnesota, where the contest between Trump and Joe Biden had seemed to tighten in recent weeks — and where both candidates stumped on Friday — a CBS News/YouGov survey last week had Trump running 2 percentage points behind Biden with white voters, after carrying them by 7 points in 2016. Even among white voters without college degrees — Trump's base — the president was far short of the margin he put up against Hillary Clinton there.

"It's the same story in Wisconsin, where Trump won non-college educated white women by 16 percentage points four years ago but is now losing them by 9 percentage points, according to an ABC News/Washington Post poll. In Pennsylvania, Biden has now pulled even with Trump among white voters, according to an NBC News/Marist Poll. In 2016, white voters cast over 80 percent of the vote in each of the three states, according to exit polls." POLITICO

SMART STORY ... BIDEN OUT OF STEP? -- "Liberals want blood. Joe Biden is sticking with bipartisanship," by Christopher Cadelago: "Liberals are furious. And they want Joe Biden to channel their angst and calm their nerves by advocating for every tactical maneuver available to stall Donald Trump's coming Supreme Court nomination in the Senate.

"Joe Biden did something else on Sunday, using his first extended remarks about the future of the high court since the death of Ruth Bader Ginsburg to strike notes that have formed the basis of his campaign: Respect for precedent, appeals to reason, bipartisanship, devotion to checks and balances.

"In imploring a handful of Republican senators who control the fate of Trump's third nomination in four years to defy the president, Biden again landed squarely on the themes even many Democrats ridiculed as archaic, possibly naive — right until his party rewarded him with the nomination.

"So, it's not surprising that Biden skipped over progressive wish-list items like court packing, something he said more than a year ago would cause Democrats to "rue that day." While some Democrats want him to embrace and advocate court reforms more broadly, privately, one official said he saw the speech as designed to address the moment, rather than moments that still might come." POLITICO CULTURE WARS ARE BACK -- "Abortion Was Back-Burnered in the Presidential Race. Not Anymore," by NYT's Lisa Lerer and Elizabeth Dias: "For months, abortion has been relegated to a back burner in the presidential campaign, eclipsed by a worldwide pandemic, an economic crisis and protests over racial justice. But the death of Justice Ginsburg and the looming confirmation battle to replace her could force the candidates to discuss a volatile issue six weeks before Election Day that carries significant political risks for both sides, even as it energizes portions of their bases.

“Mainstream views on abortion are more moderate than those of the activists on either wing, with most Americans saying that abortions should be legal with some restrictions. An all-out fight over abortion could further alienate the more moderate suburban voters both sides are competing for. Democrats especially must navigate their own divisions over how far to push an issue that Mr. Biden has long found personally uncomfortable.” NYT

A HEADLINE NO ONE PREDICTED -- “Biden takes huge cash lead over Trump while outspending him 2-to-1,” by Elena Schneider: “For the first time this election, Joe Biden is sitting on the biggest pile of cash — and he’s vastly outspending President Donald Trump, too. Biden is entering the final stretch of the general election with $141 million more in the bank than Trump, a stunning reversal of fortunes from last spring, when Trump held a hefty financial edge as the nearly broke Biden emerged from the Democratic nominating contest.

“Biden and the Democratic National Committee, along with their affiliated joint-fundraising groups, have $466 million in the bank, according to a Biden campaign official, after raising a record-shattering $365 million last month. Trump and the Republican National Committee, meanwhile, are sitting on $325 million in the bank, Trump campaign spokesman Tim Murtaugh said.” POLITICO

FOR YOUR RADAR -- “AP sources: Woman accused of sending ricin letter arrested.” by Michael Balsamo, Eric Tucker and Colleen Long: “A woman suspected of sending an envelope containing the poison ricin, which was addressed to White House, has been arrested at the New York-Canada border, three law enforcement officials told The Associated Press.

“The letter had been intercepted earlier this week before it reached the White House. The woman was taken into custody by U.S. Customs and Border Protection officers at the Peace Bridge border crossing near Buffalo and is expected to face federal charges, the officials said Sunday. Her name was not immediately released.

“The letter addressed to the White House appeared to have originated in Canada, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police have said. It was intercepted at a government facility that screens mail addressed to the White House and President Donald Trump and a preliminary investigation indicated it tested positive for ricin, according to the officials.”

BUSINESS BURST -- “TikTok Deal Faces Questions Over Security, Ownership,” by WSJ’s John McKinnon, Alex Leary and Kate Davidson: “An emerging deal to make China’s popular TikTok app a U.S.-based company stands to reshape the social-media landscape, even as questions persisted Sunday over security concerns and ownership of the new company.

“The deal — approved in concept by President Trump this weekend, but pending final approval by the companies involved—would create an online power that could challenge Facebook Inc.’s dominance in social media and become a template for partnerships with other Chinese-owned apps.

“The plan calls for Oracle Corp. and Walmart Inc. to form partnerships with TikTok’s owner, ByteDance Ltd. of Beijing, to become a new U.S.-based company called TikTok Global. The Commerce Department said it would delay for one week a ban on U.S. downloads and updates for the TikTok app that was set to take effect at 11:59 p.m. Sunday while the new deal for TikTok is finalized by the companies and investors involved.” WSJ

-- “TikTok Deal Exposes a Security Gap, and a Missing China Strategy,” by NYT’s David Sanger: “But it is far from clear from the details released so far that Mr. Trump’s deal resolves the deeper TikTok security problem — which has less to do with who owns the company and more with who writes the code and the algorithms. The code and algorithms are the magic sauce that Beijing now says, citing its own national security concerns, may not be exported to a foreign adversary.

“And the deal certainly doesn’t resolve the broader problem in the expanding technology wars between Washington and Beijing: how the United States government should deal with the foreign apps that are now, for the first time, becoming deeply embedded on the screens of Americans’ smartphones, and thus in the daily fabric of American digital life.”

DRIVING THE DAY

EVEN IF YOU'RE A REPUBLICAN, you have to admit that the Democratic convention -- which nominated JOE BIDEN on Thursday night -- was a technical success. The Dems programmed a four-night television show, pulling feeds and videos from all across the country, without a major hitch. That's a feat in and of itself -- even if the content itself didn't appeal to you.

REPUBLICANS have a lot to live up to, in that respect. Their convention -- which kicks off Monday -- already seems much different. The TRUMP CAMPAIGN has invited most GOP lawmakers to the White House lawn to watch the president's speech in the middle of a pandemic. They've filed a request to light fireworks on the National Mall. The Democratic convention was all about party unity and trying to defeat President DONALD TRUMP. Unity doesn't appear to be a priority for Republicans -- the White House left some of the president's Capitol Hill enemies off the invite list. The GOP affair next week will be aimed at highlighting what the president has done in his first term -- putting center stage everyday people affected by what the Republicans consider to be policy victories.

CNN'S KAITLAN COLLINS and KEVIN LIPTAK had a bunch of the convention details in this story. Some elements of next week still appear to be a work in progress. On Thursday, a representative for MITCH MCCONNELL said the Senate majority leader would not be participating in the event. But hours later, his staff said he would be submitting a taped video message.

NEW: BILL STEPIEN, Trump's campaign manager, will join us for a virtual interview TUESDAY morning on "PLUG IN WITH PLAYBOOK" to talk about the convention, Trump's reelection bid and much more. The show will kick off at 9 a.m. Register to watch

ABOUT LAST NIGHT ... NATASHA KORECKI and CHRIS CADELAGO in Wilmington, Del.: "Biden just made it a lot harder for Republicans to tag him 'Slow Joe'": "In a campaign riddled with verbal gaffes and setbacks, where his cognitive abilities were questioned and his debate performances criticized, Joe Biden stepped up to the lectern and delivered the biggest speech of his life without a hitch. That in and of itself was no small feat for Biden, known for veering off script or tripping on his words in a way that party Democrats worried could play into the caricature put forward by Donald Trump and Republicans.

“But the Democratic nominee appeared at ease as he struck somber notes about the coronavirus pandemic, at once grieving with those who lost loved ones and promising he would take decisive action if elected in November.

“Look, I understand. I understand how hard it is to have any hope right now. On this summer night let me take a moment to speak to those of you who have lost the most. I have some idea how it feels to lose someone you love,’ Biden said. ‘I know that deep black hole that opens up in the middle of your chest and you feel like you’re being sucked into it. I know how mean, cruel, and unfair life can be sometimes.”

NYT LEDEALL ... ALEX BURNS and KATIE GLUECK: “The party has offered Mr. Biden, 77, less as a traditional partisan standard-bearer than as a comforting national healer, capable of restoring normalcy and calm to the United States and returning its federal government to working order. He has campaigned as an apostle of personal decency and political conciliation, and as a transitional figure who would take on some of the worst American crises -- not just the coronavirus outbreak but also economic inequality, climate change and gun violence -- before handing off power to another generation.”

HOW IT PLAYED ... FRONTS: NYT, banner headline: “BIDEN VOWS TO GUIDE U.S. OUT OF DARKNESS” ... N.Y. POST: “AVERAGE JOE: Biden clears the (low) bar, Dems exhale with relief” ... WSJ: “Biden Makes Case to Oust Trump” ... WAPO: “Biden calls for hopefulness”

FROM 30,000 FEET ... DAVID SIDERS: “Biden finally has his big moment”: “For more than a decade, Joe Biden had been defined by association — to the president he worked for and, in its contrast, to the one he is trying to unseat. On Thursday, Biden set himself apart from them both. Biden, accepting the Democratic Party’s nomination for president on the convention’s final night, expanded on the searing indictment delivered Wednesday by former President Barack Obama and offered his own blistering criticism of President Donald Trump.

“And in a campaign that has served almost singularly as a referendum on Trump, he cast his candidacy as an affirmative alternative — a ‘path of hope and light.’ ‘We can choose a path of becoming angrier, less hopeful, more divided, a path of shadow and suspicion,’ Biden said. ‘Or we can choose a different path and together take this chance to heal, to reform, to unite.” Steven Shepard with the top takeaways

A1, NYT ... JONATHAN MARTIN and SHANE GOLDMACHER, with a News Analysis bug: “Biden Leaves Convention With a Clear Mission: Stop Trump”: “[L]ooming over Mr. Biden’s long-sought presidential nomination was the ever-present shadow of another man who’s poised to dominate the final 10 weeks of the campaign and use his considerable megaphone to drown out Mr. Biden’s pitch: Donald J. Trump.

“The president, who spent the day attacking Mr. Biden in the swing state of Pennsylvania, has been the greatest unifying force at the Democratic convention, given that loathing him is the one thing that everyone in the fractious party can agree on.

“Mr. Biden and the Democrats spent the week prosecuting arguments against him on Covid-19, unemployment, health care, child care, climate change, foreign policy and his fundamental fitness for the presidency — attacks that only presaged a fall campaign that, even when it features Mr. Biden, will be aimed entirely at drawing contrasts with Mr. Trump.

“He’ll wake up every day believing the job is all about him, never about you,’ Mr. Biden said on Thursday night. ‘Is that the America you want for you, your family, your children? I see a different America.”

DEPT. OF CURTAIN MEASURING ... DAVID SIDERS: “Biden is already forming a government. Here’s what his Cabinet could look like.”

L.A. TIMES: “Kamala Harris’ husband, Doug Emhoff, could also make history”: “It’s been an unlikely journey for the 55-year-old Los Angeles entertainment lawyer, who now finds himself in the inner circle of a presidential campaign. Emhoff, who lives in Brentwood, has seen his national profile swell, complete with his own fan club, the #DougHive — women who are thrilled by the novelty of a man comfortably taking a back seat in politics.

“He has more than 250,000 followers on Twitter, where he identifies himself as: ‘Dad, @KamalaHarris hubby, lawyer, wannabe golfer, advocate for justice and equality.’ His posts, sometimes addressed to the #KHive, can tend toward the goofy.”

Robert Trump’s body will also be driven to the White House from New York for the ceremony, according to sources familiar with the arrangements, which are expected to remain private.”

SCOOP -- “Trump Cabinet officials voted in 2018 White House meeting to separate migrant children, say officials,” by NBC’s Julia Ainsley and Jacob Soboroff: “In early May 2018, after weeks of phone calls and private meetings, 11 of the president’s most senior advisers were called to the White House Situation Room, where they were asked, by a show-of-hands vote, to decide the fate of thousands of migrant parents and their children, according to two officials who were there.

“President Donald Trump’s senior adviser Stephen Miller led the meeting, and, according to the two officials, he was angry at what he saw as defiance by Homeland Security Secretary Kirstjen Nielsen. It had been nearly a month since Jeff Sessions, then the attorney general, had launched the Trump administration’s ‘zero tolerance’ policy, announcing that every immigrant who crossed the U.S. border illegally would be prosecuted, including parents with small children.

“But so far, U.S. border agents had not begun separating parents from their children to put the plan into action, and Miller, the architect of the administration’s crackdown on undocumented immigrants, was furious about the delay.” NBC

The Louisiana Republican, who is a medical doctor, was tested for the virus after he learned he had been in contact with an individual who tested positive. ‘I am strictly following the direction of our medical experts and strongly encourage others to do the same,’ Cassidy said in a statement.

“According to his office, Cassidy will quarantine for 14 days, as the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention recommends, and is ‘notifying those with whom he may have come into contact.’ His office didn’t say whether the senator, 62, has symptoms, and if so, their severity.”

National Journal: Where Regulators 'Behave Like Adults'

CFTC Chairman Heath Tarbert talks about increasing diversity, overcoming partisanship, and doing an international job from a home office.

By Jerry Hagstrom

Heath Tarbert was sworn in one year ago Wednesday as the chairman of the Commodity Futures Trading Commission. Like many heads of federal agencies, he's gotten quite a bit more than he bargained for during that time, as he's tried to navigate derivatives regulation, as well as commission leadership, in the midst of the coronavirus pandemic.

For starters, it means working from his home in Northwest D.C., beginning at 7 a.m. and ending at 9 p.m.—and being grateful for all the work he did in his first months on the job to get himself up to speed.

In a telephone interview on Tuesday, Tarbert said the CFTC has been telecommuting “nearly 100 percent” since mid-March, conducting meetings over the phone and online. That system, he said, has allowed the agency to continue to protect the integrity of financial markets and sanction firms and individuals for fraudulent activities—even though Tarbert says he always worries about potential volatility and defaults on contracts.

“During a crisis period, more communication is better than less,” Tarbert said, noting that he has increased the number of meetings he holds with agency staff and the other four commissioners.

His day is so long, he said, because he needs to keep in touch with the other financial regulators in the U.S. government and with his counterparts overseas.

In some ways, he said, his efficiency has increased because there “are fewer distractions in the office,” he doesn't need to commute, and he doesn't need “to fly to Basel,” the Swiss city where so many international banking standard-setting meetings take place.

Tarbert said he believes the agency's 700 longtime employees and 300 contractors have adjusted well to a new routine but, for new hires who have started working without ever being in the office, as well as for summer interns, “it's tough.”

It would have been easy to cancel the summer-internship program, he said, but these college students had already lost so much he didn't want them to lose the internships too.

Before his presidential appointment to the CFTC, Tarbert was acting Treasury undersecretary for international affairs; a special counsel on the Senate Banking, Housing, and Urban Affairs Committee in 2009-10 when the Dodd-Frank Act was written; and a law clerk for Supreme Court Justice Clarence Thomas.

But chairing the CFTC, he said, “has been the most rewarding 12 months in my career. I've done a lot of unique and cool things.”

That started with spending the first 100 days in office “making sure I got an understanding of what was going on.”

Too many political appointees in Washington “take the 'ready, fire, aim' approach without taking the time to figure out what is going on,” he said.

To avoid that mistake, he wrote a mission statement saying that the agency wants to protect the integrity of the futures markets without under-regulation or overregulation, and offering a statement of core values that includes “valuing diverse skill sets and backgrounds to achieve our mission”—an important point in a field that has been very white and very male.

Tarbert said he determined that even though the United States is going through “one of the most divisive political environments” and the commission by law has a mix of Republican and Democratic commissioners, “we are a technical agency” that should not be divisive on policy.

The CFTC, he said, should fulfill voters' expectation that officials in Washington “behave like adults.”

When he was a Supreme Court clerk, he said, he observed each justice had his or her own views on cases that did not follow partisan lines, and he has aspired to “follow the values of the judiciary.”

Financial futures dominate the industry, with cybersecurity and cryptocurrencies the hot issues. But Tarbert, a Baltimore native, visited farms, feedlots, and grain elevators in the Midwest because, he said, “the futures industry grew up through ag. If these markets aren't working for farmers and ranchers, they aren't working.”

Tarbert had to cancel this year's CFTC ag meeting in Kansas City, but overall he has held 12 public meetings in the past year, more than the commission held in the last six years combined.

In the early weeks of the pandemic, ranchers were upset by market volatility and high consumer prices, so Tarbert appointed a Livestock Market Task Force and a liaison with the Agriculture Department.

He also convinced the White House and appropriators to increase the budget to implement the Dodd-Frank Act.

The CFTC's Democratic commissioners have agreed with the Republicans on most of the 18 rules that have been issued this year, but they said Tarbert's proposed rule on limiting positions in the derivatives market to comply with the Dodd-Frank Act was not strict enough. The issue has vexed the commission for 10 years.

Tarbert said he's now going through public comments on position limits and talking with his fellow commissioners. Even if the Democratic commissioners don't vote for the final rule, he said, they will have been consulted.

Law360: CFTC Says Fla. Precious Metals Co. Ran Ponzi Scheme

By Clark Mindock

The Commodity Futures Trading Commission on Thursday sued a now-defunct company that claimed to invest in leveraged precious metals, accusing it of swindling customers out of nearly $900,000 in a Ponzi-style scheme in which company executives pocketed the money.

The commission said in a Florida federal court complaint that Alista Group LLC and three men running the company set up an aggressive campaign that involved cold-calling potential customers and encouraging them to invest in leveraged precious metals. That effort brought in $890,500 from 19 customers, according to the complaint.

But instead of investing that money in customer accounts, the Alista trio set up accounts in the name of the company, the CFTC says. The agency alleges that Marvin W. Courson III, Christopher A. Kertatos and Luis M. Pineda Palacios used some of the money to pay interest charges, fees and personal expenses including food and entertainment and would sell off holdings to pay customers who wanted to cash out.

During the period Alista operated, from 2016 until the end of 2017, the company was banned from trading with a California-based precious metal dealer and then set up an account in the Cayman Islands with a straw account in the name of a French individual who had contributed no money to the funds himself, according to the complaint.

"In connection with this activity, Alista, Courson, and Kertatos defrauded these retail customers by misappropriating their funds to, among other things, speculate in precious metals for Alista's own account, pay Alista's business expenses, and make Ponzi-style payments to customers who sought to cash out some of their purported holdings," the complaint said.

In a statement, the CFTC said Courson and Kertatos "defrauded these customers by misappropriating their funds to speculate in precious metals for Alista's own account, paid Alista's business expenses, and made Ponzi-style payments to customers who attempted to cash out some of their purported holdings."

Kertatos and Palacios are accused of defrauding Alista customers by using bank accounts under their personal control to accept funds from those customers and then misappropriate the money for personal use or for expenses unrelated to leveraged precious metal transactions.

According to the complaint, Alista was registered in Georgia in 2016 but did much of its business from offices in Florida. During the first nine months that it operated, the company had little success. The company then began aggressively cold-calling potential customers.

The complaint details several instances in which funds were allegedly misallocated, including in mid-2017, when the company took nearly $240,000 of customer funds and leveraged precious metals in the company's name instead of in customers' names. Later in 2017, the complaint alleges, holdings were sold off to pay off a customer who wanted to withdraw and some of the proceeds were used for business and personal expenses of individuals at the company.

The commission is seeking to force the company to return funds to the customers who have been allegedly defrauded, to ban the company from future trading and to impose a civil penalty.

The complaint said that Courson was sentenced in 2009 to 94 months in prison following a guilty plea on charges of conspiracy to distribute cocaine. Kertatos was sentenced to 42 months in 2011 after a guilty plea for conspiring to commit mail fraud.

The commission is represented by Alan I. Edelman and Alison B. Wilson with the Commodities Futures Trading Commission division of enforcement.

Counsel for the defendants was not immediately available.

The case is the Commodity Futures Trading Commission v. The Alista Group LLC et al., case number 2:20-cv-00503, in the U.S. District Court for the Middle District of Florida.

Bloomberg Law: CFTC Charges Florida Men with Precious Metals Ponzi Scheme

By Lydia Beyoud

- COURT: M.D. Fla.
- TRACK DOCKET: No. 2:20-cv-00503
- COMPANY INFO: Alista Group, LLC

The Commodity Futures Trading Commission charged three Florida men and their company, the Alista Group, for allegedly engaging in a precious metals trading Ponzi scheme.

Marvin Courson III, Christopher Kertatos and Luis Pineda Palacios enticed customers into nearly $900,000 worth of illegal, off-exchange leveraged precious metals trades, the CFTC alleged in a complaint filed Thursday in the U.S. District Court for the Middle District of Florida.

Leveraged precious metals transactions generally refer to customers paying only a portion of the cost of the commodity, with the remainder financed by a broker-dealer. Price changes in the commodity can result in major wins or losses for the customers, potentially causing them to owe more than they initially deposited in their account.

The men used customer funds for personal and business expenses and to make Ponzi-type payments to customers who wanted to cash out, the CFTC said.

Kertatos was previously convicted for mail fraud related to a $1.6 million scam involving precious metals trading, according to the complaint.

The men never opened leveraged precious metals accounts on behalf of their customers, except for two transactions, the CFTC said. They instead used customer funds for their own leveraged precious metals trading, it said.

The men used a precious metals dealer in the Cayman Islands after a U.S. dealer closed their account after becoming aware the Alista Group was operating as a broker dealer.

The company eventually had to liquidate all the funds it held to pay more than $480,000 in margin calls owed to the U.S. precious metals dealer.

Causes of Action: Fraud by misappropriation in connection with retail commodity transactions, illegal off-exchange financed transactions

Relief: Injunctive relief, equitable relief, restitution, civil monetary penalties.

Response: Attorneys for the defendants weren't listed on the docket and couldn't be identified for comment.

The case is CFTC v. The Alista Group, LLC, M.D. Fla., No. 20-cv-00503, complaint filed 7/16/20.

FT: UK Probes Lawyer Linked to Binary Options Scandal

Israeli lawyer under investigation for possible money laundering

By Kadhim Shubber and Jane Croft

An Israeli lawyer linked to a high-profile binary options fraud scheme is under investigation in the UK for possible money laundering and conspiracy to defraud, the Financial Times can reveal.

Moshe Strugano, 50, had provided a legal opinion used by the operators of the websites BinaryBook and BigOption to underpin the sale to US investors of risky financial products called binary options, which have been the target of a global crackdown by regulators.

Last year, the former chief executive of a company behind those websites was sentenced to 22 years in prison for defrauding US and other investors. US prosecutors said the scheme “targeted and defrauded thousands of victims” including retirees and military veterans.

Mr Strugano was arrested in early 2019 by City of London police and released on bail, according to UK court records and a person familiar with the matter. A police spokesperson said their investigation was ongoing.

“The City of London police is currently conducting a number of enquiries to assist with the Crown Prosecution Service’s decision on charging advice for a number of individuals who are under investigation in this case,” the spokesperson told the Financial Times.

Mr Strugano had been arrested on suspicion of money laundering and conspiracy to defraud, according to a public court listing at London’s Westminster Magistrates’ Court, and released on police bail without charge, pending further enquiries.

Further details of the suspected offences under investigation and the identities of any other suspects were not available. Earlier this month, the Crown Prosecution Service said no charges had been brought but declined to comment further.

The US takedown of BinaryBook and BigOption resulted in the convictions of six individuals and indictments against a further 15 people. Mr Strugano was not charged or accused of wrongdoing in that case.

Binary options allowed investors to wager on whether stocks or other assets would go up or down over a fixed period. Regulators in the US, Europe and Israel have sought to stamp out the products, likening them to unregulated gambling and warning of the risks of fraud.

US prosecutors said investors bought more than $100m worth of binary options through BinaryBook and BigOption after they were misled about the expected returns and their ability to withdraw funds from their accounts.

Lee Elbaz, the former chief executive of Yukom Communications, an Israeli sales and marketing company at the centre of the scheme, was convicted at trial last summer in Maryland and sentenced to 22 years in prison.

Part of the defence case was that Elbaz had relied on legal opinions indicating that BinaryBook and BigOption were lawfully selling to investors in the US. One of those opinions was from Mr Strugano, though the document was ultimately not introduced at trial.

His April 2016 opinion issued to the parent entity of Yukom, a UK-registered holding company called WSB Investment Ltd, was dated two days after the US Commodity Futures Trading Commission had warned the public that BinaryBook had not registered with the agency despite conducting activities that appeared to require registration.

Mr Strugano had claimed online that he was joining Elbaz’s defence team last year, though he did not appear on the federal court docket. Elbaz has appealed against her sentence and her conviction.

Mr Strugano’s personal website says he got his law degree from the University of East London before working for JPMorgan and then for an unnamed private investment company. It adds he is “committed to help others and to do his part for the environment”.

His Tel Aviv-based law firm, Moshe Strugano & Co, “specialises in registering and establishing companies around the world” as well as obtaining permits for binary options firms, according to its website.

Mr Strugano and a US lawyer who has represented him did not respond to messages seeking a comment.

FT: S&P 500 Set to Test Ending Week Positive for 2020

European stocks waver as investors seek clues on eventual shape of €750bn pandemic recovery fund

By Harry Dempsey and Hudson Lockett

US stock futures rose on Friday signalling Wall Street could return to positive territory for the year, while European equities wavered as investors focused on a vital EU summit for a €750bn pandemic recovery fund.

Futures markets tipped the S&P 500 to gain 0.5 per cent when trading begins on Wall Street. The benchmark stock index, which is on track for its third consecutive weekly gain, briefly turned positive for the year earlier this week. However, it failed to hold on to those year-to-date gains as a mixed bag of earnings rolled in and coronavirus cases continued to rise.

The continent-wide benchmark Stoxx 600 was up 0.2 per cent in early afternoon trading, putting the index on course to grind out a third consecutive week of gains. London's FTSE 100 was up 0.6 per cent, after prime minister Boris Johnson urged workers to return to offices in a push for normality by November.

"Amid low summer liquidity, the uneven recovery and the persistent fears of a second wave of infections could keep volatility elevated after the strong second-quarter rally," said Emmanuel Cau, head of European equity strategy at Barclays.

He added that "all eyes are now fixed on the EU summit" over the next two days for clues on how the 27 member states resolve their differences to work towards an agreement on a coronavirus recovery fund for the bloc, alongside a renewed EU budget for 2021-27.

"We expect the recovery fund to be watered down," warned strategists at ABN Amro, with the proposed split of €500bn for grants and €250bn for loans likely to be skewed towards becoming more evenly balanced.

Mark Rutte, prime minister of the Netherlands, told a Dutch broadcaster that he was "not optimistic" before the talks. He added that the Netherlands, one of the so-called frugal four, will stick to its position that countries receiving support must sign up to economic reforms.

Salman Baig, investment manager at Swiss asset manager Unigestion, said the comments were a "bit of jawboning" and more fiscal support was likely given low borrowing costs. "When we look at the fundamentals, governments still need to support the economy," he said.

He forecast that global equity markets would push higher in a "staircase" pattern, as opposed to a straight line.

The euro rose 0.4 per cent against the dollar to $1.1427. The yield on 10-year German Bunds, a haven asset for the region, was steady on Friday. Yields rise as bond prices fall.

Spreads between Bunds and other European bonds, a key measure of risk in the region, have tightened since the proposal by France and Germany for a recovery fund in May, suggesting a lower level of perceived risk.

"We judge that about half of the spread tightening across the eurozone will be reversed, given our expectation that the recovery fund will be watered down," said strategists at ABN Amro.

Chinese stocks swung between gains and losses on Friday as state media sought to reassure investors on the outlook for onshore equities following their worst fall in five months.

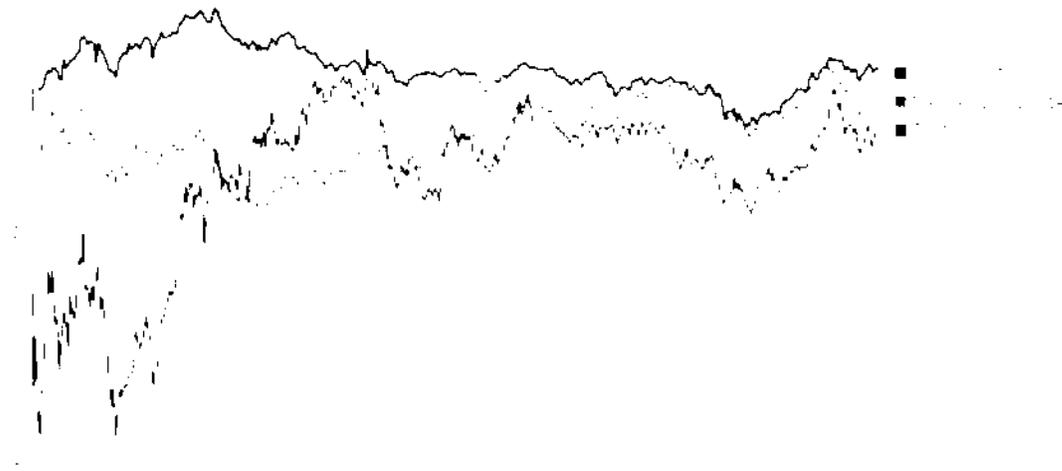

China's CSI 300 index of Shanghai and Shenzhen-listed stocks reversed course multiple times throughout the session to close up 0.6 per cent.

Elsewhere in the region, Hong Kong's Hang Seng index closed up 0.5 per cent and Australia's S&P/ASX 200 rose 0.4 per cent, while Japan's benchmark Topix index fell 0.3 per cent.

Oil prices fell with Brent crude, the international benchmark, off 0.7 per cent at $43.06 a barrel.

WSJ: Stocks End Lower as Economic Concerns Flare Up

Chinese stocks drop by most in five months as retail sector's slow recovery suggests a choppy rebound
By Caitlin Ostroff and Paul Vigna

U.S. stocks fell Thursday, while Chinese stocks suffered their biggest drop in more than five months, on fresh concerns about rising coronavirus infections and the global economy's faltering recovery from the pandemic.

The Dow Jones Industrial Average lost 135.39 points, or 0.5%, to 26734.71, snapping a four-session winning streak. The S&P 500 dropped 10.99 points, or 0.3%, to 3215.57. The Nasdaq Composite fell 76.66 points, or 0.7%, to 10473.83.

After surging in April and May, the stock market's rally has slowed in recent weeks. The Nasdaq has hit new records, but the S&P 500 has been moving sideways as signs of a nascent economic recovery have been undercut by the expansion of the pandemic in the U.S.

"It's just a tug of war," said Esty Dwek, a strategist at Natixis Investment Managers. "None of these risks look like they will entirely derail the recovery or rally, but you have to get over these hurdles to get the next leg up, and right now we still have a few of these hurdles to pass."

Unless the pandemic forces a renewed total lockdown, Ms. Dwek says she expects the markets and economy to keep moving forward. "We're on our way to recovery," she said, "it's just not a straight line up."

Fresh figures on U.S. jobless claims showed that 1.3 million Americans filed for unemployment in the week ended July 11. The weekly tally of new unemployment claims by laid-off workers has slowly trended downward in recent weeks, but remain at historically high levels.

"The key issue now is concern about a new wave of infections and the potential impact on the economic recovery," said Andrew Hunter, senior U.S. economist at Capital Economics.

Estimated change in monthly sales for retail and food service

U.S. retail sales for June rose 7.5%, more than economists expected, but investors are growing increasingly concerned that further recovery could be stymied by the surge in infections. Some states are closing restaurants, bars and stores to slow its spread, and that's likely to dampen consumer spending, a crucial driver of the U.S. economy.

Among individual stocks, Norwegian Cruise Line tumbled 16% to $15.61 after the company said it is looking to raise $925 million in debt and $250 million in an underwritten public offering of shares because its sailings have been canceled due to the coronavirus pandemic, drying up revenue.

Shares of Bank of America fell 2.7% to $23.93 after it reported its profit tumbled 52% in the second quarter after the bank set aside billions of dollars to prepare for soured loans.

Morgan Stanley shares rose 2.5% to $52.64 after reporting second-quarter earnings rose 45%, setting a record for the firm and topping the expectations of Wall Street analysts.

Twitter's shares fell 1.1% to $35.28 after the social-media company was hit with a widespread attack that allowed hackers to take over an array of accounts including those of celebrities, politicians and billionaires.

And shares of Dell Technologies rose 12% to $59.10 after the company said it is considering a potential spinoff of its 81% equity ownership interest in VMware.

In bond markets, the yield on the 10-year Treasury fell to 0.611%, from 0.629% Wednesday.

Across Asia, most major equity benchmarks ended the day down. Hong Kong's Hang Seng Index retreated 2% to 24970.69, while Japan's Nikkei 225 lost about 0.8% to 22770.36.

The Shanghai Composite Index retreated 4.5% to 3210.10 in its steepest drop since February. Data on Thursday showed pockets of weakness, especially in China's retail sector, even as the world's second-largest economy returned to growth. Meanwhile, the pan-continental Stoxx Europe 600 declined 0.5%.

Data on China's retail sector showed it is recovering more slowly than expected, with sales falling 1.8% in June from a year earlier. Economists had projected 0.3% growth.

Investors also said moves in stock indexes world-wide are likely outside due to lower trading volumes.

"We're entering a period in the summer where liquidity tends to diminish," said Yuko Takano, a portfolio manager at Newton Investment Management. Ms. Takano said she is focusing on corporate earnings over the next few weeks to assess how corporations have fared and expects economic data to remain choppy.

FT: US 30-Year Mortgage Rate Falls Below 3% for First Time

Historic low stokes refinancing boom and props up housing market confidence

By Mamta Badkar and Robert Armstrong

The average interest rate on a 30-year fixed-rate mortgage in the US has fallen below 3 per cent for the first time ever, mortgage finance company Freddie Mac said on Thursday.

The historic figure reflects how policy responses to the coronavirus pandemic have brought down borrowing costs, helping drive a recovery in the US housing market even as other parts of the economy face a more uncertain recovery.

The fresh low of 2.98 per cent — below anything on records dating back to 1971 — was down from 3.03 per cent the previous week.

Doug Duncan, chief economist at Freddie Mac's sister company, Fannie Mae, said that given the big drop in US Treasury yields, mortgage rates had more room to fall. "A two-and-three-quarters [per cent] mortgage is possible next year," he said.

The reason rates have not fallen faster is that the demand for mortgage refinancing has overwhelmed the ability of lenders to originate new loans, according to Mr Duncan.

"There is no point in lowering prices to gain business you can't close anyway," he said.

The availability of long-term fixed rate mortgages in the US is underpinned by the activities of Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac, which parcel them into bonds for sale to investors, providing them with a government guarantee that can make them as attractive as US Treasuries.

Walt Schmidt, head of mortgage strategy at FHN Financial, agreed that rates could go lower, but pointed out that the average mortgage rate obscures an unusually wide range of rates available, depending on individual borrower's credit history.

"There have been a lot of borrowers who have gotten two-handle [under 3 per cent] mortgages for a couple of months now," Mr Schmidt said. "It is like past crises, in that those who don't need financing can get it, and those that need it cannot."

Mortgage lenders are very leery of borrowers with credit blemishes, fearing that they could go into payment forbearance after securing a new mortgage. Recent federal legislation designed to ease the economic effects of coronavirus forces lenders to give customers payment holidays if they are struggling.

The latest mortgage rate figures on Thursday came alongside data that showed US homebuilder confidence in July had returned to levels seen before the pandemic hit.

The National Association of Home Builders' housing market index climbed to 72 in July from 58 the previous month. That exceeded economists' forecasts for a reading of 60, according to a Reuters survey, and matched its reading in March.

"Builders are seeing strong traffic and lots of interest in new construction as existing home inventory remains lean," said NAHB Chairman Chuck Fowke. "Low interest rates are also fuelling demand, and we expect housing to lead an overall economic recovery," he added.

Economists have pointed out that one of the reasons the housing market has recovered quickly is because pandemic-driven job losses have disproportionately affected younger renters as opposed to would-be homebuyers.

Moreover, lower mortgage rates have made home purchases more attractive for those who have held on to their jobs.

FT: Beneath the Headlines of Opec's Production Increase

Your latest energy news: Opec+ eases oil cuts, what Joe Biden's energy plan was missing, forecasters' view of the market

By Derek Brower and Myles McCormick

Opec+ believes the oil market is heading back towards balance. Saudi Arabia and Russia, the group's leaders, decided yesterday to stick with the plan to start raising oil production a bit, phasing out the deep cuts that have helped prop up crude prices at around $40 a barrel.

Our first note looks beyond yesterday's news to ask whether an even faster termination of the cuts is becoming more likely. Our second looks ahead, too, at Joe Biden's energy plan — and explains why the Democratic presidential challenger is eschewing discussion of American oil and gas (production of which soared while he and President Obama were running the country).

Our monthly agency monitor, meanwhile, gives a snapshot of the main forecasters' view of the oil market, and also notes the rise of US net petroleum imports.

Just how much longer will Opec+ stick with its extreme cuts?

"The market must always look at what is beneath the headline," said Abdulaziz bin Salman, Saudi Arabia's energy minister, at the Opec+ joint ministerial monitoring committee meeting yesterday, "as well as our friends in the media."

Indeed. Let's start with the cartel's production from August. In line with the tapering plan agreed months ago, Opec+'s production cuts will now ease from 9.7m to 7.7m barrels a day.

That remains a huge cut — on its own, far bigger than cuts in previous years. But the change means a 2m b/d increase in supply, right? No, said Prince Abdulaziz, because Iraq, Nigeria and other quota-busters will continue to "compensate" for earlier under-compliance, with extra cuts. So the reductions will in practice be closer to 8.1m b/d.

The market will have two problems with this. First, both countries have a terrible record of compliance with Opec cuts. How much discipline will they show when the rest of the group begins lifting output?

The second is how Saudi Arabia would impose discipline. Its established method of doing so — by threatening to open the taps to punish quota cheats — is now defunct. Donald Trump, the orchestrator of Opec+'s historic deal in April, would not allow it. Iraq, Nigeria, and everyone else knows this.

So what comes next?

"The market is very close to balance," said Alexander Novak, Russia's energy minister. To the cartel's credit, this is an incredible outcome given the state of the market a few months ago.

But it will take unusual discipline for the group's producers to maintain compliance. As the late, great Opec commentator Robert Mabro liked to say, Opec is like a teabag — it only works in hot water. That water was scalding in April, but is cooling.

Look further ahead and things become less clear. Opec+ is supposed to increase production again at the start of 2021, adding another 2m b/d. But market conditions will be different by then. Opec's own forecasters, for example, think that between the second and fourth quarters this year, demand for its crude will rise by almost 13m b/d. It produced 22m b/d last month, but the so-called call on Opec will rise to more than 30m b/d by year-end and remain around that level through 2021.

Looking ahead, this means one of three things:

1. Opec+ will keep cutting as planned through 2021, leaving the market about 6m b/d short. Crude stocks would fall — a sound objective. But any price rise would revive non-Opec production (like that in the US).
2. As prices rise, Opec+'s own cuts will end so that the cartel — not its rivals — is able to capture the market share.
3. It is possible that Opec — typically focused on price and short-term outcomes — still doubts its own forecasts.

In short, something does not add up. Looking beneath yesterday's headlines, it seems increasingly plausible that having brought the market to balance so quickly, Opec+'s cuts will end far sooner than its current long-term plan envisages.

What about the oil, Joe?

Joe Biden's energy plan, unveiled on Tuesday, is ambitious. If elected president, he promises to pump $2tn into a programme that would markedly accelerate the transition to clean energy and create millions of jobs in the process.

But one thing was missing. The former vice-president made almost no mention of his plans for the oil and gas sector — a pretty core element of any energy platform. Don't forget, the US is both the world's largest oil and gas producer and by far its biggest market.

Instead, Mr Biden's main focus was jobs — jobs in manufacturing turbines, jobs in retrofitting lighting, jobs in installing charging stations. Electricians, engineers, longshoremen, shipbuilders, iron workers and welders all got a look in.

In fact, Mr Biden mentioned jobs 19 times. The word oil, on the other hand, featured twice — once in relation to irresponsible executives; the other on how much crude would be taken out of the equation by electric vehicles. (He also mentioned creating another 250,000 jobs to clean up abandoned wells.)

This was deliberate. To beat Donald Trump in November, Mr Biden needs to convince a broad church of voters to back him — from Pennsylvania roughnecks to California climate activists: groups whose views on oil and gas (and especially fracking) could not be further apart. The solution has been to avoid big public statements on the issue.

Walking this tightrope has been tricky. During the primaries — when the aim was to win voters from Bernie Sanders — Mr Biden vowed there would be “no ability for the oil industry to continue to drill” and “no new fracking”. That risked doing damage in key swing states like Pennsylvania, where he needs shale workers' support. Last week, he said fracking would not be “on the chopping block”.

The Trump camp wants to paint Mr Biden as “ beholden to the radical socialist ideology” of leftwing Democrats like Mr Sanders and Alexandria Ocasio-Cortez, a New York congresswoman and “Green New Deal” proponent, and claims he would sacrifice millions of oil and gas jobs.

For now at least, Mr Biden has largely managed to avoid tackling the oil and gas question head on — and with it the risk of alienating either wing of his party. Surrogates have tried to calm the nerves of oil and gas workers, assuring them that a drastic overhaul of the sector is not on the cards.

That has not been enough to convince some in the sector who have already made their mind up. In a survey last month by the University of Houston and the Texas Oil and Gas Association, three out of four oil and gas workers said the election of Mr Biden was the greatest threat to their company's well being over the next 12 months — a bigger challenge than oversupply, crippled demand or a coronavirus resurgence.

Underlining the vitriol with which Mr Biden's plan to deal with climate change is viewed in oil heartlands, one columnist wrote in the Galveston News yesterday that his presidency would see the US "destroyed from within".

"Climate change would be the No. 1 priority and if a basic income doesn't shut down the economy, then climate change legislation will," wrote Ray Holbrook.

Oil producers fret over threat to growth from a Biden presidency

Data Drill

The US has secured energy independence again — sort of. American crude production tanked in recent months as producers shut wells during the worst phase of the price crash. As a result, after six months in which it was a net exporter of oil for the first time in decades, the country returned to being a net importer. But with prices up and wells coming back online, that could flip once again: last week, the US exported 75,000 barrels a day more than it imported.

Energy independent: the US is a net exporter again ... barely

Power Points

- The transition from oil to cleaner fuels will happen more quickly than previously thought, says FT columnist Nick Butler.

- Investors are tilting towards clean energy producers. It is another trend that is accelerating the energy transition, argues Alice Ross.
- Japan's environment minister said Tokyo's pledge to end support for coal-fired power generation around the world was a "turning point" for the country's climate strategy.
- The FT's Leslie Hook reports on new start-ups trying to crack technology to suck CO2 from the atmosphere.
- The Dakota Access Pipeline can continue operating in the short term while a legal challenge to its recent suspension is prepared and examined.
- The US has threatened to impose sanctions on any companies helping Russia to build the Nord Stream 2 gas pipeline, Demetri Sevastopulo, Henry Foy and David Sheppard report.

Risk.Net: LME Distressed at Severity of Esma Stress Tests

Watchdog's simulated price shocks said to be unprecedented in metals markets

By Costas Mourselas

The London Metal Exchange is understood to have been left frustrated by its failing grade in the European Securities and Markets Authority's clearing house stress test this week, after the watchdog subjected its default resources to price shocks that were up to three times more severe than the worst one-day falls on record in key base metal markets.

On July 13, Esma released the results of a stress test for Europe's largest central counterparties, which simulated two scenarios: a large price shock along with the default of each CCP's two largest clearing members, and, separately, a price shock accompanied by the default of the single set of two clearing members, which would collectively cause the biggest drain on financial resources at each CCP.

The tests were conducted on the basis of participants' balance sheets as of December 2018 and March 2019. The second stress test found LME Clear would incur €712 million in losses, exceeding its €446 million default fund by €266 million – an amount that would have to be met by cash calls to its clearing members. LME was the only CCP in the test to exceed its default resources.

Risk.net understands Esma's shock was considerably in excess of the hypothetical stress scenarios the LME uses to size its default fund. The test envisaged the bourse's aluminium, copper, nickel, lead, tin and zinc contracts all falling to a considerably larger degree than any have previously on the same day.

It is understood that aluminium prices, for instance, were shocked by -14%. The biggest one-day move for aluminium was a drop of -4.3%, in the immediate aftermath of the default of Lehman Brothers; its biggest two-day move is just under -12%.

The stress test comes amid scrutiny of futures and options clearing house margin models, as Covid-19 ravaged markets in March and April. Multiple clearing banks and some CCPs have suggested the procyclicality demonstrated in some clearers' models during the March market rout mean margin floors need to be set higher, with lengthier margin periods of risk.

Commodity clearers in particular often counter that margining on the basis of more than two days' worth of price moves would force margins higher to such a degree that smaller producers and consumers would be locked out of markets, damaging liquidity and price discovery.

Under the European Market Infrastructure Regulation, CCPs are required to set initial margin on the basis of two-days' worth of net price moves, close to close, on the assumption that it will take two days to close out a defaulter's portfolio.

In a statement, an LME spokesperson drew attention to this apparent disparity.

"LME Clear has been designed from the outset to manage risk in the exchange-traded metal derivative markets, and our systems are designed to take into account the distinct characteristics of those markets," the statement reads.

"The nature of these markets and our historical and hypothetical scenarios lead us to the conclusion a two-day price shock is the appropriate test for exchange-traded metal derivatives – consistent with Emir requirements for CCPs clearing futures business. The Esma stress exercises are designed with a five-day price shock in mind. As such we remain confident that our financial resources and default waterfall processes are fully adequate and appropriate for the markets we clear."

Extreme price dislocations are not unheard of in commodity markets, however. During the Covid lockdown-induced selloff that engulfed markets in March, the LME's copper contract saw successive days of heavy selling, with falls of as much as -9% on March 18. Aluminium, zinc, tin and lead prices all saw intraday price drops of more than -4% the following day.

Conversely, idiosyncratic factors affecting the supply dynamics of a market can have a pronounced effect on individual contracts. LME Nickel prices rocketed by more than 10% in April 2018, when Russian producers were hit by a fresh round of US economic sanctions.

As of end-March 2020, LME Clear had prefunded default resources, beyond initial margin, of $862 million, up from $472 million the same quarter a year ago.

Covid-strength stresses

Esma's report on its stress tests suggested all the scenarios used were of "comparable severity" to the market stresses experienced amid the Covid-19 market scare in March and April, with only "limited exceptions".

"The scenarios can be used to assess the resiliency of CCPs under hypothetical extreme but plausible market movements," says the report.

Fabrizio Planta, the head of markets and data reporting at Esma, said at a July 13 press briefing that the LME's lead regulator – the Bank of England – "reacted immediately" upon being notified of the failure, after Esma had informed the LME's college of supervisors.

"We will certainly analyse if... this would require certain changes to their margin models," he said. "It's too early to say."

In the wake of an unprecedented number of margin breaches among global CCPs, some market participants have questioned whether or not liquidity and concentration add-ons are appropriately calibrated across global CCPs.

In response to a question from Risk.net at the July 13 press conference, Planta suggested Esma was looking into liquidity risk add-ons and their current application across the Union.

Esma did not respond to a request for comment in time for publication.

MLex: LSE-Refinitiv EU Merger Review Clock Stopped

By Natalie McNelis

The EU review of LSE's bid to take over financial data provider Refinitiv has been suspended, according to an update published on the European Commission's website today.

The clock has been stopped since July 13, says the update. Before the suspension, the Brussels-based regulator had until Oct. 27 to decide on the transaction.

The EU opened a phase II probe into the deal on June 22 (see here). It said it was concerned about trading and clearing of various financial instruments and financial data products, specifically electronic trading of European government bonds, trading and clearing of interest-rate derivatives, consolidated real-time data feeds, and index licensing.

LSE is acquiring Refinitiv in an all-share transaction from Blackstone and Thomson Reuters. After the deal, the original shareholders will hold an about 37 percent stake in LSE and less than 30 percent of total LSE voting rights.

The commission's case file number is M.9564.

FT: Bullish US Options Trading Suggests Caution 'Thrown Aside'

Data show rising volumes of rights to buy stocks, rather than sell

By Eric Platt

Traders are betting that US stocks will continue to climb, in a sign that the euphoria that has lifted the benchmark S&P 500 more than 40 per cent from its March low has not fully abated.

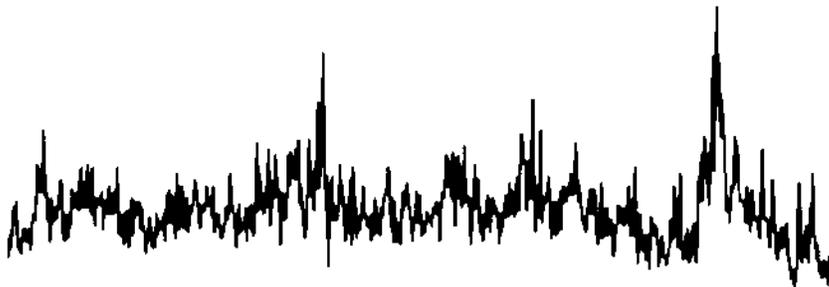

Trading of US equity call options, which offer investors the chance to benefit from a rally in stocks, has in recent weeks far exceeded the volume of put options, which protect investors from a slide in the market, according to exchange group Cboe Global Markets.

On Wednesday the divergence between the two came very close to levels last seen in June — the widest point in six years. The closely followed equity put/call ratio sank to just 0.38, more than 40 per cent below its average over the past five years.

A boom in derivatives trading in recent months has accompanied a rally in US stocks that has pulled the technology-heavy Nasdaq Composite to new highs and put the S&P 500 within 5.2 per cent of its record. Those gains have created unease, with many investors struggling to reconcile rapidly rising valuations with the severity of the Covid-19 crisis.

“It seems like some of the caution is getting thrown aside,” said Chris Dillon, an investment specialist with T Rowe Price. “The market has been very good at getting ahead of the sudden stop” in the economy and the “the sheer scale” of the impact of the pandemic, he added.

Traders are positioned for US stocks to rise

The rise in trading activity has been boosted by retail investors who have turned to options to make bets on the direction of both the overall market and individual companies such as electric car group Tesla, iPhone maker Apple and the bankrupt car hire group Hertz. Options trade at fractions of the cost of the corresponding stock, which can be attractive to retail investors or day traders.

“There is no question that the retail trading public has gotten back involved,” said Jurrien Timmer, director of global macro at Fidelity. “When you’re buying options you have to assume part of that is speculative.”

Options trading has surged this year

Analysts often monitor the put/call ratio as an index of sentiment, with extreme high or low readings seen as clues to possible turns in the market. The June low in the ratio coincided with a high in the S&P 500, which the market has only recently risen back towards, noted Steve Sosnick, the chief investment strategist of Interactive Brokers.

One good reason for higher call volumes is a series of market-boosting interventions from the Federal Reserve, he said, and a conviction among investors that the central bank would act again if prices were to slide.

“If you have people speculating on further gains and faith that the Fed obviates your need to hedge, you end up with a put/call ratio like we have now,” said Mr Sosnick.

Reuters: Exclusive: Natixis Plans Shake-Up to Focus On Greener Lending

By Dmitry Zhdannikov and Julia Payne

French bank Natixis (CNAT.PA) will merge its commodities and infrastructure operations to focus on clean energy in a restructuring sources said was accelerated by a series of loss-making loans to oil traders.

The move by one of the most active banks in commodities lending highlights the struggles of businesses connected to a sector grappling with an oil price collapse, rising bankruptcies and growing pressure to switch attention to greener fuels.

"We are currently working on the creation of an Infrastructure & Energy Transition group in line with the Green Weighting Factor we have been implementing since the end of 2019," a Natixis spokeswoman said on Thursday.

Natixis became the first European bank to introduce internal financial penalties last year through its Green Weighting Factor on deals that are not environmentally friendly.

Dominique Fraisse, the bank's global head of energy and natural resources, left the company recently to pursue other opportunities, the spokeswoman said.

The restructuring will result in some of the 140 people from Fraisse's energy and natural resources team joining 100 people from the infrastructure unit, said three sources familiar with the restructuring. The remaining energy team employees will be part of a different division focused on short and medium-term trade finance, one of the sources said.

Some jobs will be lost, the sources said, adding that it was too early to say how many people the new division will employ.

The decision to restructure was made before the coronavirus crisis but the plan was pushed forward after the bank booked a loss in the first quarter, the sources said.

Along with many of its peers, Natixis was hit by a series of defaults by Asian traders this year and the struggling U.S. shale oil and gas industry, they added.

Natixis declined to comment on how restructuring will affect the existing workforce or on specific trading losses.

The bank set aside 193 million euros ($220.6 million) in provisions for the first quarter and also made provisions in the previous quarter to cover loans made to U.S. natural gas companies.

In its first quarter results, Natixis identified increased risk of fraud and poor performance of loans to Asian companies after the collapse in oil prices.

Natixis was also among lenders to Singapore-based oil trader Hin Leong, which went bust in April.

The bank also has credit outstanding with Asian agricultural trader Agritrade and oil traders ZenRock and Hontop Energy.

Natixis is also part of a consortium of banks behind a Glencore oil pre-payment deal with Congo Republic, which has defaulted on the loan for more than a year.

Risk.Net: Leaked Doc: EU Bans Initial Margin Haircuts to Resolve CCPs

Council will ban resolution authorities from dipping into clearing members' initial margin

By Samuel Wilkes

Leaked documents seen by Risk.net reveal European Union legislators will forbid resolution authorities from being able to raid clearing members' initial margin accounts if a central counterparty (CCP) runs into financial trouble. Banks have long complained the tool would incentivise a dash for the exit as soon as clearers see signs of stress at a clearing house, to reduce their potential exposure to initial margin haircutting.

"[Initial margin haircutting] would incentivise runs on a CCP," says Michael Voisin, a partner and global practice head for capital markets at law firm Linklaters. "The feeling is that if people sense that their initial margin is at risk, they will start closing out their positions rapidly at times of increased risk so as to create a return obligation for the excess initial margin, and so reduce liquidity in the market."

On June 23, the Council of the EU, European Parliament and European Commission reached a political agreement on procedures for resolving a CCP in crisis, known as the CCP recovery and resolution regulation.

A controversial topic surrounding the framework has been whether resolution authorities should be allowed to apply haircuts on initial margin contributions that clearing members and end-users commit. Going into trilogue negotiations, the Council and Parliament had taken opposing stances on the matter.

The Council wanted to ban the tool. The parliament, however, proposed that resolution authorities should have all possible tools on the table. Proponents of initial margin haircutting say resolution authorities need as many resources as possible to cover shortfalls in cash at ailing CCPs quickly.

Documents seen by Risk.net, however, reveal the Council has held firm on the tool's use and the final text will bar resolution authorities from being able to write down or haircut clearing members' initial margin.

"The list of resolution tools will be closed, as proposed by the Council," states a note written by the Croatian presidency of the Council on June 23. "This will also mean that IMH and IM write down will not be used in resolution."

A separate leaked document created on June 30 sets out all three legislatures' proposals before the trilogues and the final compromise text in four separate columns.

The column showing the final compromise mirrors the Council's text on the treatment of initial margin in resolution.

First, it strikes out the provision within the Commission and Parliament's proposals that state resolution authorities can use "any other resolution tool" that meets the objectives of resolution and adheres to a series of defined principles.

That means authorities can only use the tools specified in the legislation.

The final compromise also adds initial margin to a list of liabilities resolution authorities are explicitly not allowed to write down.

Race to the exit

Clearing members are relieved at the exclusion of both IM haircutting and a tool known as forced allocation, which would allocate contracts from a member in default to a member not in default on a mandatory basis.

"The closed list of resolution tools doesn't include initial margin haircutting or the writedown of initial margin, and there's also no forced loss allocation," says Ulrich Karl, head of clearing services at the International Swaps and Derivatives Association. "This means all the tools that are very procyclical and provide very unhelpful incentives for participants to stay with the CCP and support the default management process are out now. So that is a positive outcome."

Karl adds that forced allocation could have a negative impact on clearing members, because the resolution authority may allocate positions to members who don't have expertise in managing those specific contracts. Some clearing members may only focus on certain derivatives instruments, or indeed may avoid clearing exposures they consider too risky.

"Forced allocation is likely unequitable, as it becomes a question of who the resolution authority thinks this position should get allocated to and so who gets the hit," says Karl. "This can provide wrong incentives, as these positions could also be allocated to a member that was prudently not trading the positions."

The threat of initial margin haircutting had clearing members fearing there would be a rush to the exit during a stress event, as clearers close their positions to reduce the amount of initial margin that could be exposed to losses. This could have a second order effect that puts the CCP in deeper trouble as it effectively experiences a run on margin.

Linklaters' Voisin says a dash for the exits also disincentivises clearing members from bidding for a defaulting member's positions. Auctions occur in the earlier stages of a CCP's processes for managing member defaults, with other members invited to purchase the defaulter's positions. The advantage for members is that if suitable buyers are found for the defaulter's portfolio, the CCP is less likely to use other members' default fund contributions.

If clearing members choose to cut exposure to the CCP during a stress event, notes Voisin, that could mean they also have less incentive for participating in auctions, because the risks posed to each member if the auction fails will become smaller.

Philosophical implications

Nathaniel Lalone, a partner at law firm Katten Muchin Rosenmann, says if resolution authorities had the powers to dip into IM, it fundamentally changes the nature of this collateral.

Initial margin is posted by clearing members and end-users to partly cover payments they need to make to counterparties in the event of their own default.

“Superficially, going after initial margin may seem like a very tempting solution for resolution authorities, but the basic legal construct of clearing is that initial margin supports the clearing member’s own portfolio and is not exposed to the losses of other clearing members,” says Lalone. “Haircutting initial margin would seriously weaken this principle of bankruptcy-remoteness and would be not just a material, but a fundamental, change in the legal construct of how clearing works.”

Kay Swinburne, formerly a member of the European Parliament and now vice-president of financial services at consultancy KPMG, agrees IM should not be viewed as a pot of money to prop up a CCP. She had argued in favour of banning initial margin haircutting while she was a co-rapporteur responsible for steering the CCP recovery and resolution regulation through the parliament before the European elections in May 2019.

“It’s not a loose pool of money. It belongs to investors [end-users] who effectively have committed that margin,” she says.

Capital gains

The bankruptcy-remote status mentioned by Lalone is important for banks who are either clearing members or end-users, because it means they avoid having to calculate a counterparty credit risk capital charge on their posted initial margin.

The Basel Committee on Banking Supervision’s standards on capital requirements for bank exposures to central counterparties allow banks to assign zero counterparty risk to their margin if it is bankruptcy-remote. This treatment is included in current rules, and in the forthcoming Basel standards that member jurisdictions are meant to implement by January 2022.

The same provision is held within the EU bank capital laws, known as the Capital Requirements Regulation.

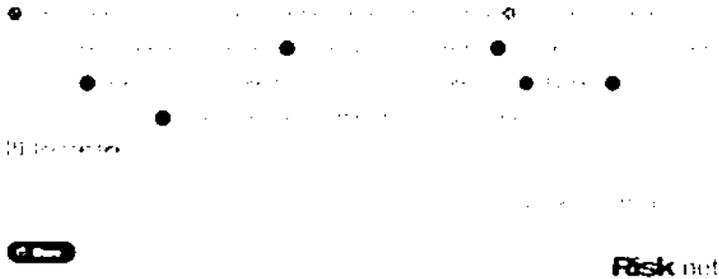

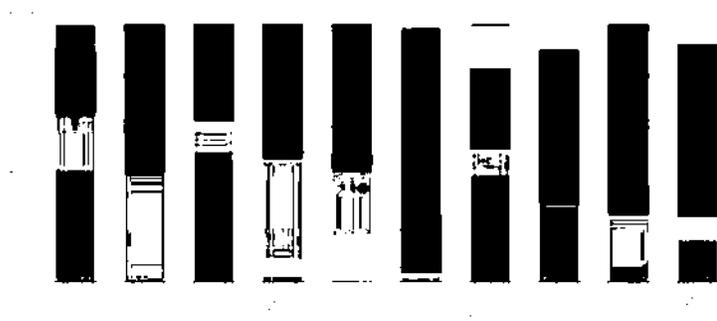

But not all forms of initial margin are bankruptcy-remote. If resolution authorities fail to recapitalise or resolve a CCP and it goes into bankruptcy proceedings, collateral posted as cash is still fair game for the courts to use to cover losses.

“A lot of initial margin is given by way of securities and is insolvency-remote and therefore has a very favourable risk weighting attached to it because it’s not treated as creating exposure to a CCP,” says Linklaters’ Voisin. “Whereas if it could be haircut, then it would need to carry a greater risk weighting and that would have negative regulatory capital implications for the banks.”

Generally, securities posted as collateral are bankruptcy-remote because they are held by a third-party custodian. Cash collateral, however, is held by the CCP and invested by it into securities, which is why it can be tapped by a bankruptcy court as part of the general insolvency estate.

“One of the consequences of insolvency is precisely initial margin haircutting for anybody who put up cash margin, because in an insolvency all senior creditors are treated pari passu,” says Simon Gleeson, a partner at law firm Clifford Chance. “Initial margin creditors are no different from any other sort of creditor, so in a funny sort of way initial margin haircutting is actually the default setting once everything else has failed.”

This is why the majority of collateral posted is in the form of securities. Analysis by Risk Quantum found the most popular form of collateral posted at the largest 10 CCPs were sovereign bonds, which made up 48% of initial margin held by those CCPs on average at the end of September 2019.

If the CCP recovery and resolution regulation works as intended, no CCP should ever get to the point of being insolvent, as resolution authorities try to do everything they can to avoid that scenario.

S&P Global Platts: Vitol, Trafigura Agree First JKM LNG Derivative Contract on Platts eWindow

By Kenneth Foo

LNG trading firms Vitol and Trafigura have agreed the first LNG derivative spot deal on the Platts Editorial Window, or eWindow, on July 16, after the online data-entry platform was launched for the Asia LNG derivatives market last month.

Trafigura submitted an offer of 25 lots for the October JKM contract at $3.05/MMBtu, which was traded by Vitol. There were also four offers and two bids for the September and October contracts submitted by Glencore, BP and Vitol on the same day.

Three out of the four physical cargo bids and offers published during the MOC process on the day were made on a JKM-linked basis.

The Platts eWindow, which was launched on June 26, is an online data-entry and communications tool which brings greater speed, transparency and efficiency to the Market on Close (MOC) price assessment processes.

The tool's compatibility with Intercontinental Exchange (ICE) technology allows users to execute trades on the ICE platform without leaving the Platts MOC environment.

The first LNG derivative eWindow trade follows significant growth in JKM-linked bids, offers and trades in the spot market, as well as a robust increase in JKM LNG derivatives volumes cleared on financial exchanges over the past two years.

JKM LNG derivative trading volumes cleared on ICE and the Chicago Mercantile Exchange (CME) in the first half of the year rose 83% year on year to 78.8 million mt, or 409,875 lots, according to exchange and broker data.

Open interest at the end of June also hit a record monthly high, with 94,734 lots recorded.

JKM derivatives cleared on ICE made up 96% of total open interest. Last year was a record trading year for LNG derivatives, with 107 million mt cleared on both exchanges.

Events of 2020 have forced Treasury to push back its timeline for rules on reporting obligations of brokers who facilitate cryptocurrency sales, according to a Treasury official.

The coronavirus pandemic and the resulting longer-than-usual filing season are among the oddities of 2020 impacting the department. Treasury is working on proposed regulations (RIN: 1545-BP71) dealing with the reporting requirements of crypto brokers under tax code Section 6045. The code section requires brokers to file information returns with the IRS showing the gross proceeds from sales of certain securities and commodities.

- The government's regulatory agenda originally had the guidance slated for a June release.
- Given "how uncertain everything else is this year, we really can't make any predictions" on timing, said Erika Nijenhuis, senior counsel at the Treasury Department. She spoke on an American Bar Association webcast Thursday.
- Issuing guidance on congressional relief packages are among the ways IRS and Treasury have had to adjust to respond to the pandemic.
- The agency may address classification issues in the broker reporting rules that it eventually releases, said Pamela Lew, IRS associate chief counsel (Financial Institutions and Products).
- The IRS classifies convertible virtual currencies that can be substituted for cash as currency for federal tax purposes, but other agencies identify them as securities or commodities. The current Section 6045 rules only apply to sales of securities and commodities.

FT: FBI Launches Investigation into Twitter Hack

Social media company faces questions over security of its platform

By Hannah Murphy and Kadhim

The FBI and New York state have launched investigations into Wednesday's unprecedented hack of Twitter, as the social media company faced widespread concern over its security practices ahead of the US presidential election.

A spokesperson at the FBI's San Francisco division confirmed that the agency was investigating the hack, in which attackers hijacked the official accounts of Apple, Uber, Joe Biden, Elon Musk, Kim Kardashian and hundreds of others to solicit more than $100,000 in bitcoin.

"At this time, the accounts appear to have been compromised in order to perpetuate cryptocurrency fraud," the FBI spokesperson said.

Twitter said on Thursday it believed 130 accounts were targeted, with hackers able to gain control of a "small subset" of those accounts.

Separately, Andrew Cuomo, New York governor, said he had ordered a "full investigation" into the incident through the New York Department of Financial Services "and any other relevant state agency".

"The Twitter hack and widespread takeover of verified Twitter accounts is deeply troubling and raises concerns about the cyber security of our communications systems, which are critical as we approach the upcoming presidential election," he said in a statement.

Chainalysis, a blockchain analysis company used by governments and financial institutions, said it had been contacted by a number of federal law enforcement agencies about the incident but would share no further details.

The probes come as Twitter faces mounting questions over how attackers were able to control the accounts and whether other data — such as users' personal messages — were accessed.

Several hours after the hack, Twitter said that it had detected a "co-ordinated social engineering attack" that had "successfully targeted some of our employees with access to internal systems and tools".

The company would not say on Thursday whether employees or contractors were tricked into handing over access to the administrative systems, or whether they co-operated with hackers.

In a further update, it added that it had “no evidence that attackers accessed passwords”, and that it was “taking aggressive steps to secure our systems while our investigations are ongoing”, as well as “assessing longer-term steps”.

Two former employees, speaking to the Financial Times on condition of anonymity, said the number of people with access to the admin tools was in the hundreds. “The access is too broadly offered to Twitter engineers,” said one former senior executive.

Twitter refused to comment.

Lawmakers on Capitol Hill also raised questions over whether Twitter has security vulnerabilities.

The Senate intelligence committee asked Twitter for information about the hack. “The ability of bad actors to take over prominent accounts, even fleetingly, signals a worrisome vulnerability in this media environment,” said Senator Mark Warner, the committee’s most senior Democrat.

Ed Markey, another Democratic senator, said: “Imagine if the bad actors that hacked Twitter had a different intent, to use powerful voices to spread disinformation to interfere with our elections or disrupt the stock market.”

Soon after the hacking took place, Josh Hawley, a Republican senator from Missouri, published a letter to Jack Dorsey, Twitter’s chief executive, urging the company to contact the FBI and the US Department of Justice. “A successful attack on your system’s servers represents a threat to all of your users’ privacy and data security,” he said.

The White House said on Thursday that it had been in “constant contact” with Twitter since the hack, adding that President Donald Trump’s account was “secure and not jeopardised” during the attack.

WSJ: FBI Investigates Twitter Hack Amid Broader Concerns About Platform’s Security

Severity of attack raises alarms among U.S. lawmakers, administration officials

By Robert McMillan and Dustin Volz

The Federal Bureau of Investigation launched a probe into the widespread hack of Twitter Inc. TWTR -1.09% that occurred Wednesday, amid growing concerns that the vulnerability of the company’s systems could pose broader risks to international security.

Lawmakers and security experts on Thursday said the attack, in which hackers commandeered numerous Twitter accounts, including for prominent figures such as Joe Biden and Bill Gates, pointed to an especially worrisome vulnerability heading into the U.S. presidential election, given Twitter’s importance as a platform for political discussion.

The hack lasted for hours, and security experts saw it as both severe and unusual. It exposed what they said was the problem of even midlevel company insiders’ access to Twitter data in ways that enable hackers to obtain such information or gain control of user accounts.

Security experts believe the attack might have focused on the company’s internal account-reset systems, which are used to help users regain access to their accounts after losing their phones or forgetting their passwords.

The attack allowed hackers to take over an array of accounts—others included those of Elon Musk, Kanye West, Barack Obama, and Apple Inc.—and post bogus messages requesting money be sent to cryptocurrency accounts. Twitter said about 130 accounts were targeted and that it was assessing whether those users’ nonpublic data was compromised.

The FBI said Thursday in announcing its probe that “at this time, the accounts appear to have been compromised in order to perpetuate cryptocurrency fraud.” The agency said Twitter is cooperating with the investigation.

Separately, New York Gov. Andrew Cuomo said Thursday the state’s Department of Financial Services would investigate the attack.

Twitter, which has some 166 million users, has said only that the hackers used “social engineering” techniques, where employees are tricked into clicking a link, divulging information or otherwise aiding outsiders. The company hasn’t said specifically how the attackers penetrated its internal systems and tools or how long they had access to them. The hackers might have accessed information or engaged in other malicious activity, Twitter said, adding that it has “taken significant steps to limit access to internal systems” while it investigates the incident. On Thursday the company said it didn’t believe user passwords were compromised.

Twitter was still grappling with the fallout more than 24 hours after the first attack began, with some users still unable to access accounts that the company locked protectively. The company also disabled the function of being able to download personal data from the platform.

Benjamin Block, director of rapid response for the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, said lockouts were an issue for “dozens” of candidates. “Twitter owes these campaigns an explanation of what occurred and what the company will do to keep their platform secure going forward,” he said. Twitter said it was working with account owners to restore access.

A U.S. official said the disruption could have national-security implications, given Twitter’s role in public discourse and government messaging. The platform is among President Trump’s favored means of communication, and federal and local agencies use it to share information about natural disasters and other emergencies, including the coronavirus pandemic.

White House press secretary Kayleigh McEnany said Thursday that Mr. Trump’s Twitter account hadn’t been jeopardized in the hack.

Whatever access the attackers gained by targeting Twitter employees gave them extraordinary power over the platform. The hackers appeared to be not only capable of posting tweets from virtually any account but were likely able to view private direct messages between accounts, experts said.

The attack isn’t the first high-profile incident in which Twitter’s internal systems were compromised. In 2017, Mr. Trump’s account was deactivated for 11 minutes when a customer-support employee erroneously disabled it during the employee’s last day working at Twitter, the company said at the time.

And late last year, federal prosecutors charged two former Twitter employees and a Saudi Arabian national with spying on some users of the platform who criticized Riyadh and providing that information to kingdom officials. One of them had used employee credentials to obtain email addresses, birth dates and other information about people who had published posts critical of the Saudi royal family, prosecutors said.

Twitter in 2011 agreed to a settlement with the Federal Trade Commission over a hack of its systems in 2009 that regulators said put users’ privacy at risk. The company faces potential fines for violations of that agreement.

The hackers in Wednesday’s attack posted messages from some of Twitter’s most popular accounts, asking money to be sent to cryptocurrency accounts. The attackers received at least 510 payments worth $121,000 in response to the scam, according to blockchain analysis company Chainalysis Inc.

Allison Nixon, chief research officer at cyber services company Unit 221b, said she was contacted by the FBI on Wednesday in connection with the Twitter hack. Chainalysis said it has been contacted by several federal law-enforcement agencies about the matter.

The extensiveness and nature of the attack raised alarms in Washington, where officials and lawmakers expressed concern that such a vulnerability could be used by malicious actors—and potentially a foreign government—for a range of activity that could be far more damaging than a bitcoin scam.

A Pew Research Center report released Thursday found U.S. lawmakers have increased their use of social-media platforms such as Twitter and Facebook Inc. in recent years. The typical member of Congress now has nearly three times as many followers on Twitter and tweets roughly twice as often as in 2016, Pew said.

“We’re just now getting to an understanding of how critical [social-media platforms] are to how our nation operates,” said Neil Jenkins, a former U.S. cybersecurity official and chief analytic officer at Cyber Threat Alliance, a nonprofit that works to improve sharing of cyber-threat data.

Mr. Jenkins, who worked to counter Russian interference in the 2016 election, said Wednesday’s attack showed federal agencies’ limited abilities to protect private companies that provide vital services from disruptive hacks. He warned that a well-timed attack on Twitter during the 2020 election could be especially calamitous, adding that state and local election officials rely on the platform to push back on disinformation and share reliable information with voters.

U.S. officials at the Cybersecurity and Infrastructure Security Agency were also in communication with Twitter about the hack, an administration official said. And the Senate Intelligence Committee, which has investigated how foreign governments weaponize social media to achieve geopolitical aims, has asked Twitter for a briefing about the disruption, according to an aide to Sen. Mark Warner of Virginia, the top Democrat on the panel.

"Social-media platforms have become central to political leaders communicating with constituents, media personalities interacting with their fans and brands engaging with their customers," Mr. Warner said in a statement. "The ability of bad actors to take over prominent accounts, even fleetingly, signals a worrisome vulnerability in this media environment."

For others, the hack renewed longstanding concerns about Twitter's security posture. Sen. Ron Wyden (D., Ore.), also a member of the intelligence panel, said he met with Twitter Chief Executive Jack Dorsey nearly two years ago and pressed the company to make the its platform's private direct messages end-to-end encrypted—meaning it would be extremely difficult for a hacker or government agency to intercept and read them. Twitter direct messages remain unencrypted.

Though it couldn't be learned whether the hackers gained access to direct messages in Wednesday's breach, the vulnerability isn't present on competing platforms, which Mr. Wyden described as an inexcusable security shortcoming. "If hackers gained access to users' DMs, this breach could have a breathtaking impact for years to come," he said.

Reuters: FBI Says It Is Investigating Hack of High-Profile Twitter Accounts

By Sarah N. Lynch

The FBI's San Francisco office said on Thursday it has launched an investigation after hackers accessed Twitter's internal systems to hijack accounts for high-profile people such as U.S. presidential candidate Joe Biden, reality TV star Kim Kardashian, former U.S. President Barack Obama and billionaire Elon Musk and used them to solicit digital currency.

"At this time, the accounts appear to have been compromised in order to perpetuate cryptocurrency fraud," the FBI said in its statement.

"We advise the public not to fall victim to this scam by sending cryptocurrency or money in relation to this incident. As this investigation is ongoing, we will not be making further comment at this time."

Bloomberg: Bitcoin Enthusiasts Face Bigger Problems Than Twitter Scam

By Vildana Hajric

- GTI trend gauge triggers first Bitcoin sell signal since June
- Bitcoin implicated in apparent effort to promote Twitter scam

A Twitter hack this week featured Bitcoin in one of its most high-profile scams. But technical indicators suggest that could be just the start of problems for investors in the largest cryptocurrency.

Bitcoin fell as much as 1.9% in Thursday's session to trade as low as $9,037 in New York -- just points away from testing the critical $9,000 support level. In addition, the GTI Vera Convergence Divergence Indicator, which measures up and down shifts, triggered a new sell signal, the first since early June, when the coin failed to breach $10,000.

"A break below $9,000 would raise a yellow warning flag on Bitcoin," said Matt Maley, chief market strategist for Miller Tabak + Co. A subsequent drop below the mid-May low of $8,636 would signify a red flag, he said.

Breaking Bitcoin

GTI indicator triggers first Bitcoin sell signal since early June

Bitcoin's retreat follows news that Twitter accounts of some of the most prominent U.S. political and business leaders -- including Barack Obama, Joe Biden, Jeff Bezos and Warren Buffett -- were hacked Wednesday in an apparent effort to promote a scam involving the cryptocurrency.

The accounts sent out tweets promising to double the money of anyone sending funds via Bitcoin within 30 minutes, prompting the popular crypto exchange Coinbase Inc. to block its users from sending money to the address. The hack duped people into sending at least $120,000 worth of Bitcoin to an anonymous online wallet, and more than half of that total has already been spirited to other accounts, Bloomberg News reported.

"Yesterday's Twitter hack was a great reminder of how vulnerable cryptocurrency traders are to hacking incidents," said Edward Moya, senior market analyst at Oanda. "Malicious activity has always been a concern for Bitcoin and those concerns are not going away anytime soon."

To others, though, the event is another example of how blockchain technology -- the digital ledger that underpins cryptocurrencies -- could help bolster security for a company like Twitter. "Because of this technology, social media could undergo a major structural change to make this insecurity and impermanence, more permanent and tamper proof," said Keld van Schreven, co-founder and managing director of KR1 Plc.

THE TRUMP-WORLD-IS-A-MESS BEAT ...

ALEX ISENSTADT: “The week that shook the Trump campaign”: “When Donald Trump had dinner with Home Depot cofounder Bernie Marcus at the White House Saturday night, word of the get-together quickly reverberated across the president’s political sphere. The 91-year-old billionaire is a longtime backer of former White House chief strategist Steve Bannon, and Trump operatives were suspicious that a move was afoot to bring the smashmouth populist back into the fold.

“Few seriously believe Bannon will return — while Trump has praised his recent TV appearances, there is still deep anger within the president’s inner circle over Bannon’s post-White House mocking of first daughter Ivanka Trump. But the post-meeting jitters illustrate how Trump’s political team is suddenly gripped by uncertainty: With the election just four months away and Trump conceding privately that he’s behind, his advisers have spent the past week racing to get on track.

“Most notably, Trump son-in-law Jared Kushner asserted further control over the campaign, a move that led to the abrupt demotion of one of Trump’s longest-serving political aides. The internal moves, however, did little to assuage skeptics who say Trump’s problems can only be fixed by the candidate himself. Namely, they say, Trump needs a message and to show some discipline in delivering it.”

POLITICO

-- NYT, A1 ... MAGGIE HABERMAN, JONATHAN MARTIN and ALEX BURNS: “Why June Was Such a Terrible Month for Trump”: “In an interview, Mr. Kushner, whose influence in the administration is exceeded only by Mr. Trump, said his strategy amounted to letting the president dictate his own re-election.

“‘He’s really the campaign manager at the end of the day,’ Mr. Kushner said, adding: ‘Our job is to present him with data, give him ideas, help him structure. And then when he makes decisions on where he wants to go, the campaign was designed to be like a custom suit for him.’”

TIGHT! ... Sen. SUSAN COLLINS (R-Maine) and her Dem opponent, SARA GIDEON, are neck and neck in the money race. COLLINS has $5 million on hand, and GIDEON has $5.49 million.

YOU CAN RUN, BUT YOU CAN'T HIDE ... WAPO'S CAROL LEONNIG and JOSH DAWSEY: “Secret Service agents preparing for Pence Arizona trip contracted coronavirus”: “Vice President Pence’s trip to Arizona this week had to be postponed by a day after several Secret Service agents who helped organize the visit either tested positive for the coronavirus or were showing symptoms of being infected.

“Pence was scheduled to go to Phoenix on Tuesday but went on Wednesday instead so that healthy agents could be deployed for his visit, according to two senior administration officials who spoke on the condition of anonymity to describe private details of the trip.”

REALLY, REALLY BAD NEWS ... AP/FT. LAUDERDALE: “Confirmed coronavirus cases are rising in 40 of 50 states,” by Jake Coyle and Terry Spencer: “Four U.S. states — Arizona, California, Florida and Texas — reported a combined 25,000 new confirmed coronavirus cases Thursday as the infection curve rose in 40 of the 50 states heading into the July Fourth holiday weekend.

“With the number of daily confirmed coronavirus cases nationwide climbing past 50,000, an alarming 36 states saw an increase in the percentage of tests coming back positive for the virus. ‘What we’ve seen is a very disturbing week,’ Dr. Anthony Fauci, the government’s top infectious-disease expert, said in a livestream with the American Medical Association.

“In a major retreat that illustrated how dire things have become in Texas, Republican Gov. Greg Abbott ordered the wearing of masks across most of the state after refusing until recently to let even local governments impose such rules.” AP

THE HOLLYWOOD REPORTER spoke with HILLARY CLINTON : “We wouldn’t have been able to stop the pandemic at our borders the way that Trump claimed in the beginning, but we sure could have done a better job saving lives, modeling better, more responsible behavior. I don’t think we necessarily should have had as deep an economic assault on livelihoods and jobs as we have. So I know I would have done a better job.”

UP NEXT? ... HEATHER CAYGLE, MARIANNE LEVINE and SARAH FERRIS: “Congress stares down funding cliff for coronavirus aid”: “As the U.S. enters its sixth month of grappling with the coronavirus pandemic — with cases soaring and unemployment claims hovering in the millions — Congress is again facing a double-barreled dilemma: how to address both the health and economic catastrophes threatening the country.

“And in typical Congress fashion, lawmakers have teed up a crunch time crisis this month, giving themselves just a few weeks to wrangle together a massive bipartisan coronavirus relief deal and ship it to President Donald Trump. The month of July, which was already crowded with a slate of must-pass spending and defense bills, now brings even higher stakes, with the two parties still far apart on how Washington should approach the twin emergencies just four months before the presidential election.

“Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) said ‘of course’ Thursday when asked whether Congress can pull a massive relief bill together in the coming weeks. ‘First of all, I’m not leaving for two weeks,’ Pelosi told reporters of the upcoming Independence Day holiday. ‘They’ve made their overtures,’ she added of Republicans. ‘They also have said publicly ‘this or that’ should be in the next bill. So we anticipate we will have a bill.” POLITICO

KNOWING SYMONE SANDERS ... NYT’S MARK LEIBOVICH: “Symone Sanders Bet on Biden, and Herself”: “As one might divine, Ms. Sanders has always had a desire to be seen, heard and generally in the middle of things. For many years, she imagined she'd have to play some other character in order to achieve that; to fashion some kind of safe persona or schtick and, if need be, sacrifice part of her genuine self in order to accommodate the cookie-cutter norms of Talking Head World. She also figured she'd have to wait around and pay years of dues before she could unleash her full charismatic arsenal upon the staid conventions of TV political gab.

“As things turned out, Ms. Sanders did not have to wait long at all to play herself on TV; nor would she have to cultivate some latter-day incarnation of Donna Burns. She has become, for a host of reasons, a critical-of-the-moment character in this presidential race. At 30, Ms. Sanders is the youngest member of Mr. Biden's inner circle, the highest-ranking African-American person on his campaign staff and the most prominent alumnus of a Bernie Sanders presidential campaign.

SCOTUS WATCH -- “Supreme Court says Alabama does not have to loosen ballot restrictions because of virus,” by WaPo's Robert Barnes and Elise Viebeck: “The Supreme Court on Thursday night said Alabama does not have to abide for now with lower-court decisions that made it easier to cast a mail-in ballot in a state that has seen a spike in coronavirus outbreaks.

“The vote was 5 to 4, with the court's conservatives in the majority. Neither the majority nor the four justices who noted their dissent — Ruth Bader Ginsburg, Stephen G. Breyer, Sonia Sotomayor and Elena Kagan — supplied the reasoning for their votes in the short emergency order.

“But in an earlier case from Wisconsin involving a judge's accommodations for voters who feared voting in person because of the novel coronavirus, the justices in the majority — Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. and Justices Clarence Thomas, Samuel A. Alito Jr., Neil M. Gorsuch and Brett M. Kavanaugh — said it violated the court's precedent about making changes to the voting process too close to an election.”

MARY TRUMP LATEST -- “A day after her potentially explosive book gets go-ahead, Mary Trump asks court to lift restraining order against her,” by WaPo's Michael Kranish

2024 WATCH -- “Tucker Carlson in 2024? Republicans see a frontrunner,” by Alex Thompson: “Tucker Carlson’s audience is booming — and so is chatter that the popular Fox News host will parlay his TV perch into a run for president in 2024.

“Republican strategists, conservative commentators and former Trump campaign and administration officials are buzzing about Carlson as the next-generation leader of Donald Trump’s movement — with many believing he would be an immediate frontrunner in a Republican primary. ‘He’s a talented communicator with a massive platform. I think if he runs he’d be formidable,’ said Luke Thompson, a Republican strategist who worked for Jeb Bush’s Super PAC in 2016.

“While practically every Republican eyeing a 2024 presidential run is professing loyalty to Trump the person, Carlson has become perhaps the highest-profile proponent of “Trumpism” — a blend of anti-immigrant nationalism, economic populism, and America First isolationism that he articulates unapologetically and with some snark. At the same time, he’s shown a rare willingness among Republicans to bluntly criticize Trump when he believes the president is straying from that ideology.” POLITICO

ONLY THE BEST PEOPLE ... FOREIGN POLICY: "White House Directed Hiring of Conspiracy Theorist Over Pentagon Objections." by Jack Detsch and Robbie Gramer: "The White House directed Defense Department officials to hire a former National Security Council staffer fired for circulating a conspiratorial memo and known for Islamophobic tweets, people familiar with the matter told Foreign Policy. The move is part of an aggressive push to staff the Pentagon with figures loyal to U.S. President Donald Trump and with connections to ousted former National Security Advisor Michael Flynn that has been met with resistance across the river."

THE LATEST IN HONG KONG -- "Hong Kong Security Law Stuns International Business: 'It Turns Out It Is Really Bad'" by WSJ's John Lyons and Frances Yoon in Hong Kong: "As China drew up a new security law for Hong Kong last month, its top Foreign Ministry official in the city gathered international business groups and diplomats to deliver a message from Beijing: Don't panic."

“The law would target only a small group of radicals and wouldn’t impede the free market ethos behind Hong Kong’s rise as a global business hub, the official said. But now that businesspeople are finally seeing the law, there is much to cause concern.

“While no one expects the giant money flows coursing through Hong Kong to cease anytime soon, the law sets in motion fundamental changes that threaten to erode the city’s special role as a gateway connecting Western finance and know-how with China Inc.

“Businesses were kind of waiting and laying their bets to see how bad it would be, and then it turns out it is really bad,’ said Christopher Hughes, a London School of Economics professor of international relations who focuses on Chinese foreign policy. ‘I wouldn’t be surprised if changes happen faster than you think.’”

DRIVING THE DAY

NEW ... PLAYBOOK SNEAK PEEK: Sen. DOUG JONES (D-Ala.) is going up on statewide television with his first TV ad: a new 30-second, straight-to-camera TV spot about racial justice. JONES' most recent polling has him in a tight race with TOMMY TUBERVILLE, the likely GOP candidate.

-- SCRIPT: "As he lay dying, George Floyd cried for his mama and pleaded for his life: 'I can't breathe.' As we witnessed his death together, the world changed. Across Alabama, folks are struggling with seeing this injustice and inequality and wanting to see that end. We cannot let this moment pass. The road to racial justice has taken far too long -- but it's a journey that we must make, and we must make it together. Come join me. I'm Doug Jones and I approve this message." The spot

DEMS GETTING READY TO BLOCK POLICE OVERHAUL ... THE QUESTION LINGERING for the past week was whether Senate Minority Leader CHUCK SCHUMER would agree to allow a debate on the GOP police reform bill, authored by Sen. TIM SCOTT (R-S.C.). DEMOCRATS don't much like the bill, but SCHUMER has left open the possibility that he may allow for a debate and amendment process in the hopes of getting a deal. Speaker NANCY PELOSI signaled she wanted the Senate to take it up, so the two chambers could enter into formal negotiations.

-- BUT NOW, Democrats' body language indicates they are going to block debate, which, in Republicans' view, hands them a talking point on a silver platter.

-- BURGESS EVERETT reported Monday night that Senate Democrats were "strongly signaling they will filibuster Republicans' police reform bill later this week absent more concessions from Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell."

-- SEVERAL SENATE DEMOCRATS flagged Monday evening that the NAACP Legal Defense Fund urged Dems to oppose the bill Wednesday.

-- ON MONDAY AT AROUND 6 P.M., SEN. DICK DURBIN (D-Ill.), the party's whip, told a small clutch of us reporters in the Capitol that "there's no clarity" on what MCCONNELL is offering -- in other words, Democrats want a commitment on how many amendments they would get to offer if they did agree to debate, and they are not getting it.

-- DURBIN said he has faced "similar offers" from MCCONNELL in the past, most notably when Democrats voted against debating the CARES Act -- the large-scale Covid-19 stimulus bill. "The best thing that happened was we didn't accept his offer, we demanded a bipartisan approach to it," DURBIN said, referring to the negotiations between the White House and Senate Democrats.

-- BUT, BUT, BUT ... POLICE REFORM isn't the CARES Act. The White House and Senate Republicans are not inclined to jump into a bipartisan negotiation with Democrats if they block this bill from debate. The administration privately says it feels confident in its position on police reform, especially after the executive order it issued. So if Democrats block debate, this process probably comes to a screeching halt.

-- REPUBLICANS in the administration and on the Hill are ready to scream from the hilltops that it was Democrats who blocked police reform on the Senate floor. EXPECT MCCONNELL to use his post-GOP lunch news conference to wallop Democrats for blocking this. Expect DEMS to say MCCONNELL is offering them a take-it-or-leave-it proposition that they cannot accept, and they should sit down to negotiate a compromise.

-- THE HOUSE will vote Thursday on its police overhaul, and Republicans say they believe as many as a dozen of their lawmakers may vote with Democrats to pass the bill. TRUMP opposes the House bill, and the Senate will have nothing to do with it. Sure, it's better for the GOP to stand unified against the Dem legislation, but it would seem laughably nonsensical for Republicans to expend any effort to whip their troops against it. (In fact, there's an argument that it's helpful for some moderate Republicans to have something to vote on.)

ARIZONA REPUBLIC: "Expect crowd to wear masks at Trump speech at Dream City Church in Phoenix, organizer says," by Andrew Oxford, Ronald Hansen and Maria Polletta: "Organizers said they expect President Donald Trump's speech Tuesday in Phoenix to draw more than 3,000 mostly young attendees who will comply with the city's new mask ordinance.

"The visit will be the president's third trip to Arizona in five months, as he seeks a return to normal for a presidential campaign overshadowed by crises in recent months. But that is a task complicated by the ongoing coronavirus pandemic, particularly in a state where the number of people hospitalized with the disease has reached new highs in recent days and public health authorities are urging the public to avoid large gatherings.

"Gov. Doug Ducey, a Republican, will be on hand for Trump's appearance in Phoenix and also will participate in an earlier event in Southern Arizona, according to the Governor's Office."

KYLE CHENEY: "House Judiciary panel preparing to subpoena Barr": "The House Judiciary Committee is preparing a subpoena to obtain Attorney General William Barr's testimony July 2, Chairman Jerrold Nadler said Monday night. 'We have begun the process to issue that subpoena,' Nadler said on MSNBC, confirming an Axios report that a subpoena was being teed up.

"It's a reversal for the panel after Nadler (D-N.Y.) indicated earlier this month that a subpoena — which Barr is sure to contest — would not be worth the House's time. 'I am not going to spend months litigating a subpoena with an Attorney General who has already spent years resisting the courts and legitimate congressional oversight,' Nadler said June 2.

"Barr has yet to testify before the House Judiciary Committee since taking his post early last year. ... Nadler (D-N.Y.) and Speaker Nancy Pelosi discussed the idea over the weekend and decided 'to be ready' in case Barr declined to show up to testify before the panel, according to Democratic sources familiar with their conversation. Pelosi informed her leadership team Monday night, saying on a private call that Nadler's panel was 'starting down the path' of subpoenaing Barr if necessary, according to Democratic sources. Nadler later confirmed the news." POLITICO

CORONAVIRUS RAGING ...

-- NYT, A1: "Bars, Strip Clubs and Churches: U.S. Virus Outbreaks Enter Unwieldy Phase." by Sarah Mervosh in Pittsburgh, Mitch Smith in Chicago and Lucy Tompkins: "After months of lockdown in which outbreaks of the coronavirus often centered in nursing homes, prisons and meatpacking plants, the nation is entering a new and uncertain phase of the pandemic. New Covid-19 clusters have been found in a Pentecostal church in Oregon, a strip club in Wisconsin and in every imaginable place in between.

"In Baton Rouge, La., at least 100 people tested positive for the virus after visiting bars in the Tigerland nightlife district, popular among Louisiana State University students. At a Christian summer camp near Colorado Springs, at least 11 employees fell ill just before the season's opening, leading the camp to cancel overnight stays for the first time in 63 years.

"And in Las Vegas, just weeks after casinos reopened, a handful of employees from casinos, restaurants and hotels have tested positive, and frightened workers on Monday begged guests to wear masks in a news conference conducted over video.

"The newly emerging clusters — which vary in size from a handful of cases to hundreds and have cropped up in large cities as well as small towns — reflect the unpredictable course of the coronavirus. They also underscore risks that experts say are likely to persist as long as states try to reopen economies and Americans venture back into public without a vaccine."

-- IN FLORIDA: ""Government itself can't solve this problem': Florida officials alarmed as virus rages," by Arek Sarkissian in Tallahassee and Caitlin Oprysko: "Top Republican politicians and the state official leading Florida's response to the pandemic urged businesses and residents — particularly young people — to stay vigilant about social distancing, leaving the fight in the hands of some of the same people who helped fuel the latest uptick in cases.

"If we don't step up and take responsibility, government itself can't solve this problem,' Jared Moskowitz, the state Division of Emergency Management director, said in an interview." POLITICO

WATCH THIS SPACE -- "Trump aides consider a CDC overhaul as virus cases surge," by Nancy Cook and Adam Cancryn: "White House officials are putting a target on the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention, positioning the agency as a coronavirus scapegoat as cases surge in many states and the U.S. falls behind other nations that are taming the pandemic.

"Trump administration aides in recent weeks have seriously discussed launching an in-depth evaluation of the agency to chart what they view as its missteps in responding to the pandemic including an early failure to deploy working test kits, according to four senior administration officials. Part of that audit would include examining more closely the state-by-state death toll to tally only the Americans who died directly of Covid-19 rather than other factors. About 120,000 people in the U.S. have died of the coronavirus so far, according to the CDC's official count.

“Aides have also discussed narrowing the mission of the agency or trying to embed more political appointees within it, according to interviews with 10 current and former senior administration officials and Republicans close to the White House. One official said the overall goal would be to make the CDC nimble and more responsive.” POLITICO

BIG PRIMARY DAY ... THE LEFT'S REVENGE? -- “Bernie flexes muscle in Tuesday's primaries,” by Holly Otterbein: “Bernie Sanders has raised more than $750,000 for congressional and local candidates in Tuesday's primaries, his aides told POLITICO. The Vermont senator's team also texted more than 120,000 of his supporters to promote the progressives he endorsed in races in New York and Kentucky. His staffers said videos boosting the contenders have received more than 1 million views on social media.”

-- “Booker's late surge imperils McGrath in unpredictable Kentucky Senate race,” by James Arkin: “Charles Booker's late surge in Kentucky is threatening to prematurely end the campaign of one of the Democratic Party's top recruits on Tuesday: former fighter pilot Amy McGrath. But he's still an underdog to pull the major upset.

“Booker's burst in the final stretch of the primary came after McGrath spent nearly a year running what essentially amounted to a general election campaign against Majority Leader Mitch McConnell, blanketing the state with advertisements and raising record sums of money from small-dollar donors eager to topple the GOP leader. She has both outraised and outspent McConnell so far and has the national party's support, a superior campaign infrastructure and almost bottomless war chest to help fend Booker off.

“If McGrath wins — most Democrats tracking the race closely think she remains the favorite — it will be another bitter defeat for the left wing of the party, which is also seeking victories in several House primaries Tuesday. Progressives failed to mount serious challenges to the party establishment in most Senate races in recent cycles and lost in the party's presidential primary. If Booker manages to pull it off, it would be the first primary defeat for a candidate backed by the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee in a decade.” POLITICO

DETROIT FREE PRESS: “Sources: U-M to withdraw from hosting October presidential debate”

TRUMP'S MIND IS ON HIS MIND, via WAPO'S ASHLEY PARKER and JOSH DAWSEY: “The early June meeting in the Cabinet Room was intended as a general update on President Trump's reelection campaign, but the president had other topics on his mind.

“Trump had taken a cognitive screening test as part of his 2018 physical, and now, more than two years later, he brought up the 10-minute exam. He waxed on about how he’d dazzled the proctors with his stellar performance, according to two people familiar with his comments. He walked the room of about two dozen White House and reelection officials through some of the questions he said he’d aced, such as being able to repeat five words in order.

“At the time, the Montreal Cognitive Assessment -- which includes animal pictures and other simple queries aimed at detecting mild cognitive impairment such as dementia — was intended to quell questions about Trump’s mental fitness. But in recalling it, Trump said he thought presumptive Democratic nominee Joe Biden would never be able to pass it and suggested challenging him to take the test, said the people familiar with Trump’s comments, who spoke on the condition of anonymity to share private details.”

OH BOY -- “Barring a landslide, what’s probably not coming on Nov. 3? A result in the race for the White House.” by WaPo’s Amy Gardner: “If voters remain reluctant to cast ballots in person, November is likely to bring an even more massive wave of voting by mail than what has swept across the country during primary season. That, in turn, means that a close race between President Trump and former vice president Joe Biden, the presumptive Democratic nominee, in a pivotal state could take days, even weeks, to resolve, election officials across the country are warning.”

PLAYBOOK METRO SECTION -- “Police thwart attempt by protesters to topple statue of Andrew Jackson near White House,” by WaPo’s Fredrick Kunkle, Susan Svrluga and Justin Jouvenal:

“Protesters attempted to topple a bronze statue of former president Andrew Jackson in a park next to the White House on Monday night but were thwarted when police intervened.

“The scene unfolded dramatically as hundreds of demonstrators protesting police brutality locked arms around the statue in Lafayette Square shortly before 8 p.m., while chanting, ‘Hey, hey, ho, ho, Andrew Jackson’s got to go.’ Inside the metal pickets surrounding the statue, a smaller group — some clad in black with goggles, helmets and gas masks — scaled the statue and draped ropes around the seventh president astride a horse. Someone scrawled ‘killer’ in black on the pedestal below.

“But then, U.S. Park Police officers in riot gear approached from the west and clashed with the protesters, swinging batons and releasing pepper spray as they moved the protesters back.” WaPo

BEYOND THE BELTWAY -- “Seattle will move to dismantle protest zone, mayor says.” by AP’s Gene Johnson in Seattle: “Faced with growing pressure to crack down on an ‘occupied’ protest zone following two weekend shootings, Seattle’s mayor said Monday that officials will move to wind down the blocks-long span of city streets taken over two weeks ago that President Donald Trump asserted is run by ‘anarchists.’

“Mayor Jenny Durkan said the violence was distracting from changes sought by thousands of peaceful protesters opposing racial inequity and police brutality. She said at a news conference that the city is working with the community to bring the ‘Capitol Hill Occupied Protest’ zone, or CHOP, to an end and that police soon would move back into a precinct building they had largely abandoned in the area.”

SPY GAMES -- “The C.I.A.’s Business Is Secrets, but It Is Recruiting Spies in the Open,” by NYT’s Julian Barnes: “The C.I.A. has recruited at Ivy League schools, through Hollywood-produced television programs and even by judging school science fairs. But the current era needs a modern recruiting drive, and on Monday, the C.I.A. unveiled its first television advertisement, which is aimed at streaming platforms like Hulu. The slick, advertising-agency-produced spot has the feel of clips from the television program ‘Homeland’ — with a dollop of patriotism.

“By some measures, the C.I.A. has little need for recruiting drives. Every year, thousands of applicants compete for hundreds of spots, according to current and former officials. In 2019, the agency had its best recruiting year in a decade. And traditionally it has been easier for the government to recruit during recessions.

“But Gina Haspel, the C.I.A. director, has made recruitment a priority for her secretive agency, which has to compete against Silicon Valley for the sharpest minds as it increasingly focuses on hacking and other digital spying tools. And the agency still must work at bringing in recruiting classes that reflect the diversity of the United States.” NYT

IN MEMORIAM -- L.A. TIMES: “Steve Bing, philanthropist and film producer, dies after fall from building.” by Anousha Sakoui and Richard Winton: “Steve Bing, philanthropist, film producer and prominent Democratic political donor whose producing credits include ‘The Polar Express’ and ‘Get Carter,’ died Monday. Bing, 55, fell to his death from a high-rise building in Century City, according to a law enforcement source who was not authorized to comment. Foul play is not suspected.”

DRIVING THE DAY

DEPT. OF NEW URGENCY ... AT 9:30 this morning, Senate Majority Leader MITCH MCCONNELL and Sen. TIM SCOTT (R-S.C.) will hold a news conference where, barring some last-second, bizarre change of plan, the pair will announce that the Senate will consider police reform legislation next week.

YES, YOU READ THAT RIGHT: The Senate is clearing floor space for SCOTT'S police bill 139 DAYS before Election Day.

THIS REPRESENTS a new sense of urgency for the Republican leadership in the Senate, which, as recently as earlier this week, was saying that this would not get done until after July Fourth. The GOP leadership believes it has its membership in line behind the legislation, and we've not really heard any significant dissent yet. More from Marianne LeVine about what's in the GOP bill

SO HERE'S THE QUESTION NOW: What will Democrats do?

MCCONNELL will need 60 votes to bring this bill up, so he needs Senate Minority Leader CHUCK SCHUMER and Democrats to cooperate.

THE DEMOCRATS had leadership and caucus conference calls Tuesday, and they didn't discuss strategy because they had not seen the bill. That's the position they are maintaining: that they can't make a play call until they see legislative text. They'll see the bill today, and will have to consider what they want to do.

HERE'S WHAT WE KNOW: Democrats have made it clear they believe that President DONALD TRUMP'S executive order is weak, and many have preemptively pegged SCOTT'S bill as not going far enough.

BUT THEIR NEXT STEP is a bit trickier. Can they refuse MCCONNELL the ability to consider SCOTT'S bill, handing the GOP a convenient talking point that it was the Democrats who blocked police reform in the Senate? That seems risky, given the national climate.

DEMOCRATS COULD allow the chamber to debate SCOTT'S bill, and try to amend it. This would be the legislative process working. Democrats could force some tough votes for the GOP, and vice versa. There is a narrow, treacherous and uncertain path to a deal that could move a bill through the Senate.

THE WHITE HOUSE -- which oftentimes sees the legislative process as cumbersome, obtuse and unnecessary -- will need to be engaged. Expect MARK MEADOWS to be on Capitol Hill throughout this phase.

AND THAT BRINGS US TO ...

... THE BIG EVENT TODAY: THE HOUSE will mark up its police bill in Judiciary this morning. The hearing will take place in the CVC at 10 a.m. Unlike the Senate, the bill's passage is basically a foregone conclusion in the House. But there are landmines here as well. Democrats are under tremendous pressure from their base to produce. Furthermore, Dems are hoping and working to pick up some moderate GOP votes when they bring the bill to the floor.

SOMETHING TO WATCH FOR: HEATHER CAYGLE scooped Tuesday night that the House will require masks in committee hearings. Lots of Republicans are skipping face coverings in the Capitol, so let's see how they respond to this directive.

WHITE HOUSE MEMO ... NYT'S PETER BAKER: "Trump Dismisses Criticism of Law Enforcement (Unless It's His)": "Mr. Trump is the 'president of law and order,' as he calls himself, except when it comes to himself or his friends. He has little patience for criticism of law enforcement, unless it is his. If the police shove a 75-year-old peaceful protester to the ground, cracking his head, it must be the protester's fault. If the police prosecute one of his friends for tax fraud or perjury, it must be that the officers are corrupt."

NEW ... Former President GEORGE W. BUSH will be the special guest at a virtual NRSC fundraiser June 30 for Sens. THOM TILLIS (N.C.), CORY GARDNER (Colo.), MARTHA MCSALLY (Ariz.) and SUSAN COLLINS (Maine). For $25,000, you can get a "roundtable" with BUSH and the senators. The invitation

WHAT THEY'RE READING IN PALM BEACH -- "Trump golf club asks Palm Beach County for rent relief," by the Palm Beach Post's Christine Stapleton: "President Donald Trump's golf club in West Palm Beach has asked Palm Beach County to defer some of the $88,338 monthly rent it pays to lease public land for the president's the private golf club, citing hardships caused by the coronavirus pandemic.

"In a June 5 letter to the county, the club's finance director, Ed Raymundo, cited the 'significant impact' caused by [the] county's order shutting parks and golf courses during the pandemic. The March 25 order coincided with the 'busiest part of our season,' Raymundo wrote.

"The county and its Department of Airports, which both hold leases on Trump's 27-hole golf club on airport property, have taken no action on the club's request for rent relief, according to county officials. The club has paid rent through June."

MORE FROM BURGESS EVERETT and JOHN BRESNAHAN on MCCONNELL and the GOP LEADERSHIP: "The esteem for McConnell is so high among Republicans that those who could eventually replace him have no issue with him staying on as long as he wants. And that makes McConnell's hold on leadership rock solid.

"'Mitch McConnell will be our leader as long as he's still interested in the job,' said Sen. John Cornyn (R-Texas). 'After he leaves that position, I would be interested in succeeding him.' 'The leader's made it clear that he wants to continue to serve and he enjoys great confidence in the conference,' said Senate Majority Whip John Thune (R-S.D.). 'My expectation is that, irrespective of what happens in November, he'll continue to lead the Republican Conference.'"

Florida reported 2,783 new cases, Texas 2,622, and Arizona 2,392.

“When I look at the TV and I see pictures of people congregating at bars when the location they are indicates they shouldn’t be doing that, that’s very risky,’ Dr. Fauci said in an interview Tuesday. ‘People keep talking about a second wave,’ he added. ‘We’re still in a first wave.’”

“The lawsuit in the district court of Tulsa County sought a temporary injunction against the company that manages the 19,000-seat venue, the BOK Center, ‘to protect against a substantial, imminent, and deadly risk to the community,’ according to a copy of the complaint. TRUMP’S BOLTON COUNTEROFFENSIVE -- “Trump launches the tell-all playbook on Bolton: lawsuits and Twitter threats,” by Meridith McGraw and Natasha Bertrand: “The latest White House staffing drama is now playing out over the pages of a book.

“With ex-national security adviser John Bolton’s tell-all tentatively set for release next week, White House aides are anxiously waiting to see what, if any, damning information is contained between the covers. In the meantime, they've activated the typical Trump team playbook for ex-staffers who decide to spill the administration's innerworkings in print: lawsuits, character assassination on Twitter and presidential haranguing.

“On Tuesday night, the Justice Department sued Bolton to delay the publication of his memoirs, claiming the 592-page tome contains classified information, a charge Bolton's lawyer has denied. It's a suit that seems unlikely to actually block the book from coming out — early copies have already been distributed, and the publisher, Simon & Schuster, was not named in the suit. But the move escalates the monthslong cat-and-mouse game between Bolton and the White House, with each side accusing the other of not acting in good faith.” POLITICO

YIKES -- “Nebraska Democrats renounce their Senate pick over comments,” by AP's Grant Schulte in Omaha, Neb.: “The Nebraska Democratic Party called on its U.S. Senate nominee to drop out of the race Tuesday after he made sexually repugnant comments about a campaign staffer in a group text with her and other staffers. The party said its state executive committee voted unanimously on Monday evening to withdraw all of its resources from Chris Janicek's campaign.

“Janicek, the owner of an Omaha cupcake bakery, is challenging Republican Sen. Ben Sasse, who is seeking a second term. ... The text messages, which were obtained by The Associated Press, were from a group chat involving Janicek and five other people, including the female staffer. At one point, he wrote that he had argued with her and then asked whether the campaign should spend money on ‘getting her laid.’ ‘It will probably take three guys,’ he wrote, before describing in graphic detail an imagined group sex scene involving the female staffer.” AP

NEW POLITICO/MORNING CONSULT POLL -- “Poll: Trump voters want to protect Dreamers ,” by Anita Kumar: “A majority of Trump voters want to protect so-called Dreamers from deportation, according to a new poll, putting pressure on President Donald Trump to shield immigrants who were brought to the country illegally as children.

“The same trend holds across all Republicans, according to the findings from the latest POLITICO/Morning Consult poll. In fact, the poll indicates that wide swaths of registered voters support Dreamers regardless of gender, education, income, ethnicity, religion and ideology. That includes 68 percent of Republicans, 71 percent of conservatives and 64 percent of those who approve of the job Trump is doing. Even 69 percent of those who voted for Trump in 2016 — when he vowed to deport Dreamers — say they should be protected.

“The findings highlight a looming political challenge for Trump as he runs for a second term, partly to make good on his promises to immigration hard-liners while looking to appeal to Hispanics and slicing into the advantage Democrats have with them.” POLITICO

IN RECENT DAYS, President DONALD TRUMP and his administration have reinjected BARACK OBAMA into the political fray. Privately around town, some Republicans have wondered about the wisdom of doing that, since polls consistently show that OBAMA is one of the best-liked people in public life.

-- ERIC SCHMELTZER, a progressive PR consultant, paid $4,500 out of his own pocket to commission a poll looking at who would win in a head-to-head contest: TRUMP or OBAMA. PPP did the poll, and it showed OBAMA would beat TRUMP, 54-43. Of course, a poll like this is mostly a novelty since OBAMA can't run again. But it does serve to highlight the dicey nature of elevating the former president. The crosstabs

SENATE GOP FOLLOWS THE LEADER ... BURGESS EVERETT and ANDREW DESIDERIO: "In the days to come and with [Mitch] McConnell's public blessing, GOP committee chairmen plan to follow Trump's lead and approve a series of subpoenas for documents and testimony that could hit some of Trump's favorite targets, including Hunter Biden and dozens of Obama administration officials.

"It's all part of the last stage of the GOP's evolution during Trump's first term: an apparent end to public disagreements for the next six months until the party is past the election. 'I just think that everybody realizes that our fortunes sort of rise or fall together,' said Sen. John Thune (R-S.D.), the party whip. 'One thing we have to do is to make sure that we are united on our agenda and make sure that there's not separation between the White House and Republicans in Congress.'" POLITICO

NEW: REP. ERIC SWALWELL (D-Calif.) is planning to use the national fundraising base he built to launch REMEDY PAC, a committee that is aiming to register new voters, expand the House Democratic majority and win Senate seats.

-- WHAT'S BEHIND THE MOVE: THIS IS SWALWELL'S first big political play since his short-lived presidential bid. It's an attempt to use his network of national donors to get young Democrats to Washington. And it's a sign of early jockeying for power in the next wave of leadership in Washington.

-- THE COMMITTEE is launching with a dramatic, direct-to-camera ad with a Covid-19 victim's daughter talking as it depicts TRUMP playing golf, partying, spending time at his Florida resort and holding political rallies as the coronavirus spread throughout the United States. The video ends with a montage of people who died due to Covid-19, with the message on the screen: "They can't vote. Will you?" Eleven Films did the spot. A shorter version of the ad will air on TV next week -- details have not yet been finalized. The 1:40 clip

Sharice Davids (Kan.), Kendra Horn (Okla.) and Lucy McBath (Ga.).

THE POMPEO CORNER ... NBC: "Pompeo's elite taxpayer-funded dinners raise new concerns," by Josh Lederman, Laura Strickler and Dan De Luce: "As federal workers file out of the State Department at the end of a Washington workday, an elite group is often just arriving in the marbled, flag-lined lobby: Billionaire CEOs, Supreme Court justices, political heavyweights and ambassadors arrive in evening attire as they're escorted by private elevator to dinner with Secretary of State Mike Pompeo.

"Until the coronavirus shut them down in March, the gatherings were known as 'Madison Dinners' — elaborate, unpublicized affairs that Pompeo and his wife, Susan Pompeo, began in 2018 and held regularly in the historic Diplomatic Reception Rooms on the government's dime.

State Department officials involved in the dinners said they had raised concerns internally that the events were essentially using federal resources to cultivate a donor and supporter base for Pompeo's political ambitions — complete with extensive contact information that gets sent back to Susan Pompeo's personal email address. The officials and others who attended discussed the dinners on condition of anonymity." NBC

-- NYT'S EDWARD WONG and DAVID SANGER: "Pompeo Declined Interview Request From Inspector General About Saudi Arms Sales": "Secretary of State Mike Pompeo declined an interview request for the State Department inspector general's inquiry into whether the Trump administration acted illegally in declaring an 'emergency' to bypass a congressional freeze on arms sales to Saudi Arabia and the United Arab Emirates, according to three people with knowledge of his actions.

"Mr. Pompeo chose instead to answer written questions from investigators working for the inspector general, Steve A. Linick, who was fired by President Trump on Friday. That indicates that the secretary of state was aware of Mr. Linick's investigation and the specific lines of questioning about Mr. Pompeo's decision last year to resume the sales of bombs and other weapons, which had been stalled since 2017. Saudi Arabia has led Persian Gulf nations in an air war in Yemen that has resulted in large numbers of civilian deaths."

WAPO, A1: NICK MIROFF: "Trump's preferred construction firm lands $1.3 billion border wall contract, the biggest so far" : "A North Dakota construction firm that has received backing from President Trump has now secured the largest border wall contract ever awarded, a $1.3 billion deal to build 42 miles of black-painted fencing through the rugged mountains of southern Arizona.

"The company that won the contract, Fisher Sand and Gravel, has been repeatedly lauded by the president in White House meetings with border officials and military commanders, the result of a long and personalized marketing pitch to Trump and ardent supporters of his barrier project.

"After its initial bids for border contracts were passed over, the company and its CEO, Tommy Fisher, cut a direct path to the president by praising him on cable news, donating to his Republican allies and cultivating ties to former Trump adviser Stephen K. Bannon, GOP Senate candidate Kris Kobach and other conservative figures in Trump's orbit.

"Fisher's first and only other major border contract, for $400 million, is under review by the Defense Department inspector general after Democratic lawmakers raised concerns about improper White House influence on the procurement process. The inspector general's office confirmed Tuesday that the audit is ongoing."

Maintaining access to affordable health insurance is critical, especially today. See our proposals to ensure Americans stay covered, providing security when they need it most.

WE ARE SEEING AN UNMISTAKABLE DESIRE from across society to move to the next phase of the coronavirus. The president wants to hold rallies, Trump allies are pushing reopening, the government is creeping back to life, universities are planning their reopenings, and retailers are ending their hazard pay.

GABBY ORR: "A moonshot mission': Trump campaign eyes a return to megarallies": "Before the end of this month, the Trump campaign hopes to organize a series of virtual events featuring the president, who has eschewed the digital campaign trail while others involved with his reelection court voters and train supporters during nightly live streams and online briefings.

"The president's 2020 team is also keeping a close eye on regional reopenings, where modified campaign activities could soon be permitted, according to three people involved with the discussions. Some White House allies have encouraged the campaign to prioritize its plan for restarting rallies, worried that the optics and purpose of Trump's official travel — during which the president has sent mixed messages about his administration's response to the pandemic while surrounded by aides in face masks — is too morbid and lacks the showmanship his core base adores.”

“The plan was discussed in a May 11 conference call with a senior staffer for the Trump reelection campaign organized by CNP Action, an affiliate of the GOP-aligned Council for National Policy. Kentucky — who've been told to report to work June 1. They're needed for work that can't be done remotely, Rettig said in an email to employees Tuesday. NYT, A1: "Iran Quietly Lowers the Temperature With U.S.," by Alissa Rubin in Baghdad and Farnaz Fassihi: "After years of increasing tensions that nearly led to war, Iran has moderated its approach to the West, shifting from a policy of provocation to one of limited cooperation. The change reflects an effort to avoid direct confrontation with the United States that the Iranians say could benefit President Trump in the November election.

“Nowhere is the shift more evident than in Iraq, where Iran has backed a pro-American prime minister and ordered its proxy militias to cease their rocket attacks on American forces. The Americans, while publicly dismissive of any change in Iranian posture, have quietly reciprocated in modest and indirect ways. ...

“‘Pressure works,’ Brian Hook, the State Department’s special representative for Iran policy, said Tuesday. ‘For over three years we have contained and countered Iran through deterrence and diplomacy. The regime is also broke because of our sanctions. Iran’s leaders today face a choice: either negotiate with President Trump or manage economic collapse.’”

NEW POLITICO/MORNING CONSULT POLL -- “Anti-China sentiment is on the rise,” by Marc Caputo: “Anti-China sentiment is rising in the United States, according to a new poll that reflects the foreign country’s role as the point of origin of the coronavirus and the millions of dollars in negative ads spent by President Donald Trump, former Vice President Joe Biden and their allies as each paints the other as weak on the U.S.-China relationship.

“Since January, the percentage of U.S. voters who say China is an ‘enemy’ has risen 11 percentage points to 31 percent, while the percentage of voters who say China is either an ally or friend has fallen 9 points to a combined 23 percent, a new POLITICO/Morning Consult poll shows. The 30 percent who say China is unfriendly but not an enemy has held about constant in the past five months.

"Privately held Phlow Corp., a Richmond, Va.-based company incorporated earlier this year, said the funding will support manufacture that began recently of more than a dozen generic prescription drugs in short supply that are used to treat Covid-19 patients. ... In late March, the company hired two lobbying firms with experience representing pharmaceutical and biomedical firms, according to lobbying records, paying them $30,000 in the first quarter.

"The company's pitch to the administration, a person familiar with the matter said, focused on an America-centric message that appealed to officials like [White House trade adviser Peter] Navarro, who has pushed for the U.S. to become less reliant on countries including China. Mr. Navarro said he wasn't involved in the procurement process. 'That project is just so congruent with the Trump strategy and policy...that it's about the easiest lift imaginable,' he said.

DRIVING THE DAY

AND NOW WE WAIT.

-- THE HOUSE passed $3 trillion in stimulus money, but the Senate is in no rush to start working on another package.

-- A VACCINE is in development, but we won't know more until later this fall.

-- THE PRESIDENTIAL CAMPAIGN seems like it's slogging through mud. There are no public events and no in-person fundraisers, and the conventions are scheduled for later this summer. (REID EPSTEIN reports in the NYT that Democratic delegates don't even want to go to the convention.)

-- STATES AROUND THE COUNTRY are beginning to reopen. Leaders are left guessing whether there will be a spike in Covid-19 cases.

-- MUCH OF THE WORLD IS WORKING FROM HOME, and major companies have said workers may come back to the office after Labor Day ... or not. It's far too soon to predict when life could return to normal.

OUR WORLD BEFORE AND DURING this coronavirus crisis has been quickly shifting, and filled with twists and turns. But suddenly, it feels like we're in a state of suspended animation.

ALEX ISENSTADT: "Swing-state Republicans warn Trump needs to get the pandemic right — or else": "Interviews with nearly a dozen former governors, members of Congress, and other current and former party leaders revealed widespread apprehension about Trump's standing six months out from the election.

"Many fret that Trump's hopes are now hitched to the pandemic; others point to demographic changes in once-reliably red states and to the challenge of running against a hard-to-define Democratic opponent who appeals to a wide swath of voters. The concerns give voice to an assortment of recent battleground state polling showing Trump struggling against Biden.

“There are certain to be plenty of momentum shifts before the election, especially in such a volatile political environment. Trump enjoys a vast resource advantage and his campaign has only begun going after Biden with sustained advertising — an effort that isn’t yet fully reflected in public polls, his advisers said. This past week, the campaign circulated a memo to supporters saying that Trump had closed a once-substantial national gap. And throughout 2016, many Republicans thought he wouldn’t win. But that hasn’t quelled GOP fears, even in some traditionally friendly states.” POLITICO

WAPO’S ASHLEY PARKER and PHIL RUCKER: “In next phase of pandemic, Trump appears poised to let others take the lead”: “President Trump has proclaimed the latest phase of pandemic response the ‘transition to greatness.’ But Trump appears poised to preside over the eventual transition more as a salesman and marketer than a decider.

“Many consequential actions are being done by others. The nation’s governors are overseeing their states’ plans to reopen their economies. Business leaders are making their own choices about how their employees can safely and responsibly return to work. Treasury officials are negotiating with Congress the details of financial stimulus packages. And scientists and public health officials are leading the race for a vaccine.

“The United States under Trump has also retreated from its historic position of global leadership, declining, for instance, to participate in a coronavirus summit with other nations earlier this month.”

WSJ PAGE ONE: “Coronavirus Vaccine Front-Runners Emerge, Rollouts Weighed,” by Peter Loftus: “Governments and drugmakers are weighing how to roll out coronavirus vaccines, including reserving the first batches for health-care workers, as several shots race to early leads.

“Of more than 100 vaccines in development globally, at least eight have started testing in humans, including candidates from Moderna Inc. and Pfizer Inc. At the same time, pharmaceutical giants like Johnson & Johnson, AstraZeneca PLC and Sanofi SA are building capacity to make hundreds of millions of doses of their own or their partners’ vaccines. The efforts are part of a larger rush, including at the White House, to line up funding for accelerated testing and expanded manufacturing capacity, all to make doses available in the U.S. starting as soon as this fall.”

Good Monday morning.

WHAT THEY'RE READING IN FOGGY BOTTOM ... NYT, A1: "Inspector General's Firing Puts Pompeo's Use of Taxpayer Funds Under Scrutiny," by Edward Wong: "Secretary of State Mike Pompeo swatted away questions about his use of government resources again and again last year.

"In January, news reports cited unnamed diplomats complaining about his wife, Susan, traveling with him across the Middle East during a partial government shutdown. In the summer, members of Congress began examining a whistle-blower complaint accusing Mr. Pompeo of asking diplomatic security agents to run errands like picking up restaurant takeout meals and retrieving the family dog, Sherman, from a groomer.

"And in October, a Democratic senator called for a special counsel to investigate his use of State Department aircraft and funds for frequent visits to Kansas, where he was reported to be considering a Senate run.

"In each case, Mr. Pompeo or other department officials denied wrongdoing, and the secretary moved on unscathed. But his record is now coming under fresh scrutiny after President Trump told Congress on Friday night that he was firing the State Department inspector general — at Mr. Pompeo's private urging, a White House official said."

JAY POWELL SPEAKS -- "Fed's Powell warns unemployment could reach Depression-level 25 percent," by Victoria Guida: "Federal Reserve Chair Jerome Powell on Sunday warned that the nation's unemployment rate could soar to 25 percent during the worst of the coronavirus crisis, though he said the economy should recover more quickly than during the Great Depression, when joblessness last reached those levels.

"Those numbers sound about right for what the peak may be,' Powell said on CBS' '60 Minutes' after reporter Scott Pelley asked whether unemployment could reach 20 percent or even 25 percent. ... 'This economy will recover,' he said. 'We'll get through this. It may take a while. ... It could stretch through the end of next year. We really don't know.'

"The central bank has taken extraordinary measures to rescue the economy since the pandemic began sweeping through the country — slashing interest rates to zero, rolling out trillions of dollars in lending programs for financial markets, and taking the unprecedented step of bailing out state and city governments.

"There's really no limit to what we can do with these lending programs,' Powell said. 'There's a lot more we can do to support the economy, and we're committed to doing everything we can as long as we need to.'" Full interview

WAPO/ALPHARETTA, GA.: "This feels great": A preview from Georgia about how America might

MEANWHILE ... IN THE WEST WING, via NANCY COOK: “Trump’s own top staffers are increasingly working from home. The White House has started to schedule more meetings by teleconference after two staffers tested positive for Covid-19, including one of the president’s military valets. Aides are now required to wear face masks around the White House, and in-person meetings, if they occur at all, are held in the largest conference rooms possible. Even the White House mess, where staffers grab lunch and coffee, has shut down and is open only through the take-out window.

“The most prominent office in America — with all of the testing, resources and doctors it needs — is still struggling to keep its employees and leaders safe, even as more than a dozen states reopen businesses, restaurants, parks and beaches. The White House’s struggles and its ongoing revision of its health measures offer a window into the myriad challenges that thousands of companies and employers face as they consider bringing back non-essential workers.”

ALSO FROM NANCY COOK ... WILL BEN HOWARD RETURN?: “Top officials including Meadows are now searching for a new director of legislative affairs since the current one, Eric Ueland, is in discussions with the State Department about a top political position.

“Meadows is eyeing for that legislative affairs role Ben Howard, a vice president at the Duberstein Group who previously worked for Trump White House twice -- first as a special assistant to the president and later as the deputy director for legislative affairs. Howard’s specialty on the Hill is knowing the House and working with Republicans to pass major legislation like the 2017 tax bill and the USMCA, and the president has always appreciated Howard, who he jokingly has called in front of congressional lawmakers ‘that young, brilliant guy who everyone likes.’ Both Howard and the White House press office declined to comment.”

THE BIG PICTURE -- AP’S JONATHAN LEMIRE and BILL BARROW: “2016 repeat? Trump revives Clinton playbook to battle Biden”: “Trump and his allies are dusting off the playbook that helped defeat Hillary Clinton, reviving it in recent days as they try to frame 2020 as an election between a dishonest establishment politician and a political outsider being targeted for taking on the system. This time, however, the so-called outsider is the sitting president of the United States.” AP

ALEX THOMPSON: “Progressives thought they'd overtaken the Democratic Party. Now they're in despair”: “The abrupt reversal of fortune has prompted introspection among many left-wing activists, who only three months ago were confident that the future of the Democratic Party was theirs. Interviews with more than 15 left-wing leaders — including grass-roots organizers, down-ballot candidates and former aides to Sanders and Sen. Elizabeth Warren — revealed strife over what went wrong and what to do next.

“Some asserted that Sanders’ and other challengers’ losses were just the result of campaign missteps and that their ideas remain popular. They argued that progressives still are on track to take over the party in the coming years and are looking to other down-ballot races this year to make a mark.

“But others were less sanguine about the left’s future, after their losses this year and in the 2018 midterms. Several pointed to progressives’ failure to make serious inroads with older black voters, the most loyal base of the Democratic primary. And some said they fear the Democratic Party is drifting away from the more class-based politics they are advocating for, as national Democrats increasingly target wealthier, more educated suburban voters to make up for losses in rural areas.”

TRUMP’S MONDAY -- The president will participate in a roundtable with restaurant executives and industry leaders at 2 p.m. in the State Dining Room. He and first lady Melania Trump will participate in a video teleconference with governors on the coronavirus at 4 p.m. in the Situation Room.

WAITING ON UNEMPLOYMENT BENEFITS -- “Millions in U.S. Are On Edge, Waiting for Jobless Benefits,” by Bloomberg’s Shawn Donnan, Reade Pickert and Catarina Saraiva: “Millions of Americans who are owed tens of billions of dollars in unemployment benefits are still waiting to receive the help they have been promised two months after the Covid-19 pandemic unleashed a historic wave of layoffs.

“Even as job losses continue to mount, states that have ramped up staffing and deployed new computer systems are struggling to handle a surge that has seen 36.5 million people -- about one in five American workers -- file for unemployment since mid-March.

“The result is that a key element of the U.S.’s unprecedented fiscal response is running into problems that highlight the difficulty of getting money to people who need it to weather the crisis. The delayed payments also help explain why frustration is growing with state lockdowns and clashing with fresh warnings from public health officials that a pandemic that has claimed more than 85,000 lives in the U.S. remains a major risk.” Bloomberg

KNIVES OUT FOR REDFIELD ... SCOTT GOTTLIEB in the WSJ: “Cut Through the Fog of Coronavirus War”: “The Centers for Disease Control and Prevention made its first definitive statement last week describing a rare but disturbing condition in children related to Covid-19. Doctors in the U.K. first reported in April a spike in previously healthy children presenting with features similar to another rare condition, Kawasaki disease, whose symptoms include rash and fever and, later in its progression, inflammation of blood vessels.

“This is a reminder of how much we don’t know about Covid-19. We’ve learned a lot over the past two months as Covid-19 became an epidemic, with 1.5 million Americans diagnosed and more than 90,000 dead. New insights have translated into improved care. This knowledge is saving lives and will be especially useful if infections flare up again.

“Yet such data on patients isn’t being streamlined and shared with the public quickly. There are shortcomings in our ability to access the electronic systems designed to help glean facts from clinical data. CDC hasn’t been filling its traditional role of promptly publishing medical findings that may help doctors care for patients. Instead, a lot of this information is being passed around social media, by email or even through word of mouth. It’s trial and error on a global scale.”

RBG FOR THE RIGHT? -- “Passed By for Decades, Clarence Thomas Is a New Symbol of the Trump Era,” by NYT’s Nicholas Casey: “Justice Thomas, the Supreme Court’s most conservative member, is catching up in his own way at age 71. After 28 years of rarely speaking from the bench, Justice Thomas is newly in the public eye (or ear) as he regularly asks questions during oral arguments that are being conducted by conference call and broadcast live during the pandemic.

“He was the subject of a recent book, ‘The Enigma of Clarence Thomas,’ which led to a flurry of articles and book reviews on his life and legal thought. A new biographical documentary, made by the conservative filmmaker Michael Pack, airs Monday on PBS. For the project, the justice spoke to filmmakers for 30 hours — an astounding feat for a jurist who once went 10 years without asking a question from the bench.

“He would have never said, “Gee whiz, I should be an icon,”” said Helgi Walker, a lawyer at the firm Gibson Dunn who clerked for Justice Thomas in 1995 and 1996. ‘But life is long, and it’s amazing how things can turn out sometimes.’” NYT BUSINESS BURST -- “Grubhub Rebuffs Uber’s Latest Offer as Merger Talks Continue,” by WSJ’s Cara Lombardo: “Uber Technologies Inc. and Grubhub Inc. continued their merger discussions over the weekend, with the companies’ chief executives trying to hash out the price of a deal that would reshape the meal-delivery business.

“Grubhub Chief Executive Matt Maloney spoke to Uber Chief Dara Khosrowshahi Sunday and indicated that Uber’s latest offer of 1.9 of its shares for each Grubhub share is too low, according to people familiar with the matter. Mr. Khosrowshahi said he might be able increase the offer to 1.925 Uber shares, but that is still well below the price Grubhub had been seeking.

“There is no guarantee the companies will manage to reach agreement on a price, and once they do there are still other items to be negotiated for a deal that would combine Grubhub with Uber’s food-delivery unit, Uber Eats. An agreement—should there be one—is still unlikely in the next few days, the people said.” WSJ

China Rejects U.S. Claim; Germany Reviews Curbs: Virus Update

2020-05-06 10:35:00.498 GMT

By Bloomberg News

(Bloomberg) -- China's leaders are considering the option of not setting a numerical target for economic growth this year.

The European Union's executive arm warned that the bloc is facing the deepest economic downturn in its history, threatening the future of the euro.

President Donald Trump said Americans should begin returning to their everyday lives even if it leads to more sickness and death. Beijing fired back at U.S. Secretary of State Michael Pompeo, saying he has no evidence to back up claims that Covid-19 escaped from a lab in Wuhan.

Germany is set to allow restaurants to reopen, one of the steps under discussion in a meeting between Chancellor Angela Merkel and state leaders later on Wednesday. Spain reported an increase in new fatalities before a vote to extend a state of emergency beyond May 9.

Key Developments

- * Virus Tracker: cases pass 3.6 million; deaths top 256,000
 - * Russia adds more than 10,000 cases for fourth straight day
 - * Lawsuits against China escalate blame game with U.S.
 - * Layoffs start turning permanent across America
 - * Work-from-resort: How Ken Griffin stayed on top of markets
 - * Covid-19 research groups are being attacked by hackers

Heathrow Trials Technology to Cut Virus Risk (6:15 a.m. NY)

London Heathrow airport is set to trial health screening technologies to reduce the risk from the coronavirus. Trials will begin in the next two weeks in Terminal 2 and will include UV sanitation to quickly sanitize security trays, facial recognition thermal screening technology to accurately track temperatures and contactless security procedures. Data will be shared with government and the travel sector, with the goal of jump-starting an international standard for health screening.

Germany Prepares to Open Restaurants (6:08 a.m. NY)

The country's 16 states will allow restaurants to open to customers as long as the businesses make sanitary provisions, allow for sufficient distancing between patrons and take steps to protect their staff from coronavirus infection, according to a person familiar with the discussions. The openings are expected to be phased in starting on Saturday with states setting their own pace depending on local conditions. The move is one of the steps under discussion in a meeting on Wednesday between Chancellor Angela Merkel and state leaders. Germany is considering taking its biggest steps yet toward normality as the outbreak slows.

U.K. Approves 69,000 Loans (6:01 am. NY)

U.K. banks approved more than 69,000 state-backed loans on the first day of a program designed to help cash-strapped small businesses survive the lockdown. The loans are worth more than 2 billion pounds ($2.5 billion) in total, the Treasury said. More than 130,000 applications were received on Monday and lenders are attempting to process them as quickly as possible.

China May Drop Numerical Growth Target (5:53 p.m. HK)

China's leaders are considering the option of not setting a numerical target for economic growth this year given the uncertainty caused by the global coronavirus pandemic, according to people familiar with the matter. What may instead be unveiled at the National People's Congress later this month is a description of the goal for gross domestic product growth, one of the people said. Last year the target was a range of 6% to 6.5%.

A final decision hasn't been made on how to characterize the target, the people said, who asked not to be identified discussing confidential policy deliberations. The government work report, which usually contains the GDP target, is typically revised repeatedly in the lead up to the conference.

The world's second-largest economy is on track for its worst performance in the post-Mao era, as the impact of shutdowns to curb the disease outbreak at home is compounded by a slump in global demand as the pandemic spreads. That has left the leadership with the choice of setting an unpalatably low growth target, an unrealistically high one, or skipping it altogether.

Iran New Cases Rise Again (5:40 p.m. HK)

Iran's total coronavirus cases surpassed 100,000 after the country's daily tally of infections rose for a fourth day, with 1,680 new cases overnight. The total number of fatalities reached 6,418 with 78 more deaths in the past 24 hours.

Taiwan Urges WHO to Let It Join Key Meeting (5:18 p.m. HK)

Taiwan urged the World Health Organization to allow it to rejoin a key global health assembly later this month despite objections from China, as Taipei pushes for more inclusion in international bodies.

Taiwan needs a seat at the WHO's annual decision-making meeting, the World Health Assembly, on May 18 to allow it access to firsthand information about the spread of the pandemic, Health Minister Chen Shih-chung said at a briefing in Taipei Wednesday.

Taiwan's successful handling of the outbreak -- and rising global concern about China's initial response to it -- has led to a groundswell of support for the island's participation in this month's assembly. The U.S. has publicly backed Taiwan's inclusion and, according to a Fox News report, is seeking support from major European nations too.

Belgium Revises Up Death Toll (5:15 p.m. HK)

Belgium reported 339 additional deaths from the pandemic, up from 97 the prior day, for a total of 8,339. The surge in fatalities is a result of revisions, as 229 hospital deaths from March 24 through May 4 were added to the tally. None of those were cases confirmed by a diagnostic test for the virus, but 71 could be confirmed by a CT scan. The remaining fatalities are suspected cases based on medical interpretation of symptoms displayed.

Euro-Area Survival at Risk (5 p.m. HK)

The European Union is facing the deepest economic downturn in its history, which threatens the very future of the euro currency if the crisis is badly handled, the bloc's executive arm warned. The euro-region economy is set to shrink 7.7% this year, sending unemployment and public debt levels surging, after governments put in place drastic measures to limit the spread of the coronavirus, the European Commission said. Officials warned that the crisis risks widening the gulf between northern and southern euro nations and pushing the bloc to the breaking point because of differing exposures to the tourism industry and governments' capacity to support businesses and households.

Spain Deaths Rise Before Emergency Vote (5 p.m. HK)

The number of fatalities rose by 244 to 25,857 in the 24 hours through Wednesday, the most in four days and compared with an increase of 185 on Tuesday, according to Health Ministry data. Infections rose by 685 to 220,325 after the previous day's gain of 867. The total number of cases was adjusted to reflect changes in data for the Madrid region. Prime Minister Pedro Sanchez is asking parliament on Wednesday for permission to extend a state of emergency beyond May 9, even after a steady drop in the number of infections and new cases over the past month.

U.K. Statisticians Tackle Data Gaps With Tweaks (4:40 p.m. HK)

Britain's Office for National Statistics is battling to collect accurate inflation data during the lockdown. About one in five of the items usually used to calculate consumer-price inflation are currently unavailable, meaning the indexes that are used to set everything from mortgage and pension payments to some gilt yields will likely be more volatile, the ONS said. It will temporarily suspend its House Price Index.

Statisticians usually rely on a network of people across the country visiting stores each month to collect about 80% of prices included, but shutdowns, social distancing and shortages have all meant that they have had to reconsider. Instead, prices will be gathered online or by phone and over a longer period.

Recession Deepens in Europe's South (4:20 p.m. HK)

Italy and Spain, the two European countries most severely hit by the coronavirus, are suffering even deeper slumps after record contractions in the first quarter. Lockdowns that shut hotels and restaurants meant companies experienced unprecedented declines in output and new orders in April.

In Italy, the euro area's third-largest economy and also one of the region's most indebted, a PMI for services dropped to 10.8 in April. Spain saw its gauges slumping to 7.1, with hotels, restaurants and transport providers particularly badly affected. For the euro area as a whole, the reading was 13.6. With virus infections slowing, both countries have started to ease some lockdown rules. The political wear and tear is starting to show as leaders try to maintain control amid pressure to let people get back to work and tensions within coalitions. Italian Prime Minister Giuseppe Conte is facing speculation about how long he can survive after he was forced to apologize for delays in delivering aid. In Madrid, Pedro Sanchez faces a vote in parliament to extend his emergency powers Wednesday afternoon.

China Rejects U.S. Claims (3:54 p.m. HK)

China fired back at U.S. Secretary of State Michael Pompeo, saying he has no evidence to back up claims that Covid-19 escaped from a lab in the central city of Wuhan. The U.S. attacks on China are part of a strategy by President Donald Trump's Republican Party ahead of an election later this year, Chinese foreign ministry spokesperson Hua Chunying told reporters in Beijing on Wednesday. She said any discussion about the origin of the virus should be handled by scientists and not politicians.

Pompeo on Sunday claimed there is "enormous evidence" that the virus escaped from a high-security virology laboratory near the first known outbreak in Wuhan. He has advanced the theory despite Chinese denials and a lack of consensus among U.S.

intelligence agencies examining the virus's origins.

Russian Cases Top 10,000 Again (3:50 p.m. HK)

The number of confirmed cases in Russia rose by 10,559 to total 165,929. This is the fourth straight day the country has added more than 10,000 cases, though the growth in total number of cases has slowed to 6.8%. Total fatalities rose to 1,537 after 86 more died.

Singapore Steps Up Worker Dorm Inspections (3:45 p.m. HK)

Singapore has stepped up inspections of housing facilities for foreign migrant workers as it continues to struggle with a gulf-like divide between how coronavirus is hitting the city-state, with the vast majority of cases connected to worker dormitories. The health ministry reported 788 new cases of Covid-19 as of noon on May 6, taking the total number of cases nationwide above 20,000.

Ocado Revenue Soars; ITV Furloughs Staff (3:10 p.m. HK)

Ocado Group Plc's retail revenue rose more than 40% in the second quarter as the U.K. online grocer's sales were boosted by home shopping during the Covid-19 lockdown. The company suspended financial guidance for the year, saying uncertainty around the pandemic made it impossible to predict near-term sales trends. Earlier, Novo Nordisk A/S also reported surging sales as patients snapped up medicines ahead of lockdowns. Separately, ITV Plc said it will furlough 800 staff, representing about 15% of its workforce, mostly from production arm ITV Studios, after the lockdown blew a hole in its summer schedule and sent advertising, which normally accounts for about half of the company's revenue, tumbling. It has also "taken action" on board and management pay.

France to Test Antipsychotic (3:01 p.m. HK)

France's Sainte-Anne hospital will test the antipsychotic medicine chlorpromazine as a treatment for the coronavirus after noticing that only 3% of psychiatric patients had been sickened, compared with 19% of hospital personnel who weren't taking the drug, Le Parisien reported. Chlorpromazine will be tested on 40 patients with severe forms of Covid-19. Results of the study will be available in a month and may lead to broader clinical tests.

German Factory Orders Slump (2:17 p.m. HK)

German factories saw demand collapse in March, when measures to contain the coronavirus brought the economy to a sudden halt. Orders fell 15.6% from the previous month, the most since data collection started in 1991 and more than economists predicted. While all sectors were affected, investment goods plunged heavily. The Economy Ministry warned of big declines in production due to the virus.

The larger-than-consensus drop in German factory orders for March illustrates the scale of shutdowns in the euro-area's biggest economy, writes Bloomberg Economist Jamie Rush.

UniCredit Posts $2.9 Billion Loss (1:27 p.m. HK)

UniCredit SpA reported the second loss in a row as provisions related to the coronavirus added to the pain of one off costs for job cuts and the writedown of its Turkish unit. The net loss totaled 2.71 billion euros ($2.94 billion), as loan-loss provisions climbed to 1.26 billion euros, the Milan-based bank said on Wednesday.

Credit Agricole Sees Provision Surge (1 pm HK)

Credit Agricole SA is setting aside almost three times the amount it booked a year ago to cover souring loans because of the impact of the coronavirus, the latest lender to try and estimate the damage to its balance sheet from the outbreak. Provisions in the first three months of the year jumped to 621 million euros ($673 million) from 225 million euros a year earlier to take account of the worsening economic environment, the bank said in a statement on Wednesday.

China Urges U.S. to End 'Blame Game' (12:18 p.m. HK)

China's ambassador to Washington called for an end to the "blame game" over the coronavirus, in the country's most high-profile response since U.S. President Donald Trump escalated his criticism of Beijing.

Ambassador Cui Tiankai said in a column published in the Washington Post that allegations blaming China for the outbreak's spread risked "decoupling" the world's two largest economies. Increased suspicions also threatened to hurt U.S.-China cooperation to fight the disease and restart the global economy.

"It is time to end the blame game," Cui said. "It is time to focus on the disease and rebuild trust between our two countries."

Listen to today's Audio Briefing

DRIVING THE DAY

MAGGIE HABERMAN and MIKE SCHMIDT'S monster scoop in the NYT on Sunday night -- that JOHN BOLTON has written in a draft of his book that President DONALD TRUMP ordered aid to Ukraine held until it investigated the Bidens -- reminds the United States Senate and the American people of a reality that was, until now, easy to forget: BOLTON is going to tell his story, it's just a question of what medium it appears in first -- a book, a television segment or a sworn testimony. His lawyer's letter to the White House, noting officials there have had the book since Dec. 30

IN SOME WAYS, THERE'S NOTHING NEW here. The revelation confirms what nearly two dozen associates and employees of TRUMP told House investigators. The only people who say the opposite are the president and his associates.

BUT LET'S BE PERFECTLY CLEAR HERE: MAGGIE and MIKE'S story is as bad as can be for TRUMP. BOLTON is now contradicting the president's claim that he did not tie the aid to investigating JOE BIDEN, and he is a direct eyewitness. It comes at the absolute worst time for this White House: as the Senate is days away from deciding whether to call witnesses in the impeachment trial.

BOLTON IS DANGEROUS because he's unmoored from TRUMP. He clearly does not care what the president's orbit thinks of him. His 528-page book is titled, "The Room Where It Happened," with the words contained inside an oval (hint, hint). It is scheduled for release March 17 and, conveniently enough, is now available for pre-order on Amazon.

REPUBLICANS have done a good job during this process projecting confidence in their mastery of the situation, and their ability to deliver for the president.

BUT AS OF LATE SUNDAY, our GOP sources said they could not predict what was going to happen now with witnesses, and the Republican Conference lunch today will be key in determining the state of play. In other words, these top-level sources were allowing that things may have changed. We have yet to see if Republicans will brush off this new development, or whether it will push enough of them to vote for witnesses.

BOLTON IS NOT LEV PARNAS or one of these other characters who has sprouted up in the Trump era. He's a through-and-through conservative who was so far to the right that George W. Bush had to wait for recess to make him his U.N. envoy. He's known to members of the Senate. Not calling him to speak would be spurning one of their own in favor of TRUMP, whom many of them see as an interloper.

HERE'S THE DILEMMA FOR REPUBLICANS NOW: If you're one of the Republicans who were already uncomfortable with this president, how do you vote to not call Bolton after seeing this? Remember: BOLTON is publishing an entire book, and so far we know only what he's said on Ukraine -- not everything else he's seen.

A REMINDER OF THE TIMELINE: TRUMP'S attorneys are in the middle of their defense of the president. SENATORS then will have a chance to question both sides for a few days -- Democrats are sure to use this opportunity to force the president's team to address BOLTON. And after that, at some point later this week, we anticipate a vote on whether to allow witnesses and new documents.

THE TWEETS ... TRUMP responded at 12:18 a.m.: "I NEVER told John Bolton that the aid to Ukraine was tied to investigations into Democrats, including the Bidens. In fact, he never complained about this at the time of his very public termination. If John Bolton said this, it was only to sell a book. With that being said, the... ..transcripts of my calls with President Zelensky are all the proof that is needed, in addition to the fact that President Zelensky & the Foreign Minister of Ukraine said there was no pressure and no problems. Additionally, I met with President Zelensky at the United Nations... ..(Democrats said I never met) and released the military aid to Ukraine without any conditions or investigations - and far ahead of schedule. I also allowed Ukraine to purchase Javelin anti-tank missiles. My Administration has done far more than the previous Administration."

THE HOUSE MANAGERS' STATEMENT: "There can be no doubt now that Mr. Bolton directly contradicts the heart of the President's defense and therefore must be called as a witness at the impeachment trial of President Trump.

"SENATORS SHOULD INSIST that Mr. Bolton be called as a witness, and provide his notes and other relevant documents. The Senate trial must seek the full truth and Mr. Bolton has vital information to provide. There is no defensible reason to wait until his book is published, when the information he has to offer is critical to the most important decision Senators must now make — whether to convict the President of impeachable offenses."

MEANWHILE ... NANCY COOK: "President Donald Trump is already itching to broadcast the series finale of his impeachment. In recent days, he and top White House aides have been considering how he should celebrate his presumed acquittal by the Republican-controlled Senate and whether he should deliver a rare Oval Office address to mark the occasion, according to three senior administration officials."

SECRETARY OF STATE MIKE POMPEO is going to Ukraine this week, Nahal Toosi reminds in this story, just days after reportedly saying, "Do you think Americans care about Ukraine?"

TOP-ED ... BILL TAYLOR in the NYT: "Yes, Secretary Pompeo, Americans Should Care About Ukraine"

NEW ... MUCH INK WAS SPILLED -- in this newsletter, and elsewhere -- about the massive fundraising by the CONGRESSIONAL LEADERSHIP FUND and AMERICAN ACTION NETWORK last cycle when the GOP was in the majority. But here's a bit of a shock: The combined groups -- the main House GOP outside orgs -- pulled in a combined $68 million in 2019, their largest haul ever in an off year. This is so unexpected because House Republicans are in the minority, and conventional wisdom holds that they don't have a pathway out.

-- NOTABLY: CLF has $28 million on hand -- the most it has ever had going into an election year and twice as much as ever before. They raised $32.6 million last year. The combined groups have raised $2 million more than their previous record.

-- CONSIDER THIS: CLF/AAN had tax reform to raise off last cycle. That they are raising more money now, during a presidential cycle, is notable, and illustrates that donors believe Republicans have a decent chance of putting up a fight to win back the House. With the DCCC and Dem candidates mopping the floors with the NRCC and GOP candidates, CLF and AAN's cash will be critical for the party.

L.A. TIMES' BILL PLASCHKE ON KOBE: "Kobe Bryant is gone, and those are the hardest words I've ever had to write for this newspaper, and I still don't believe them as I'm writing them. I'm still crying, and go ahead, let it out. Don't be embarrassed, cry with me, weep and wail and shout into the streets, fill a suddenly empty Los Angeles with your pain. ...

"Kobe does not die. Not now. Kobe lives into his golden years, lives long enough to see his statues erected outside Staples Center and his jerseys inducted into the Basketball Hall of Fame. He lives long enough to sit courtside at Staples when he's stooped and gray, keeping alive the memories of two decades of greatness with a wink, maybe even fooling everyone one last time by retiring in a community next to JARED'S BIG MOMENT! ... NETANYAHU TO THE W.H. ... NYT'S MARK LANDLER: "Trump's Mideast Plan Is Seen Mainly as an Election Lift for Netanyahu": "The Israeli leader will return to the White House for meetings Monday and Tuesday, and Mr. Trump is expected at last to lay out the details of that long-awaited plan. Mr. Netanyahu said Sunday he hoped to 'make history' on the visit. ...

Shaq."

"For him to do this in the middle of an Israeli election, without any Palestinian participation and with no intention to follow up with any of the participants, shows this is not a peace plan at all," said Martin S. Indyk, who served as special envoy for Israeli-Palestinian negotiations under President Barack Obama. 'It is a farce from start to finish.'" NYT

SEVEN DAYS TO IOWA ... BOSTON GLOBE: "Our phone rings from 7 in the morning until 10 at night. Life in Iowa's political bombardment zone," by Dugan Arnett in Waverly, Iowa

WAPO: "Bernie Sanders faces barrage of attacks from rivals as polls point to surge in early-voting states." by Chelsea Janes and Sean Sullivan in West Des Moines: "Sen. Bernie Sanders faced a sudden barrage of attacks from his rivals Sunday amid signs that he was surging in the critical early-voting states of Iowa and New Hampshire and closing the gap nationally with the race's longtime polling leader, Joe Biden.

"Sanders's rise, with only days left before the Feb. 3 caucuses here, prompted urgent warnings from competing campaigns that the party is in jeopardy of nominating a self-identified democratic socialist whose far-left views would turn off the broad swath of voters required to defeat President Trump in the November general election.

"Bernie Sanders could be the nominee,' the campaign of Pete Buttigieg declared in an ominous-sounding fundraising message to supporters Saturday. A pointed text message followed on Sunday: 'We risk nominating a candidate who cannot beat Donald Trump in November. And that's a risk we can't take.'"

-- FOR THE RECORD: Here's a private plane that landed at DCA from Sioux City, Iowa, at 1 a.m.

ELENA SCHNEIDER in Des Moines: "Buttigieg takes his case to Fox News before Iowa": "Pete Buttigieg shot into 2020 contention with a viral town hall last March. On Sunday, he turned back to that setting for one final pre-Iowa caucuses boost — this time on Fox News, seeking an audience of disaffected moderates and 'future former Republicans' to pitch on electability.

"Buttigieg, who is vying with Joe Biden, Bernie Sanders and Elizabeth Warren for a win in the caucuses, isn't expecting to draw in many Iowa Republicans with his appearance on Fox News Sunday night. But the platform jibed with Buttigieg's closing message in the state: that the 38-year-old ex-mayor is best positioned to bring the party together to defeat President Donald Trump in November.

""This network is known for having a lot more conservative viewers, but I don't think you have to be a Democrat to see what is wrong with this president,' Buttigieg said, when asked about how he would appeal to Republican voters in the general election. 'If you're having trouble looking your kids in the eye and explaining this presidency to them, you have a choice.'" CORONAVIRUS UPDATE ... AP/BEIJING: "China on Monday expanded sweeping efforts to contain a viral disease by extending the Lunar New Year holiday to keep the public at home and avoid spreading infection as the death toll rose to 80.

"Hong Kong announced it would bar entry to visitors from the province at the center of the outbreak following a warning the virus's ability to spread was growing. Travel agencies were ordered to cancel group tours nationwide, adding to the rising economic cost.

"Increasingly drastic anti-disease efforts began with the Jan. 22 suspension of plane, train and bus links to Wuhan, a city of 11 million people in central China where the virus was first detected last month. That lockdown has expanded to a total of 17 cities with more than 50 million people in the most far-reaching disease-control measures ever imposed." AP

"Texting over WhatsApp about a plan for Amazon to build a huge data center in Saudi Arabia, the men forged a cordial and mutually beneficial relationship. 'It is very important for me, my friend, that you come to Saudi during the future investment Forum and we announce this $2.8B Vision 2030 partnership,' the prince messaged Mr. Bezos on Sept. 9, 2018, according to a review of texts by The Wall Street Journal and people familiar with the situation.

"Amazon stood to gain broader access to the Middle Eastern market. Prince Mohammed could be aided in his efforts to reform the Saudi economy as well as burnish his personal brand. DRIVING THE DAY

A COUPLE OF THINGS THAT DON'T REALLY MATTER, BUT COULD BE KIND OF FUN ... TODAY is 02/02/2020 -- a palindrome Punxsutawney Phil didn't see his shadow -- but who cares, because a rodent doesn't determine the change in seasons.

TRUMP HAS STRENGTHENED ... NEW NBC/WSJ POLL, by WSJ's Aaron Zitner : "The poll ... found some signs that the president's political standing has strengthened in recent months, due largely to a more energized Republican Party base.

"Mr. Trump's job approval in the January poll stood at 46%, with 51% disapproving, in line with results throughout the Trump presidency. But the share who 'strongly approve' of his job performance hit its highest mark, at 36%. Approval among independents rose to its highest level since the summer. A separate measure found that while half the country holds a negative overall view of Mr. Trump, 43% of voters view him favorably -- the largest share since his first month in office." WSJ

TABLE SETTER ... NYT, A1 ... JONATHAN MARTIN and ALEX BURNS: "Democratic Candidates Focus on All-Consuming Hunger to Unseat Trump": "After a long campaign of ideological clashes, policy debates and talk of a grand reckoning on the direction of the Democratic Party, the presidential primaries starting on Monday will be shaped by a less lofty but increasingly urgent matter: determining the best candidate to defeat an incumbent who has already proved to be a political survivor.

"With Republicans ready to acquit President Trump of two impeachment charges next week, the nation's political table has been set for 2020: Congress will not remove him from office, despite the wishes of many liberals, leaving the fate of Mr. Trump to the November general election and the candidate nominated by Democrats in the coming months.

"From the liberal left to the moderate middle, the major presidential contenders are now honing or recalibrating their final appeals before Iowa's caucuses to make the case that they represent the party's best chance to overcome Mr. Trump's well-funded re-election operation and win back the White House this fall. ...

"John Norris, who has caucused here every four years since 1976 and is a leading supporter of Ms. Warren, said his fellow Iowa Democrats feel a burden heavier than any he can recall. 'It's Trump,' said Mr. Norris. 'We saw it a little bit in '04 — it was we got to stop George W., Iraq war — but this is that on steroids.'" NYT

WAPO'S JENNA JOHNSON in Des Moines: "Sanders's caucus target: Latino voters usually overlooked in mostly white Iowa": "Although Latinos make up just 6 percent of Iowa's population — the vast majority of the state's residents are white — they have more than doubled in number over the past two decades. There are more than 50,000 registered Latino voters in the state, plus thousands more who are eligible, making them a potential force in caucuses that campaigns expect to draw up to 240,000 voters.

"Sanders's operation has done far more than his competitors in seeking the support of those voters, having belatedly realized in his 2016 campaign the growing heft of Iowa's Latino voters -- and their attraction to him."

-- FRONT PAGE of the Charlotte Observer: "Latinos may shape 2020 NC races -- if they vote" ... The story

BIG NEWS ... "Des Moines Register poll scrapped after apparent mishap," by Steven Shepard and Elena Schneider in Des Moines: "The widely anticipated Des Moines Register/CNN/Mediacom poll of likely Iowa Democratic caucus-goers was scrapped shortly before it was set to be released Saturday night after complaints from Pete Buttigieg's campaign about how it was conducted.

"The stunning announcement by the media sponsors and West Des Moines-based pollster Selzer & Co. means the results of the historically accurate survey won't be released before Monday caucuses. The decision left the campaign and political media universe, which has descended on Des Moines, dumbfounded.

"Buttigieg's campaign raised serious concerns about the poll with CNN and the Register, a source familiar with the situation said. Lis Smith, a senior adviser to Buttigieg's campaign, confirmed on Twitter that the former South Bend (Ind.) mayor's campaign had been in touch with the media outlets about the issues and hailed their decision to withhold the results.

"Our campaign received a report from a recipient of the Iowa Poll call, raising concerns that not every candidate was named by the interviewer when asked who they support,' Smith tweeted. 'We shared this with the organizations behind the poll, who conducted an internal investigation and determined not to release it. We applaud CNN and the Des Moines Register for their integrity.'"

CAUCUS FRONTS ... Sioux City Journal: "Hoops or Caucus" bug ... "Game changer: Caucus prompts schools to rethink plans" ... The Courier (Ankeny, Iowa): "Caucus crunch time" ... Star Tribune: "WE BETTER NOT SCREW THIS UP: Senator's closing spring comes with warning for party" ... The Gazette (Cedar Rapids): "Picking a favorite still elusive for some Democrats" ...

... Quad-City Times: Photos of Elizabeth Warren and Amy Klobuchar ... "Dems make final pitch" ... Des Moines Register: "10 QUESTIONS THE IOWA CAUCUSES WILL ANSWER AS THE CYCLE ENDS"

-- THE REGISTER'S 10 QUESTIONS: "Who will win? ... What will 'winning' look like? ... Where will candidates win? ... How many 'tickets' will there be out of Iowa? ... Is the ground game still king? ... Is 'Klomentum' real? ... What does 'electability' look like? ... Will the satellite caucuses be successful? ... Will the new rules streamline caucus night or create new hiccups? ... Will Iowa keep its caucuses and stay first?"

ONTO MANCHESTER ... CHRIS WALLACE spoke to SEN. AMY KLOBUCHAR (D-Minn.) on "FOX NEWS SUNDAY": "I think we have to do well here, there's been a lot going having been gone the last few weeks that I didn't expect to have happen. But I'm going to New Hampshire no matter what. There's a debate, I'm on the debate stage. I've got the endorsements of every major paper in New Hampshire, including The Union Leader. ... So of course I'm going there, we have a strong operation there -- and then going beyond."

TRUTH TALK from PETE BUTTIGIEG to CHUCK TODD: TODD: "Do you reconsider your candidacy if you don't finish in the top three?" BUTTIGIEG: "I'll let others set the goalposts. But, look, let's face it. I need to have a good finish here in Iowa. We know it, and we're working very hard to do that."

GEORGE STEPHANOPOULOS to ANDREW YANG on ABC'S "THIS WEEK": STEPHANOPOULOS: "But, you know, the Iowa caucuses, as you know, have a pretty unique way of voting. You're actually going to see four different results coming out of tomorrow night. The first round, the second round after realignment, and any candidate who doesn't get 15 percent in a certain precinct, your supporters have a chance then to go and back someone else on the second ballot. Where do you expect most of your supporters to go in those precincts where you don't get 15 percent? And are you going to encourage them towards a particular candidate?"

YANG: "Well, first, we plan to exceed 15 percent in a vast majority of locations. And as to what our supporters might do if we don't reach that threshold in a particular place, we have a very, very diverse group of supporters. I can't speak for where they would head. I do have a sense that many of them have supported Bernie in the past, but many of them supported President Trump, and they might just leave. So, there are a whole range of possibilities and I can't speak to the minds of literally thousands of Iowans."

... AND BEYOND: FRONT PAGE OF THE DALLAS MORNING NEWS: "Biden widens his lead in Texas," by Robert T. Garrett: "Former vice president Joe Biden has stretched his lead in Texas in the Democratic presidential fight, buoyed by gains among Hispanics, a new Dallas Morning News-University of Texas at Tyler poll has found.

"Vermont Sen. Bernie Sanders has the most enthusiastic backing of any of the major Democratic presidential contenders, according to the poll. However, among Texas Democrats and independents who lean Democratic, Sanders is running further behind Biden than he did in two statewide polls by UT-Tyler last fall.

"Biden now leads Sanders, 35% to 18%. In the East Texas university's September and November polls, the front-running Biden bested Sanders by only 9 percentage points." DMN ... Front Page

TICK TOCK ... WAPO'S SEUNG MIN KIM and RACHAEL BADE: "Inside the Senate trial: McConnell stops rebel push in GOP for witnesses"

NYT Q-HED ... PETER BAKER on A1: "While Stained in History, Trump Will Emerge From Trial Triumphant and Unshackled": "With the end of the impeachment trial now in sight and acquittal assured, a triumphant Mr. Trump emerges from the biggest test of his presidency emboldened, ready to claim exoneration and take his case of grievance, persecution and resentment to the campaign trail.

"The president's Democratic adversaries rolled out the biggest constitutional weapon they had and failed to defeat him, or even to force a full trial with witnesses testifying to the allegations against him. Now Mr. Trump, who has said that the Constitution 'allows me to do whatever I want' and pushed so many boundaries that curtailed past presidents, has little reason to fear the legislative branch nor any inclination to reach out in conciliation." NYT

ERNST: TRUMP WILL CHANGE NOW ... On "STATE OF THE UNION" with CNN'S JAKE TAPPER: TAPPER: Assuming President Trump is acquitted on Wednesday, and assuming you're going to go to acquit him..." ERNST: "Right." TAPPER: "Yes. Are you confident that he won't do this again, that he won't try to get another foreign country to look into a political opponent, whether it's Elizabeth Warren or Pete Buttigieg or someone else?"

ERNST: "I think that he knows now that, if he is trying to do certain things, whether it's ferreting out corruption there, in Afghanistan, whatever it is, he needs to go through the proper channels." TAPPER: "Mm-hmm." ERNST: "So, again, using the DOJ and other international organizations to get to that corruption."

MAUREEN DOWD: "I feel like I have spent my career watching the same depressing dynamic that unspooled Friday night: Democrats trying, sometimes ineptly, to play fair and Republicans ruthlessly trying to win.

"I watched it with the Anita Hill-Clarence Thomas hearings. I watched it in the 2000 recount with Bush versus Gore. I watched it with the push by W., Dick Cheney and Donald Rumsfeld to go to war in Iraq. I watched it with the pantomime of Merrick Garland.

"Democrats are warning Republicans that they will be judged harshly by history. But in the meantime, the triumphant Republicans get to make history. And a lot of the history that Republicans have made is frightening: the endless, futile wars, the obliviousness to climate change, the stamp on the judiciary."

CHUCK TODD got SEN. LAMAR ALEXANDER (R-Tenn.) on NBC'S "MEET THE PRESS": TODD: "You're comfortable acquitting him before he says something of regret? Would that not, would that not help make your acquittal vote more comfortable?"

ALEXANDER: " I wasn't asked to decide -- assess his level of regret. I was asked, 'Did he, did he make a phone call? And did he, at least in part, hold up aid in order to influence an investigation of Joe Biden?' I concluded yes. So I don't need to assess his level of regret. What I hope he would do is when he makes his State of the Union address, that he puts this completely behind him, never mentions it, and talks about what he thinks he's done for the country and where we're headed. He's got a pretty good story to tell if he'll focus on it."

LAURA BARRON-LOPEZ in Columbia, S.C.: "Black voters love Ayanna Pressley. But convincing them to back Elizabeth Warren isn't easy." "Just 6 percent of African Americans in the state support her, according to a January Fox News poll. Warren's policy-heavy candidacy has yet to resonate with black Americans who are broadly wary of government and the racial biases that exist within it. ...

"Pressley has taken the image of Warren as a wonkish Harvard Law professor and tried to turn it on its head. Often surrogates put their candidate on a pedestal: Joe Biden as the only candidate equipped to be president 'on Day One,' or Sanders as the leader of a political revolution."

L.A. TIMES: "2 California bases picked as possible coronavirus quarantine sites," by Alex Wigglesworth: "The Defense Department said Saturday it has agreed to house up to 1,000 people who may need to be quarantined upon arrival from overseas travel because of the coronavirus and that two of the four facilities selected are in California.

"Travis Air Force Base in Solano County and Marine Corps Air Station Miramar in San Diego County are the two California sites that were selected, Lt. Col. Chris Mitchell, a Pentagon spokesman, said in a statement. The others are Lackland Air Force Base in Texas and the 168th Regiment Regional Training Institute in Colorado.

Bloomberg: Silver Spikes Past $30 as Retail Investors Swarm Biggest Target

By Jake Lloyd-Smith and Eddie Spence

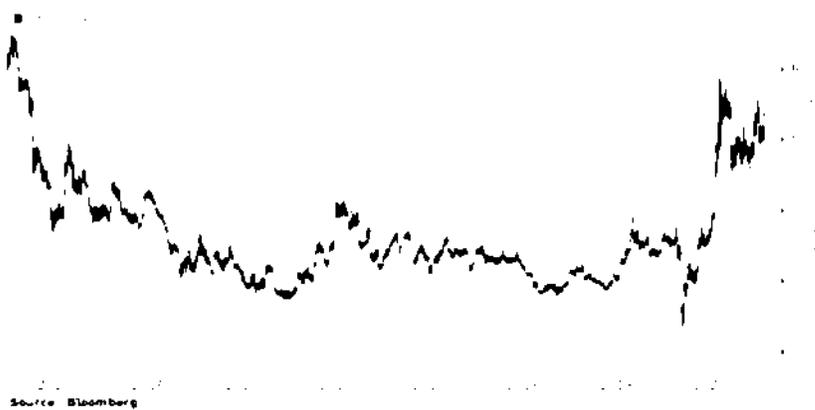

- Rally follows jump in demand over weekend for bars and coins
- The momentum rests with smaller investors right now, OCBC says

Silver broke above $30 an ounce as the precious metal took center stage in the retail investor frenzy sweeping through markets.

Most-active futures jumped as much as 13% to $30.35 an ounce on the Comex, the highest in eight years. That followed a weekend buying binge that overwhelmed online sellers of silver coins and bars from the U.S. to Australia. BlackRock Inc.'s iShares Silver Trust, the largest exchange-traded product tracking the metal, recorded an unprecedented $944 million net inflow on Friday.

Silver Spike

Retail investors push silver to highest since 2013

Like the buying stampede in GameStop Corp. and other small-cap stocks that has captivated the financial world in recent weeks, silver's advance can be traced to Reddit's WallStreetBets forum. One post last week declared the metal "THE BIGGEST SHORT IN THE WORLD" and encouraged traders to pile into the iShares trust as a way to stick it to big banks.

Yet silver differs in important ways from stocks like GameStop. For one, the scope for a short squeeze in silver is far less obvious: money managers have had a net-long position on the metal since mid-2019, futures and options data from the Commodity Futures Trading Commission show.

The market for silver is also by some measures much deeper than those for smaller stocks like GameStop. The bricks-and-mortar video game retailer had a market capitalization of about $1.4 billion in mid-January, before the Reddit frenzy sent the company's value soaring more than 16-fold. By contrast, London vaults held 1.08 billion ounces of silver at the end of November, according to LBMA data. That's worth almost $32 billion at current prices.

What's more, it's unclear how long retail investors will stick to the silver trade. Already some prominent members of the WallStreetBets forum have advised against it, with some noting that Ken Griffin's Citadel Advisors LLC, a favorite bogeyman of the Reddit crowd, is listed as one of the biggest shareholders of the iShares silver trust.

Whether or not the rally fizzles, it could have ramifications beyond what has typically been a relatively niche corner of the commodities world. As the first high-profile target of the retail frenzy to start trading on Monday, silver may help set the tone this week for managers trying to gauge how Reddit-fueled volatility will impact their risk models and potentially cascade from one asset to the next.

Momentum Trade

"Last week's events have shown it to be unwise to doubt the purchasing power of retail investors, and this has been sufficiently demonstrated again on the silver market," said Howie Lee, an economist at Oversea-Chinese Banking Corp. "They may find it a bit harder to squeeze the silver market than they did with GameStop -- the former is much bigger and more liquid -- but the momentum looks like it rests with them at the moment."

Early trading pointed to more gains for SLV on Monday. The ETF was up about 9% in the pre-market session, on huge volumes. As of 7:03 a.m. in New York 5.4 million shares had changed hands, about eight times the second most-traded fund.

Futures were trading 11% higher on the Comex, after rising more than 5% last week. Spot silver climbed to as high as $30.1003 an ounce. Other precious metals also advanced. Spot gold rose 0.9%, while platinum jumped 4.1%.

The buying frenzy also fed into mining shares. Mexican silver miner Fresnillo Plc surged as much as 21% in London trading. China Silver Group Ltd. rose as much as 63% in Hong Kong, while Australia's Silver Mines Ltd. gained as much as 49%.

The calls to buy silver began appearing on WallStreetBets as early as Wednesday, when the mania surrounding GameStop reached a fever pitch. Some of the posts touched on a similar David-vs-Goliath theme that has inspired individual investors to take on short-selling hedge funds: "Any short squeeze in silver paper shorts would be EPIC. We know billion (sic) banks are manipulating gold and silver to cover real inflation."

But that narrative isn't as straightforward as the one surrounding GameStop, one of the most-shorted stocks in the U.S. before it began surging this month.

Silver has performed well over the past year, rallying more than 60% on a weaker dollar and hopes for an end to the pandemic. It has also attracted bullish commentary from some of the biggest Wall Street banks. Goldman Sachs Group Inc. described silver as the "preferred precious metal" in a Jan. 27 research note that had a price target of $30 an ounce. Net-bullish bets by money managers rose to a three-week high in the week to Jan. 26, according to CFTC data compiled by Bloomberg.

Short-term forward rates on the London silver market flattened on Monday, indicating strong demand for the metal in coming weeks.

"I can envisage a scenario where maybe a hedge fund has purchased maybe a short-term tactical long position, so the upside could be a combination of several factors now," said Philip Newman, managing director at consultancy Metals Focus.

Locking Up

Still, that hasn't stopped some retail investors from piling in. By Sunday, sellers of physical silver including Apmex -- often called the Walmart of precious metals products in North America -- said they were unable to process orders until Asian markets opened because of record demand. "It's been nuts," said John Feeney, business development manager at Guardian Vaults in Sydney.

Ken Lewis, Apmex's chief executive officer, said the decision to temporarily suspend silver sales was unprecedented in the company's history and that it may take longer than usual to fill orders going forward.

"As we evaluate the markets, it is difficult to know where silver's price and demand will go in the coming day and weeks," Lewis said, adding that his firm is "locking up any metal we can find in the marketplace."

Reuters: Sterling Strengthens on Vaccine Optimism, Approaches 3-Year High

By Elizabeth Howcroft

The British pound rose back towards its recent three-year high on Monday, boosted by a combination of heightened global risk appetite and optimism about the UK's vaccine rollout.

Riskier currencies gained against the dollar, which edged lower as global market sentiment was lifted by an equity rally in the Asian session.

The pound strengthened even more than other "risk" currencies such as the Australian dollar and Norwegian crown.

After a row between Britain and the European Union over vaccine supplies, EU officials said on Saturday that it had been a mistake to invoke Northern Ireland Brexit emergency powers.

The UK said it expected its supply of COVID-19 shots would not be interrupted. Official data on Sunday showed that nearly 9 million people in the UK have been given their first dose of a vaccine.

In early London trading, the pound rose to $1.3758 - just shy of the three-year high of $1.3759 it reached on Wednesday last week. At 0902 GMT, it was at $1.3715, up 0.2% on the day .

Versus the euro it was up around 0.5% at 88.14 pence per euro, having hit its strongest since May 2020 earlier in the session.

Market participants are focusing on the Bank of England's meeting on Thursday this week, at which the bank is set to publish the findings of a consultation on what negative rates would mean for banks' operations.

Lee Hardman, currency analyst at MUFG, said in a note to clients that the argument in favour of another imminent easing of monetary policy has been dampened by the last-minute Brexit trade deal, the resilience of the UK economy at the end of last year, and the relatively fast rollout of vaccines in the UK.

"However, the tougher third lockdown is expected to deliver a larger negative hit to growth at the start of this year," he added.

Most economists polled by Reuters think the BoE is unlikely to cut rates below zero this year.

"The most bullish potential outcome for the pound would be if the BoE leaves the key policy rate unchanged, and the consultation with lenders further dampens speculation over negative rates in the near term," MUFG's Hardman said.

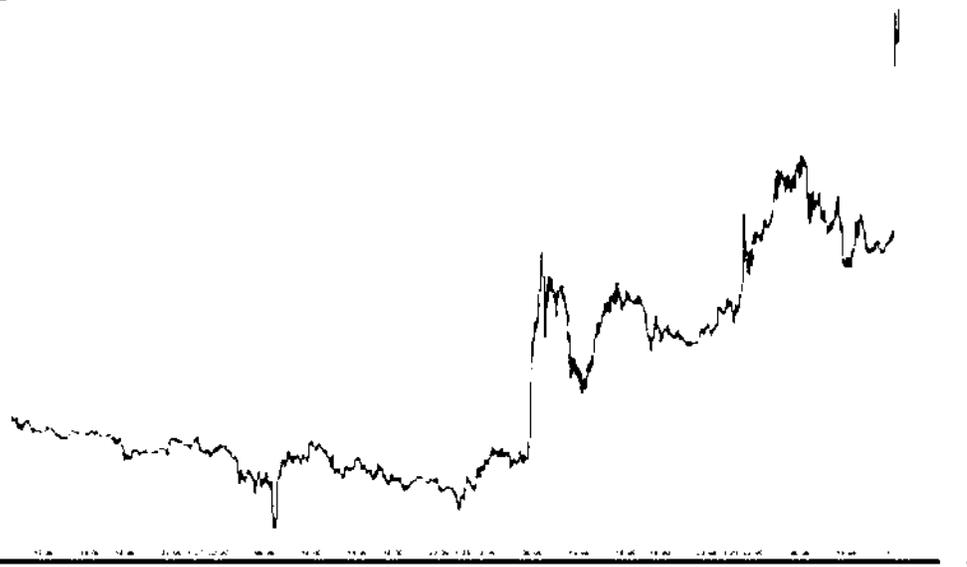

"It could open the door to further GBP gains, lifting cable closer to 1.4000 and EUR/GBP towards the mid-0.8000's."

Weekly CFTC futures data showed that the net long position on the pound shrank in the week to Jan 26, although speculators were still overall bullish on the currency.

Zero Hedge: Silver Futures Soar 8%, Rise Above $29 As Reddit Hordes Pile In

By Tyler Durden

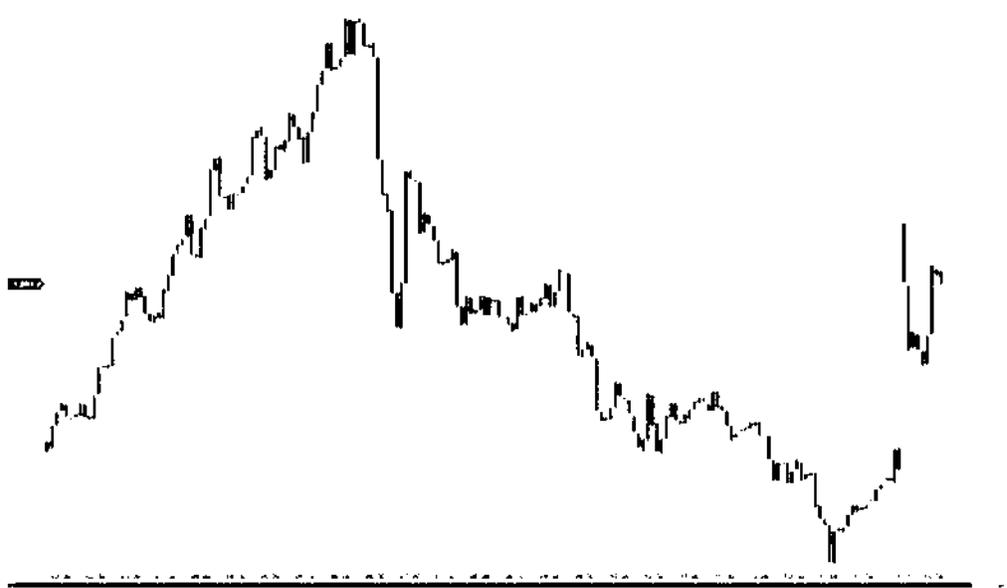

Update (1800ET): It was the one print everyone was waiting for, and here it is: silver futures opened up 7%, surging from $27/oz to a high of $29.095 following a weekend of speculation that the next big squeeze on WSB's radar is silver. And whether that's true or not, may no longer matter in a world where - as described below - there is virtually no physical silver to be purchased.

Spot Silver is back to its highest since the August/Sept cycle highs...

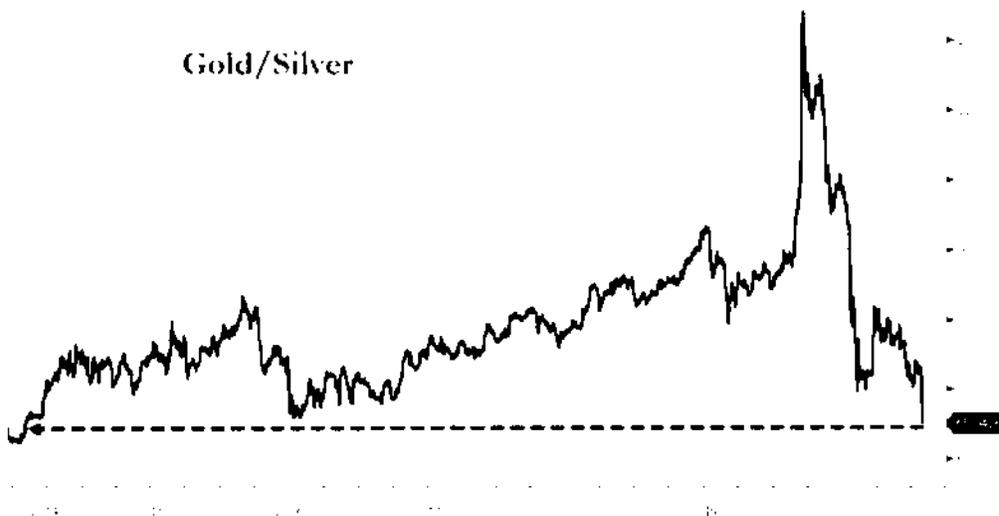

Gold futs managed very modest gains...

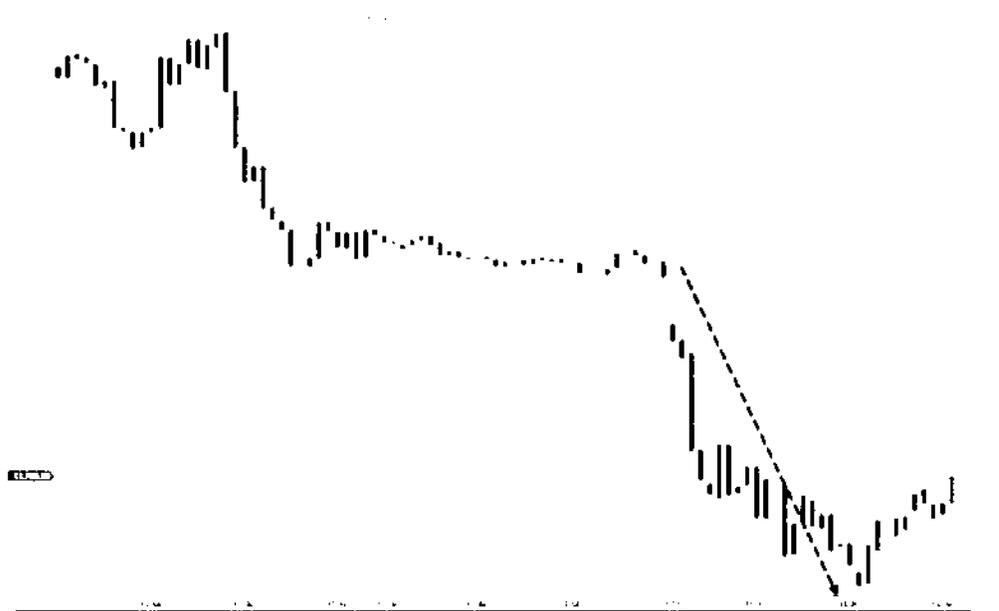

And silver's dramatic outperformance has pushed the gold/silver ratio to its lowest since 2014...

Gold/Silver

Silver miners are also getting the love: Australian silver stocks including Argent Minerals and Boab Metals rise more than 20%.

US Equity futures are taking a hit (all down around 1%)...

So as silver approaches $30, keep an eye on major price slams, emerging either out of central banks who desperately need to keep precious metals lower, or the BIS itself, whose Benoit Gilson will have a busy day tomorrow.

Update (1100ET): For some background on just how unprecedented this weekend's action in silver markets is, Tyler Wall, the CEO of SD Bullion writes the following (emphasis ours):

In the 24 hours preceding Friday market close, SD Bullion sold nearly 10x the number of silver ounces that we normally would sell in an entire weekend leading to Sunday market open.

In a normal market, we normally can find at least one supplier/source willing to sell some ounces over the weekend if we exceed our long position (the number of ounces we predict we will sell over the weekend).

However, everyone we talk to is afraid of a gap up at Sunday night market open.

This is about ready to get really interesting as there was very little inventory left from suppliers/mints going into Friday close.

Our direct AP supplier informed us after close on Friday that the "US Mint will be on allocation for the remainder of Type 1" (Current Silver Eagle Design).

Our sales for the month of January exceeded any one month last year during the heart of the pandemic. It was an all-time record month in our company history.

And, perhaps most importantly, as QTR tweets so succinctly, "this is a red pill moment for many, and it's beautiful."

Additionally, there are also signs of a notable regime shift, as Bloomberg points out, investors are holding onto silver they own, rather than trying to take profits.

"Now we're seeing nothing, no single offer, which is scary," Peter Thomas, senior vice president at Zaner Group, said by phone from Chicago.

"Whatever we sell, people are holding it. There's no inflow of metal at all."

Update (1030ET): It would appear the run on silver has begun. With the market closed, traders have rushed to secure some exposure to silver ahead of what WSB suggests could be "the world's biggest short squeeze" and that has left bullion dealers

As we noted below, the premium for physical silver had soared late Friday and into Saturday (after the massive flows into SLV), but as Sunday rolled around, bullion dealers are now facing massive shortages of physical coins.

Due to unprecedented demand on physical silver products, we are unable to accept any additional orders until markets open Sunday evening.

While all eyes have been focused on GameStop and a handful of other heavily-shortaged stocks as they exploded higher under continuous fire from WallStreetBets traders igniting a short-squeeze coinciding with a gamma-squeeze, the last few days saw another asset suddenly get in the crosshairs of the 'Reddit-Raiders' - Silver.

On Thursday, we asked "Is The Reddit Rebellion About To Descend On The Precious Metals Market?" ... One WallStreetBets user \(jjalj30\) posted the following last night:

Silver Bullion Market is one of the most manipulated on earth. Any short squeeze in silver paper shorts would be EPIC. We know billion banks are manipulating gold and silver to cover real inflation.

Both the industrial case and monetary case, debt printing has never been more favorable for the No. 1 inflation hedge Silver.

Inflation adjusted Silver should be at 1000$ instead of 25$. Link to post removed by mods.

Why not squeeze $SLV to real physical price.

Think about the Gainz. If you don't care about the gains, think about the banks like JP MORGAN you'd be destroying along the way.

Tldr- Corner the market. GV thinks its possible to squeeze $SLV, FUCK AFTER SEEING $AG AND $GME EVEN I THINK WE CAN DO IT. BUY $SLV GO ALL IN TH GAINZ WILL BE UNLIMITED. DEMAND PHYSICAL IF YOU CAN. FUCK THE BANKS.

Disclaimer: This is not Financial advice. I am not a financial services professional. This is my personal opinion and speculation as an uneducated and uninformed person.

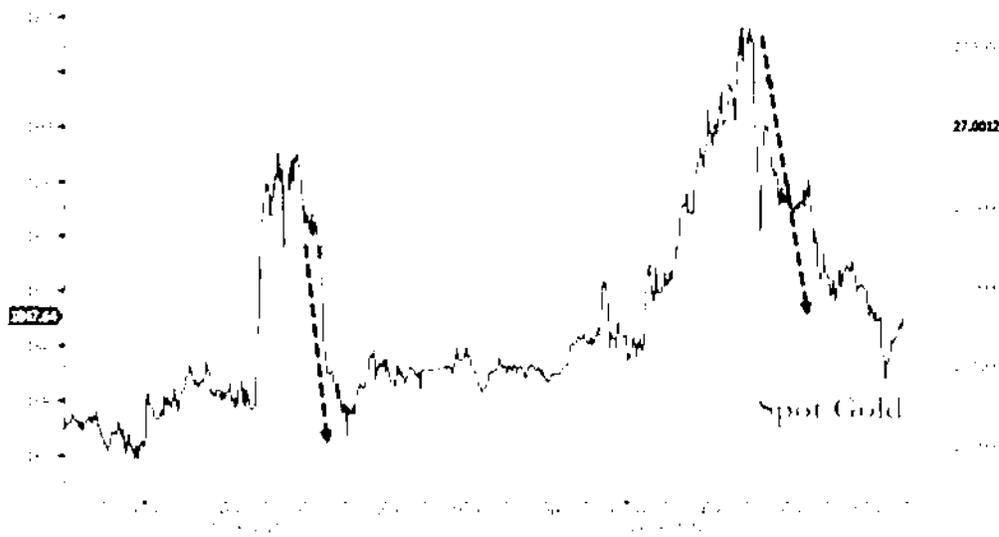

...and judging by the unprecedented flows into the Silver ETF (SLV) they just got started...

SLV saw inflows of almost one billion dollars on Friday, almost double the previous record inflow for this 15 year-old ETF.

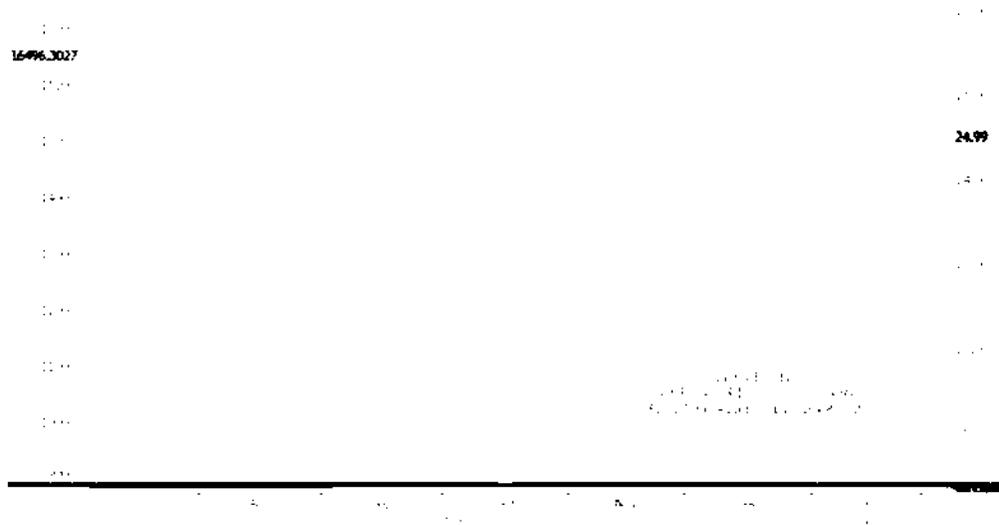

Source: Bloomberg

Which helped prompt a spike in SLV off Wednesday's lows of over 11% (and note that every surge in price was mimicked by gold, but gold was instantly monkey-hammered lower after the spike).

And judging by the asset flow, SLV has room to run here...

Source: Bloomberg

Just as short-interest in the ETF has been building...

SLV Short Interest

Source: Bloomberg

This surge came after Reddit user 'TheHappyHawaiian' posted the following thesis on buying silver noting that "the worlds biggest short squeeze is possible and we can make history."

'TheHappyHawaiian' cites two reasons to buy - The Short Squeeze and Fundamentals.

The short squeeze:

Buy SLV shares (or PSLV shares) and SLV call options to force physical delivery of silver to the SLV vaults.

The silver futures market has oscillated between having roughly 100-1 and 500-1 ratio of paper traded silver to physical silver, but lets call it 250-1 for now. This means that for every 250 ounces in open interest in the futures market, only 1 actually gets delivered. Most traders would rather settle with cash rather than take delivery of thousands of ounces of silver and have to figure out to store and transport it in the future.

The people naked shorting silver via the futures markets are a couple of large banks and making them pay dearly for their over leveraged naked shorts would be incredible. It's not Melvin capital on the other side of this trade, its JP Morgan. Time to get some payback for the bailouts and manipulation they've done for decades (look up silver manipulation fines that JPM has paid over the years).

The way the squeeze could occur is by forcing a much higher percentage of the futures contracts to actually deliver physical silver. There is very little silver in the COMEX vaults or available to actually be use to deliver, and if they have to start buying en masse on the open market they will drive the price massively higher. There is no way to magically create more physical silver in the world that is ready to be delivered. With a stock you can eventually just issue more shares if the price rises too much, but this simply isn't the case here. The futures market is kind of the wild west of the financial world. Real commodities are being traded, and if you are short, you literally have to deliver thousands of ounces of silver per contract if the holder on the other side demands it. If you remember oil going negative back in May, that was possible because futures are allowed to trade to their true value. They aren't halted and that's what will make this so fun when the true squeeze happens.

Edit for more detail: let's say there's one futures seller who gets unlucky and gets the buyer who actually wants to take delivery. He doesn't have the silver and realizes it's all of a sudden damn difficult to find some physical silver. He throws up his hands and just goes long a matching number of futures contracts and will demand actual delivery on those. Problem solved because he has now matched the demanding buyer with a new seller. The issue is that the new seller has the same issue and does the exact same thing. This is how the cascade effect of a meltup occurs. All the naked shorts trying to offload their position to someone who actually has some silver. My goal is to ensure that I have the silver and won't sell to them until silver is at a far higher price due to the desperation.

The silver market is much larger than GME in terms of notional value, but there is very little physical silver actually readily available (think about the difference between total shares and the shares in the active float for a stock), and the paper silver trading hands in the futures market is hundreds of times larger than what is available. Thus when they are forced to actually deliver physical silver it will create a massive short squeeze where an absurd amount of silver will be sought after (to fulfill their contractually obligated delivery) with very little available to actually buy. They are naked shorting silver and will have to cover all at once and the float as a percentage of the total silver stock globally is truly miniscule.

The fundamentals:

The current gold to silver ratio is 73-1. Meaning the price of gold per ounce is 73 times the price of silver. Naturally occurring silver is only 18.75 times as common as gold, so this ratio of 73-1 is quite high. Until the early 20th century, silver prices were pegged at a 15-1 ratio to gold in the US because this ratio was relatively known even then. In terms of current production, the ratio is even lower at 8-1. Meaning the world is only producing 8 ounces of silver for each newly produced ounce of gold.

Global industry has been able to get away with producing so little new silver for so long because governments have dumped silver on the market for 80 years, but now their silver vaults are empty. At the end of WW2 government vaults globally contained 10 billion ounces of silver, but as we moved to fiat currency and away from precious metal backed currencies, the amount held by governments has decreased to only 0.24 billion ounces as they dumped their supply into the market. But this dumping is done now as their remaining supply is basically nil.

This 0.24 billion ounces represents only 8% of the total supply of only 3 billion ounces stored as investment globally. This means that 92% of that gold is held privately by institutions and by millions of boomer gold and silver bugs who have been sitting on meager gains for decades. These boomers aren't going to sell no matter what because they see their silver cache as part of their doomsday prepper supplies. It's locked away in bunkers they built 500 miles from their house. Also, with silver at $23 an ounce currently, this means all of the worlds investment grade silver only has a total need actual physical delivery, which is what SLV demands and is why SLV is the way to go unless you are going to take delivery

- miners; I don't recommend buying miners as part of this trade. Miners will absolutely go up if SLV goes up, but buying them doesn't create the squeeze in the actual silver market. Furthermore, most silver miners only derive 30-50% of their revenue from silver anyways, so eventually SLV will outperform them as it gets high enough (and each marginal SLV dollar only increases miner profits by a smaller and smaller percentage)

Details on SLV physical settlement:

When SLV issues shares, the custodian is forced to true up their vaults with the proportional amount of silver daily. From the SLV prospectus:

"An investment in Shares is: Backed by silver held by the Custodian on behalf of the Trust. The Shares are backed by the assets of the Trust. The Trustee's arrangements with the Custodian contemplate that at the end of each business day there can be in the Trust account maintained by the Custodian no more than 1,100 ounces of silver in an unallocated form. The bulk of the Trust's silver holdings is represented by physical silver, identified on the Custodian's or, if applicable, sub-custodian's, books in allocated and unallocated accounts on behalf of the Trust and is held by the Custodian in London, New York and other locations that may be authorized in the future."

'TheHappyHawaiian' ends with a call to (financial) arms:

Join me brothers. Lets take silver to the moon and take on the biggest and baddest manipulators in the world.

Please post rocket emojis in the comments as desired.

Disclaimer: do your own research, make your own decisions, everything here is a guess and hypothetical and nothing is guaranteed, not a financial advisor, I have ADHD and maybe other things too.

Bear case: silver does tend to sell off if the broader market plunges so it's not immune to broad market sell off. It's also the most manipulated market in the world so we are facing some tough competition on the short side

Interestingly, 'TheHappyHawaiian' dropped this update on 1/29:

Due to the manipulation and collusion of citadel, hedge funds, and brokers to change the rules and rig the game in their favor. Who likely knew ahead of time and bought puts right before and calls at the bottom, GME is too important to abandon still. SLV is still my next play but GME needs to go to $1000 and these people need to go to jail.

However, judging by the massive physical premiums for silver we are seeing this weekend at APMEX...

Reuters: Oil Gains Despite Patchy Vaccine Rollouts, New Coronavirus Variants

By Aaron Sheldrick

Oil prices rose on Monday after a weak start, adding to the gains of the last three months, although patchy coronavirus vaccine rollouts, new infections and the discovery of new variants are casting a shadow over the demand outlook.

Brent crude futures were up 53 cents, or 1%, at $55.57 a barrel by 0756 GMT, while U.S. West Texas Intermediate (WTI) gained 41 cents, or 0.8%, to $52.61. Both benchmarks gained nearly 8% in January.

Oil prices have been boosted by vaccination programmes getting underway in hard-hit countries and output cuts by major producers like Saudi Arabia. But euphoria over a possible end to the pandemic has been undermined by the slow pace of vaccinations and the rise of new variants of the coronavirus.

Still, with more vaccines proving successful in trials and infections falling in some areas, demand for oil and fuel is likely to pick up as more of the world's population gets inoculated against COVID-19.

"Our base-case remains for a demand-led rebalancing of the oil market, with the logistical challenges of vaccination likely transient and evidence of still elevated vaccine efficacy," Goldman Sachs said in a new report, while noting that the rally of recent weeks had paused.

Oil prices are expected to remain around current levels for most of this year before a recovery gains ground towards the end of 2021, a Reuters poll showed late on Friday.

U.S. oil and gas drillers are gearing up for a pick-up in demand and as higher prices make new wells profitable again, adding rigs for a sixth month in a row in January. [RIG/U]

U.S. output is rising and was above 11 million barrels per day in November for the first time since April, according to the Energy Information Administration.

Speculators reduced their net long positions in U.S. crude futures and options for the week to Jan. 26, the U.S. Commodity Futures Trading Commission (CFTC) said.

Reuters: Dollar Advances as Investors Shy Away from Risk

By Saqib Iqbal Ahmed

The dollar edged higher against a basket of currencies on Monday, as a burst of volatility in stock markets around the globe sapped investors' appetite for riskier currencies.

Concerns over the timing and size of additional U.S. fiscal stimulus sent major U.S. stock indexes briefly more than 1% lower before they recovered to trade little changed on the day.

The sharp move in stock markets soured FX traders' appetite for risk, Karl Schamotta, chief market strategist at Cambridge Global Payments in Toronto, said.

"Your high beta currencies - currencies that are highly correlated with equity markets and global risk appetites - are tumbling in synchrony with equity indexes," Schamotta said.

Market sentiment turned more cautious at the end of last week as European economic data showed that lockdown restrictions to limit the spread of the coronavirus hurt business activity.

The U.S. Dollar Currency Index was 0.19% higher at 90.396, after rising as high as 90.523, its strongest since Jan. 20.

The euro was down around 0.28% against the dollar. German business morale slumped to a six-month low in January as a second wave of COVID-19 halted a recovery in Europe's largest economy, which will stagnate in the first quarter, the Ifo economic institute said on Monday.

The Australian dollar - seen as a liquid proxy for risk - was 0.16% lower against the dollar.

U.S. stocks have scaled new highs in recent sessions even as concerns about the pandemic-hit economy remain. Investors are trying to gauge whether officials in U.S. President Joe Biden's administration could head off Republican concerns that his $1.9 trillion pandemic relief proposal was too expensive.

Despite the dollar's recent rebound - the dollar index is up about 1.3% since early January - analysts expect a broad dollar decline during 2021. The net speculative short position on the dollar grew to its largest in 10 years in the week to Jan. 19, according to weekly futures data from CFTC released on Friday.

The U.S. Federal Reserve meets on Wednesday and Chair Jerome Powell is expected to signal that he has no plans to wind back the Fed's massive stimulus any time soon - news which could push the dollar down further.

Sterling strengthened on Monday against the weaker euro as Britain's COVID-19 vaccine rollout over the weekend offered support to the British currency.

Reuters: Speculators Cut Bullish Bets on ICE Sugar, Coffee, Other Soft Commodities

By Jessica Resnick-Ault

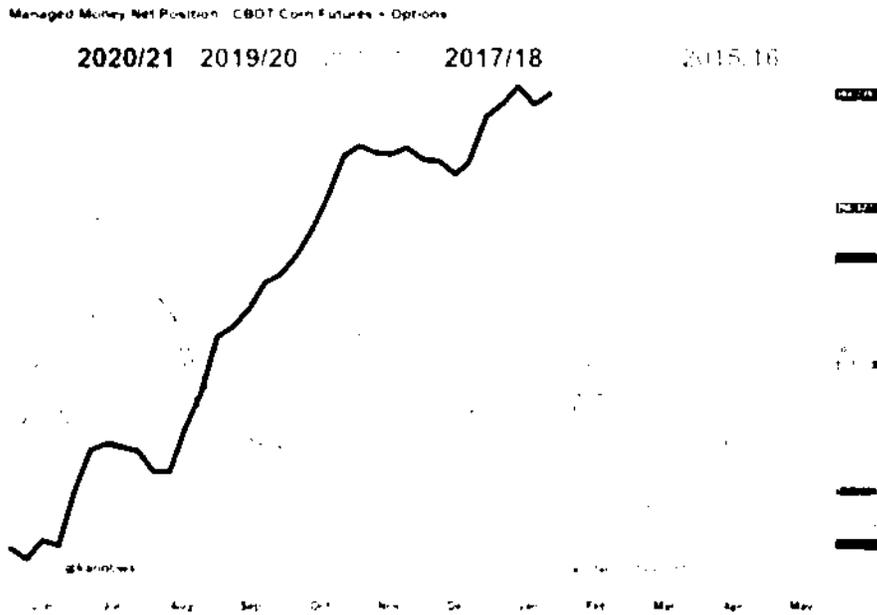

Speculators across the soft commodities markets cut bullish net long positions on the Intercontinental Exchange (ICE) in the latest week, according to a weekly report from the Commodities Futures Trading Commission.

Speculators trimmed their net long positions on cocoa, cotton, sugar and coffee futures, according to the report.

Reuters: Column: Funds' Bullish Corn Bets Backed by Colossal U.S. Sales to China

By Karen Braun

Speculators' bullishness in Chicago corn paused a couple weeks ago with futures trading at more than seven-year highs, but an incredible run of U.S. corn sales to China last week may have refreshed investor optimism.

The week ended Jan. 26 was very volatile for CBOT corn futures and included a historic plunge in prices followed by a strong rebound, and the most-active contract finished the period up 1.2%.

Through Jan. 26, money managers increased their net long in CBOT corn futures and options to 364,229 contracts from 349,495 a week earlier, according to data from the U.S. Commodity Futures Trading Commission.

The addition of new longs was the bigger driver, but the move marked the sixth consecutive week that money managers covered short corn positions. The number of outright shorts dwindled to 33,220 contracts as of Jan. 26, the fewest since November 2012.

Other reportable traders executed their largest corn selling week in nearly three years, reducing their net long by about 25,000 contracts to 168,757 from the previous week's all-time record long. Index traders also reduced corn positions through Jan. 26.

The U.S. Department of Agriculture on Friday confirmed that China booked 2.1 million tonnes of U.S. corn, the largest-ever single sale to the Asian country. That brought China's four-day buying total to 5.85 million tonnes, more corn than the United States has ever shipped to China in an entire marketing year.

CBOT corn futures on Friday hit $5.53-3/4 per bushel, the most-active contract's highest since June 2013. The contract rose 2.8% over the last three sessions, and commodity funds were pegged to have bought 40,000 corn futures during that period.

If that figure is true, money managers ended last week's trading with a corn net long above 400,000 contracts for the first time in a decade.

SOYBEANS AND PRODUCTS

Most-active soybean futures are still at eight-year highs for the time of year, though they have recently traded well off the highs notched in mid-January. Speculators are also notably less bullish toward the oilseed than they were four months ago.

Soybean futures also went on a rollercoaster ride in the week ended Jan. 26, finishing the period down 1.1%. But money managers slightly extended their net long in CBOT soybean futures and options to 156,590 contracts from 151,898 a week earlier.

Managed Money Net Position - CBOT Soybean Futures + Options

Prices were largely unchanged over the last three sessions and funds are not expected to have adjusted their views, though soybean traders last week were watching harvest delays in Brazil and some new-crop U.S. soybean sales to China.

Money managers trimmed their net long in soybean meal futures and options for the fourth consecutive week through Jan. 26, reducing it by just over 3,000 contracts to 74,590. Futures fell 1.3% between Wednesday and Friday, and funds are expected to have shed some more meal length.

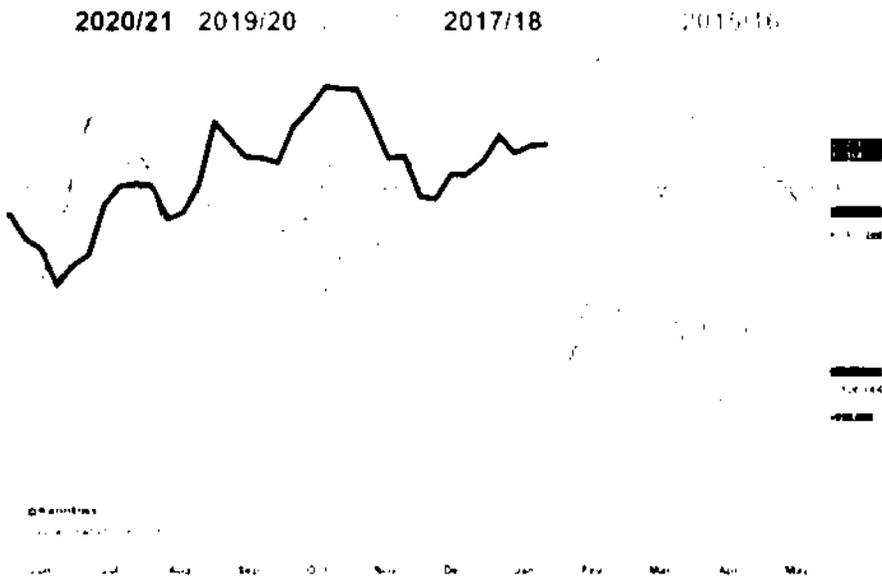

Soybean oil futures surged more than 5% through Jan. 26, and money managers boosted their net long to 107,334 futures and options contracts from 90,699 a week earlier. That marks their most bullish ever end to January, slightly above the same points in 2017 and 2020.

Soyoil futures rose another 1.6% over the last three sessions, hitting 45.58 cents per pound on Friday, the most-active contract's highest since July 2013.

WHEAT

Wheat prices have somewhat followed moves in corn recently as higher corn prices could ultimately increase wheat feeding, though market watchers have also been focused on the supply situation in top exporter Russia, which formally approved a higher wheat export tax on Tuesday.

Chicago wheat futures were down 1% in the week ended Jan. 26, but money managers bumped up their net long by less than 1,000 futures and options contracts to 21,275 contracts. Prices fell fractionally in the subsequent three sessions.

Money managers continued to increase bullishness in Kansas City wheat futures and options through Jan. 26, adding more than 2,000 contracts on the week, resulting in a net long of 60,239 contracts. That is funds' most optimistic stance since August 2018 and it is their most bullish ever for the time of year.

Funds continued their buying streak in Minneapolis wheat through Jan. 26, increasing their net long by more than 1,000 futures and options contracts on the week to 14,659 contracts. That is their biggest net long in spring wheat since June 2017.

WSJ: Silver Prices Rise After Online Attention

Sunday night's rally comes after silver prices gained more than 5% last week

By Sebastian Pellejero

Silver prices rallied to start the trading week Sunday, fueled by a wave of fresh enthusiasm from online traders.

Most actively traded silver futures rose as much 8% from Friday's close before paring gains slightly to recently trade up 7% at $28.80 a troy ounce. Sunday night's rally comes after silver prices gained more than 5% last week.

Silver has rallied in recent trading sessions after users on Reddit's WallStreetBets forum posted about executing a "short squeeze" similar to ones credited with fueling recent gains in other stocks popular on the internet. Outside attention from day traders has powered significant gains in stocks such as GameStop Corp. GME 67.87% , captivating Wall Street as individual investors take on hedge funds that are betting on prices to fall.

Attention from day traders is the latest driver for silver prices, which have traded in a range since notching a record performance in 2020, finishing the year up 47%. Silver benefited from a booming rally in precious metals that sent prices on everything from gold to palladium to record highs. Investors tend to buy precious metals such as silver when they are nervous about holding riskier assets such as stocks or corporate bonds.

Even the physical metal, which is used in everything from electronics to jewelry, is starting to see a notable uptick in demand as a result of Redditors' attention. Retail silver marketplaces including Money Metals and APMEX Inc., among others, had notices on their websites Sunday saying they were unable to process new orders until global markets opened because of unprecedented demand for the metal.

FT: Silver Price Hits Eight-Year High as Retail Traders Take Aim

ETF attracts almost $1bn of inflows after call to arms on Reddit discussion board

By Henry Sanderson

Silver prices raced to the highest level since 2013 after retail traders targeted the silver market following their successful attack against short sellers of games retailer GameStop.

Prices for silver rose as much as 11 per cent to $30 per ounce in early trading on Monday in London. That followed a 6 per cent jump last week and a rally in the shares of some miners of the precious metal.

The world's largest silver-backed exchange traded fund, the iShares Silver Trust, recorded almost $1bn in inflows on Friday, according to data from BlackRock, the fund's sponsor. The jolt of investments came after a user in Reddit's r/WallStreetBets forum urged people to buy shares and options to put a squeeze on banks.

"It's a fool's errand, it's financial anarchy; somebody is going to get hurt," said Ross Norman, a veteran precious metals trader.

Last week, the user TheHappyHawaiian said buying shares in the ETF would "force physical delivery of silver" into the fund's vaults, thereby causing a "short squeeze" on the market, pushing up the silver price.

The user wrote on the forum that it would be "incredible" to make large banks active in the futures market "pay dearly" for what he alleged were bets that the silver price will fall. The rallying call echoed that of other r/WallStreetBets users who last week cheered their success in triggering large losses at Melvin Capital and other hedge funds.

The 37.05m increase in the number of shares of the iShares Silver Trust on Friday was the biggest one-day rise since the ETF started trading in April 2006, data from BlackRock showed. The ETF is backed by physical silver held in vaults, meaning it needs to purchase the precious metal when it receives new investments.

Silver ETF attracts record new investments

The attempted "short squeeze" was reminiscent of a similar effort by oil barons William Herbert Hunt and Nelson Bunker Hunt, known as the Hunt brothers, who in 1979-80 bought billions of dollars worth of silver in an attempt to corner the market. They were later sanctioned for market manipulation and went bankrupt after the silver price collapsed in an event dubbed "Silver Thursday."

In 1998, Warren Buffett's Berkshire Hathaway drove silver prices up 90 per cent to a 10-year high after he quietly accumulated a huge position in the silver market.

Analysts said it would be more difficult for retail investors to influence the silver price as opposed to that of a single equity, given the large off-exchange market for the precious metal, where banks trade on behalf of clients.

"We are confident that the influence of retail investors on silver will not last all that long," analysts at Commerzbank said.

Around $6bn worth of silver traded hands in the silver market in November, according to the latest statistics from the London Bullion Market Association. London's vaults hold around 33,475 tonnes of silver, valued at $23.8bn, they said in January.

Mr Norman said the Reddit forum's targeting of large banks was misplaced, since the lenders used futures contracts to hedge their physical holdings of silver, meaning they were not speculating on the price falling.

"There is a misnomer here that banks are constantly running short positions, but from a price perspective they are neutral, they have a long and a short that cancels each other out," he said.

Zero Hedge: REPOST: Silver Abuse in the 1990's

By Vince Lanci

A Walkthrough of Silver Abuse from the 1990's Until Now

Summary

Submitted by Vince Lanci "If you are bullish gold, buy silver" is an axiom I'm fond of repeating. This axiom is a positive one for Silver people, but actually has its roots in cynicism and manipulation years ago.

Silver is more volatile, which is why in the short term it over-reacts relative to Gold. We now believe that Silver is the better investment going forward because there are big forces with too much to lose if it does not keep a reliable ratio with Gold. You must stomach the higher volatility. We simply believe the "rule" no longer applies to Silver only as a function of its higher volatility. We believe it applies in the long term as an investment now. First let's look at the phrase's cynical roots in the context of how Bullion Dealers used to (and some still) operate:

The 1990's: Buy Silver if you are Bullish Gold - and don't need your money: The root for this axiom is not in a love for Silver. It is how Bullion Banks herded clients into metals. In the 90's, Silver was a broken market. PM investors hated it. Every day we heard the demoralizing stories while Swiss Bank shoved Calls down our throats hedging their LATAM producer business.

Losers trade Silver:

- Hunt Bros were robbed. The Comex will cry foul and the Gov't will force liquidation- no argument. they did it again to Buffet in 1997
- Silver is a waste product of nickel production now- Yup, pour acid on mined nickel and out pops Silver. Leech mining [EDIT- no more- VBL]
- Film is dead- there is no use for Silver anymore.- Yup. I remember looking at potential Silver uses like it replacing chlorine in swimming pools, rationalizing my long call position.. not good

Silver Was a Roach Motel: The result is Silver had a wider bid-offer on a huge contract not suited for retail. And finally, it had non-continuous liquidity, aka markets that flaked from 1 cent wide to 10 cents wide for no apparent reason. This last part killed me.

Silver was indeed a roach motel in the 90's. If J. Aron (GS) owned the Gold mkt, Republic and HSBC owned the Silver market.[EDIT- Pre JPM getting the Bear Stearns physical, which was itself inherited from Bache, who took it from Hunts I believe- VBL] And good luck getting an exit price when you needed one. For energy traders: Ever have to trade Heating Oil without Morgan Stanley or BP involved? Same idea.

But George Soros and PhiBro (based on info and evidence at the time) changed that in 1994. Even though their short squeeze was aborted, it became apparent that Silver shorts were too complacent. Then in 1997 Warren Buffet and PhiBro capitalized on the concept. More on that below.

The Mechanics of Silver Manipulation- Short Con

1. When Gold rallies it did so from origin interest or from Banks releasing recommendations to its "special" clients
2. Silver could lag in early stages of any Gold rally, as it did often in the 90's.
3. Post a Gold rally, Bullion banks still had precious metals demand on its books, and they were likely short Gold
4. The Banks would often say, " Silver is the better value here, we like it and are long"
5. And that was the end of the rally

How Does Buying Silver Kill Gold Rallies? Think of Silver as the cheapest means at the time to get PM exposure. As hedge fund money allocated to Gold, Silver was left behind initially. What follows was witnessed almost monthly. We watched from our option trading pits as the real life events that determined RSI and stochastics played out in front of us. Here is how it used to play out typically:

1. Big Money Funds Buy Gold
 - o Origin Order Flow Buys Weakness: So the Paul Tudor Jones' of the world would get long Gold and some of that flow was handled by the Bullion arms of US Banks
 - o Information would leak. Sometimes by the buyer, sometimes by the Bank, usually by both
 - o Gold rallied before (Banks buy) during (Tudor buys), and after (see #2 below) the order is filled
2. Tier 2 Funds Enter
 - o Either Banks would get a call from the tag-along funds or the banks would call them with a "tip"- "pssst, Tudor is buying"
 - o The Chesapeakes would buy less than Tudor. And the execution was likely less than perfect- but they beat the vwap!
 - o Banks also start to sell some of their own longs to the Tier 2 Players to lock in their flow trading profits
3. Momo funds enter
 - o At this point, momentum signals would go off and trend chasing funds would start to buy strength, enter Trout and others.
 - o But during these days Gold priced supply, not demand. Which means there were no trends, just price discovery for readily available supply to hit the market
4. The Kiss of Death- Buy Silver
 - o Now you have all sorts of undercapitalized over-leveraged players looking to get in
 - o They can't afford to buy Gold to get proper exposure for their capital
 - o The Banks oblige them: "Buy silver, it is undervalued on a relative basis"
 - o phone clerks used to snicker and announce to the floor "Trout is buying, game over"
 - o And that was the top. For there was no retail to sell to.

Silver Educates a Reluctant Chartist: So when a colleague at JPM used to say, Buy Silver if you are bullish Gold, he was right. But he always followed it with, "But it's a quick trade, don't take it home." So I started watching the RSI and Stochastics as a non-believer in technical analysis. One of the traders I worked with, Gregg Salzman, was a big contributor to learning charts. The result was a begrudging respect for technical analysis as a confirmation of the monthly tragedy we witnessed in Silver.

And the JPM guy was right. In fact, Silver itself was an RSI non-confirmation signal of Gold's overbought status at the time. Less money invested, moved more than Gold that day. And a sign that any fund that had PM money to invest was done allocating. Next up, Banks gunned the stop-loss orders below left by their clients. Tudor? He was long gone by then.

Short Silver becomes a crowded trade

At some point the pendulum had swung too far the other way. Miners were hedging production not yet mined to stay in business. They relied on the ability to borrow above ground Silver in HSBC, Republic etc vaults to make delivery if they had to. Funds did not take delivery, instead always rolling to the next month and getting killed on the contango. During this time I took delivery a few times to see if the contango would snap. It usually didn't until after my FCM forced me to retender. It did start to work later on. But the Silver prophets were George Soros, and Warren Buffet.

Why Did Soros and Buffet Play Silver and not Gold?

1. Central Banks did not own Silver
2. In 1994, it was widely held that Soros started his accumulation in Gold and was told "stop" by the Fed- so he turned to Silver with PhiBro
3. Warren Buffet after rescuing PhiBro and its parent company in 1994 makes his own play on Silver. Based from what we saw on Silver miners sloppy cash flow mgt. The Gov't requested he not take delivery. He obliged, lending the miners who did not have Silver to deliver back to them at a 40% cost for a year based on the backwardation.

Today: Buy Silver if you are Bullish Gold

Because Gold will be:

1. Confiscated where it can be.-When China Confiscates Gold- Get Silver like JPM
2. Taxed where possible.- LATAM countries
3. So-called Physical ETFs flaking on requests for bullion as in the Xetra-Gold fund case.- do you want a free toaster instead?
4. Prohibited from being stored in JPM safety deposit boxes- a CYA in case a Gold count is taken?
 - o as of April 2015, JPMorgan Chase sent a letter to all renters of safe deposit boxes, specifying a new agreement that they must sign if they wish to continue to rent a safe deposit box. It includes this key phrase: "Contents of the box: You agree not to store any cash or coins other than those found to have a collectible value."
5. Silver will not be Confiscated [EDIT- But Comex is not obligated to deliver- VBL]
 - o And the major longs in Silver will do what they can to keep a stable ratio between the 2 metals so that if Gold ever becomes Gov't domain only, and a ratio is fixed for Silver at that time, (or not), the data will back it up.

WSJ: Markets Look Like They're in a Bubble. What Do Investors Do Now?

Investors see some classic signs of froth, but they are uncertain whether a downfall looms

By Michael Wursthorn and Akane Otani

For once, everyone seems to agree: Much of the market looks like it's in a bubble.

Shares of unprofitable companies like GameStop Corp. GME 67.87% and AMC Entertainment Holdings Inc. AMC 53.65% are rising at a breakneck pace, propelled by a growing army of individual investors. Options activity is surging, bitcoin prices are near records and businesses are rushing to opportunistically sell stock through a flurry of initial public offerings, listings of blank-check companies and follow-on share sales.

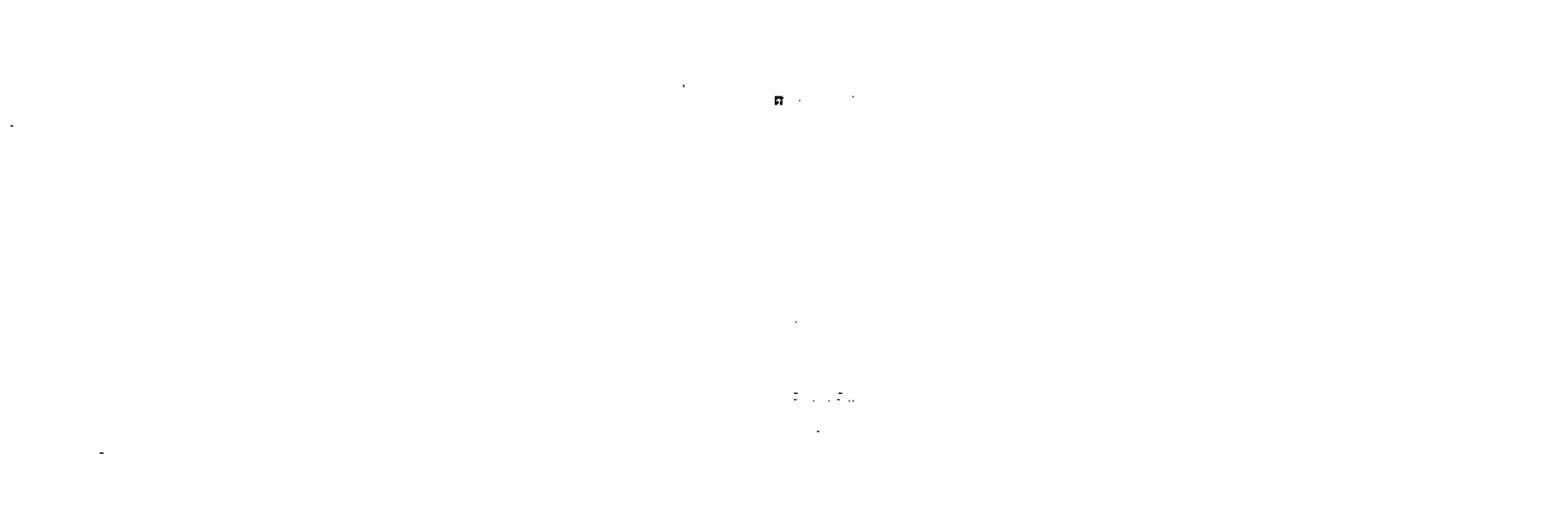

To many, valuations look stretched as they hover at levels similar to the highflying days of 2000. That said, high valuations alone don't necessarily mean the rally is near its end, investors say. History has shown that markets have often been able to climb far longer than thought possible, be it the dot-com boom in the late 1990s or the dizzying rise in Japanese stocks in the 1980s.

And recently, the broader stock market has been on the decline. The S&P 500 dropped 3.3% last week, though it remains up 66% from its March low. The bubblelike behavior there has mostly been contained to a handful of individual stocks, not larger indexes.

Single-Stock Bubbles

By David I. Forster, author of "The Bubble Trap: How to Avoid the Next Market Crash" (Harper Business, $27.99, www.harpercollins.com)

Individual stock price performance

An even bigger issue arguing against a marketwide bubble is simple math. With interest rates at rock bottom and further stimulus on the table, many investors are being handsomely rewarded by putting their money into riskier, higher-yielding assets. What's more, in many cases earnings have held up or been robust, despite a global pandemic.

That combination of factors has helped push investor optimism. Bullishness on stocks among money managers is at a three-year high, according to a recent Bank of America survey of 194 money managers who oversee $561 billion in assets. Meanwhile, the average share of cash in portfolios—typically a safeguard against market turmoil—is at the lowest level since May 2013.

Nonetheless, investors are trying to identify what could cause bubbles among individual stocks to pop and whether any of the bursts will spread to the wider market. Next week, investors will get a look at fresh data on the manufacturing sector, earnings from Amazon.com Inc. AMZN -0.97% and Google parent Alphabet Inc. GOOG -1.47% and the January employment report.

"You know, this one has checked off all the boxes from a history book," said Jeremy Grantham, co-founder of Boston money manager Grantham, Mayo, Van Otterloo & Co., who predicted the market crashes of 2000 and 2008. Mr. Grantham has been calling the current market overheated since last year.

But even he concedes the timing of a market top is difficult.

"We know each bubble is a little bit different and, with the help of new trading platforms and the internet, it could set more records," he said.

Mr. Grantham isn't alone in his worries. Nearly 90% of some 627 market professionals think some financial markets are in a bubble, according to a recent Deutsche Bank survey. Meanwhile, Google searches for the term "stock market bubble" reached an all-time high in January.

Jerry Braakman, chief investment officer of First American Trust, says his company, concerned about stretched valuations in the U.S., has been gradually shifting more money into stocks elsewhere.

Lately, "the market has not been correlated to the macro picture," he said.

New Year Anxieties

By Michael S. Sauter and Michael J. Sauter | Published 1/11/2021

index of financial keywords searches for "stock market bubble" since 2004

While the moves of some stocks and assets have been jarring, analysts and investors say they aren't surprised by the freewheeling, speculative activity in the financial markets.

A super-accommodative Federal Reserve, low interest rates and, more recently, optimism on the coronavirus vaccine and economy have underpinned much of the buying by investors during the past 11 months. Many Americans built up their savings during the pandemic—and stand to gain even more if Congress follows through on another stimulus package. And the prospect of low returns in most other assets has driven investors to buy stocks more aggressively.

Add to that, more individual investors are trading than ever before. Those investors threw their weight around last year by shocking Wall Street veterans with a rash of irrational stock picks, including Hertz Global Holdings Inc., HTZGQ 7.36% which spiked nearly 900% from its low to its high in the wake of filing for bankruptcy protection.

This year's encores have been even more stunning. On Wednesday alone, 24.5 billion shares and 57.1 million options contracts changed hands, a record driven by individual investors, according to Rich Repetto, a managing director in Piper Sandler & Co. GameStop shares more than doubled that day, briefly giving shares of the beleaguered videogame retailer a more than 1,700% gain since the year's start.

"This is merely one example of what's becoming dozens of dozens," Mr. Grantham said. Other retail darlings include AMC, which jumped more than 300% Wednesday, and BlackBerry Ltd. , whose stock the same day notched its biggest gain in more than 17 years.

Companies are rushing to get in on the action.

Companies have raised $13.4 billion through 24 IPOs so far this year, a 300% jump in listings from the same period last year, according to Renaissance Capital data. Blank-check companies continued to flood the market, with 91 gathering about $25 billion, nearly a third of the value raised throughout all of last year, according to SPACinsider.com. And there have been 111 offerings of additional shares by U.S.-listed companies, doubling the number from the same period a year earlier, Dealogic data show.

Usually, such frenzied activity would lead big money managers to pull back from stocks. But many argue that shares of GameStop, AMC and other highflying stocks represent their own bubbles—and don't pose a threat to the entire financial ecosystem. Analysts at Goldman Sachs Group Inc. GS -1.40% say the run-up in unprofitable stocks, which they say make up about 5% of the overall market, poses little risk of contagion.

"These stocks don't make up the bulk of the stock market," said Samantha McLemore, a portfolio manager at $3.5 billion money-manager Miller Value Partners. "There are so many areas of the market that we're finding attractively valued."

At first glance, investors' go-to for measuring valuations, price-to-earnings ratios, suggests the market looks expensive.

The S&P 500 currently trades at 22 times projected earnings during the next 12 months, not far off from the 25 times the index traded at in 2000, just before the dot-com crash, according to FactSet.

But that's only part of the picture. That level looks less concerning once low interest rates and earnings, which are expected to grow, are factored in, several investors and analysts said.

One simple explanation for why investors haven't pulled back more?

"We've seen it in the past—if you think you have a bubble and sell too soon, that can be a very costly trade," said Mr. Braakman of First American Trust.

Smaller, slower and more profitable. These are the watchwords for Chesapeake Energy as it emerges from bankruptcy. Free of the colossal liabilities that sank it as the pandemic slashed global energy demand last year, the company has also abandoned the growth-at-all-costs strategy that made it a pioneer of the shale revolution — and poster child of the sector's debt-fuelled excess.

Chesapeake's market value will be a fraction of the $35bn it boasted more than a decade ago, back when its controversial founder, the late Aubrey McClendon, was America's best-paid chief executive and his company poured money into everything from Oklahoma real estate to an NBA arena. The new Chesapeake pledges to spend less than it brings in and return the excess to shareholders.

Outside the US oil and gas industry, this wouldn't sound radical. Within the business, it is a departure. The only feature that matched shale's disruptive rise in the past 15 years — more than doubling US oil and gas production and sharply reducing dependence on foreign oil supplies — was the industry's unmatched knack for destroying investors' money, as hundreds of billions of dollars were spent with little return. Wall Street reacted by dumping its stocks, making the sector one of the S&P 500's smallest. When the worst oil crash in decades struck last year, operators were forced to slash capital expenditure, sack tens of thousands of workers, idle rigs and cut production. Chesapeake's Chapter 11 filing was just the most high-profile of scores of bankruptcies.

Now, promise shale executives, a more resilient industry is emerging from the ashes that aims to woo investors. Like the reincarnated Chesapeake, it will be smaller — some analysts believe the sector will be reduced to just 10 dominant shale producers. Production increases will be modest, and financed from cash flow. And activity will focus on fewer prolific shale fields, mainly in Texas. Oil operators that feared new US president Joe Biden's ambition to launch a green energy revolution would stymie the industry's drilling and slow production growth, now promise to do both themselves.

US oil production boomed over the past 10 years

"I do believe we have a lot of proving to do to get investors back," says Vicki Hollub, head of Occidental Petroleum, which 18 months ago racked up $50bn in debt buying a rival producer in a deal now considered one of the most reckless gambles in the shale patch's short history.

Cash flow and earnings growth must be the new priorities, Ms Hollub says. "I believe that the watershed moment is here and our industry will, I don't think, ever be the way we have been in the past."

Can the industry's new pitch be trusted? Some investors remain sceptical, remembering how past promises of capital discipline crumbled when oil prices rose. "Give an oilman a dollar and he'll drill a well," runs the old industry adage. In an era when environmental concerns are already deterring investment in fossil fuels, and long-term growth in oil demand is no longer assured, shale executives know they cannot risk breaking more promises.

"Why should investors trust it?" asks Matt Gallagher, who headed Parsley Energy, a shale producer acquired by larger operator Pioneer Natural Resources last year. "They shouldn't."

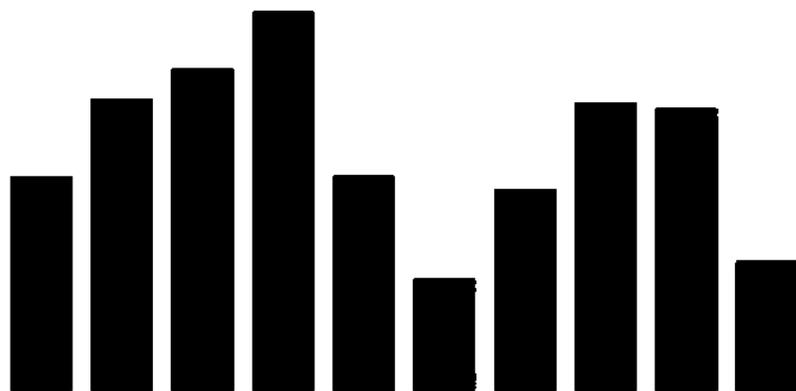

Early warning signs

After years of growth, shale's cash-intensive business model was running on fumes even before Saudi Arabia's price war with Russia and the coronavirus pandemic crashed the oil market last year. The sector's defining feature is the fast decline of each shale well's production, where output can drop by 80 per cent after just a year. To offset the loss, another must be drilled. Then another, to offset that well's loss.

"In a shale play if you stop running, you will fly off the back of the treadmill," says Raoul LeBlanc, vice-president of energy at consultancy IHS Markit and former head of strategic planning at Anadarko Petroleum, the company bought by Occidental in 2019. "Just to stay still, you've got to do a lot of drilling."

Operators drilled more than 14,000 shale wells in 2019, according to Rystad, an energy research company. It helped the US hit record-high oil output near 13m barrels a day, a level unmatched even by Saudi Arabia and Russia, the world's next biggest producers.

Shale industry capex tanked in 2020

That was a rise from 5m b/d just eight years earlier — a surge that sparked booms from Texas to North Dakota and helped drag the US economy out of the mire of the global financial crisis, adding one percentage point to GDP between 2010 and 2015, according to the Federal Reserve Bank of Dallas. But it required huge infusions of cash offered at basement interest rates. Rystad says the sector spent around $400bn capital in those years, but by 2019 free cash flow arrived only once, in 2016.

"The fundamental problem with the shale model over the past decade has been the pursuit of growth over return on capital employed or returning capital to shareholders," says Ben Dell, managing partner at Kimmeridge, a private equity firm that has built up an activist position in the sector.

Investors that rushed to finance shale's recovery from the 2014-15 price crash — an earlier Saudi price war to capture market share — were fleeing by 2019. As capital markets began to close for shale companies, operators were forced to trim spending plans, reducing new drilling activity. With profits still absent and growth prospects diminishing, the shale patch entered 2020 in distress.

A reputation for flagrant corporate misgovernance and excess — from colossal executive bonuses earned by hitting oil output growth targets, not profits, to flashy office developments and rumours of company-funded hunting trips — didn't help.

Then came last year's price crash, including the symbolic moment in April when West Texas Intermediate, the country's benchmark crude contract, traded below zero for the first time. "Covid hits, oil prices collapse, everyone has to cut their capex, valuations crash," says Aaron DeCoste, an equity analyst at Boston Partners, an institutional investor. "And it's effectively reset the entire industry."

Just a few shale companies showed they could survive the collapse last year in relative health, says Mr Gallagher. From Chesapeake to scores of smaller producers, the distress was acute, with more than 100 operators and service providers, with $102bn in debt, going under, according to a Rystad analysis from law firm Haynes and Boone.

"The ones that went wrong went way wrong," Mr Gallagher says. "What's going on now is people are finding religion about the models that work."

Drilling is slowly picking back up

M&A rush

One tenet of the new shale "religion" is that scale is critical to survival — but of operators, not the overall sector. The mergers and acquisitions to achieve adequate size, coupled with the consolidation of weakened companies, will continue to shrink the number of producers.

Lee Maginniss, managing director at Alvarez & Marsal, an advisory firm involved in oil industry restructuring, says subscale producers will face "intense" pressure. From around 500 exploration and production companies in the US before the crash, 50 may survive, he says. Other analysts say just 10 or so dominant public shale companies will be left to run the best plays.

M&A activity is brisk, with $52bn worth of deals done in the US oil sector last year, according to Enverus, a data provider. Chevron moved first, buying Noble Energy in July. ConocoPhillips bought Concho Resources. Devon Energy merged with WPX Energy. Heavy debt, battered balance sheets and weak equity valuations meant that stocks, not cash, were the currency in each deal.

Pierre Breber, Chevron's chief financial officer, expects the consolidation wave to continue. "You need to have bigger players, stronger players, more disciplined management teams, stronger balances sheets," he says. Scott Sheffield, Pioneer's chief executive, says only companies with market capitalisation above $10bn will remain attractive to a value-focused investor base.

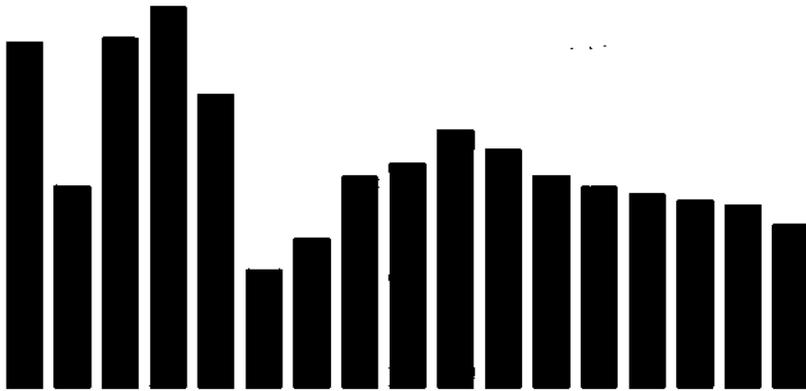

Scale will also allow them to compete with ExxonMobil and Chevron, US majors which have built up commanding shale positions. Between them they intend to produce about 2m b/d from the Permian Basin later this decade — almost a fifth of total current US crude production.

Most of the M&A activity has occurred in that shale oilfield, the world's most prolific, where operators will concentrate on the rich layers of oil-bearing rocks in the Delaware and Midland Basins of New Mexico and Texas. Gas-focused players, such as the revamped Chesapeake, are likely to stick to their best assets. Other shale fields, even the Bakken of North Dakota that sparked the shale oil rush a decade ago, will lose out.

"The heydays of the Bakken, [Texas's] Eagle Ford, [Nebraska's] Niobrara, the Scoop Stack play in Oklahoma, are all over," says Mr Sheffield, referring to other shale fields in the US.

The number of shale wells drilled is about to rise again

Capping output

But the main feature of the post-crash shale patch will be an era of tepid growth — if it expands at all. Rick Muncrief, chief executive of Devon, says his company can now break even at $30 a barrel or less, well below the $50-plus for oil in recent weeks. Yet Devon will hold its rig count flat this year, only drilling a few wells to meet the lease terms of some acreage.

"From publicly traded companies you'll see a very measured response," says Mr Muncrief. US oil production is likely to fall by 200,000-300,000 b/d as a result, he believes, remaining around 11m b/d — well below the record highs set before last year's crash.

"Are people going to return to growth? Is US shale going to grow? The answer is no," says Mr Sheffield. "Don't anticipate a big ramp up in drilling, people are not going to go back to the old ways."

Even if oil prices hit $100, Mr Sheffield says his company would only increase output by 5 per cent a year — less than half the rate of average annual growth in total shale production between 2008 and the beginning of last year.

US shale companies are beginning to live within their means

Source: Rystad Energy

Analysts say this will be enforced by the market, which has punished excessive supply growth — even before the pandemic hit last year — reducing oil and gas’s share of the S&P 500 almost to a footnote.

“The reason why energy is down to 2 per cent of the S&P 500 is because of that behaviour,” says Mr Breber. Until the world has fully recovered, it will not need shale producers to increase oil supply, he says.

So far, operators are holding the line. Rystad says third-quarter capital spending by the 39 main shale operators it covers was $3.6bn beneath cash flows from operations, allowing a record 89 per cent of operators to balance their budgets. If the discipline sticks, dividend- and value-focused investors could be lured back.

“I see attractive fundamentals that I haven’t seen for 20 years,” says Mr DeCoste, referring to the cheap valuations of some operators, juxtaposed with expectations for higher oil prices. But he is cautious about the new capital discipline pledges: “It takes years to build your reputation and moments to destroy it.”

Prisoner’s dilemma

Despite the wave of consolidation, other analysts and investors remain unconvinced by shale’s new mantra and more mature outlook, saying operators will be unable to resist another supply surge if the recent price rally continues. “Gordon Gekko once said ‘greed is good’,” says one adviser to shale operators. “In the oil patch that means ‘growth is good’.”

Chief executives are just “giving the audience what it wants to hear,” says Art Berman, a consultant and shale sceptic. Forgoing growth is “absolutely antithetical to the DNA of oil companies in general, but shale companies in particular”.

Investors will be hesitant to take operators’ pledges on faith alone, says Ms Hollub. “It’s going to be a ‘show me’ situation with them.”

Higher prices in recent weeks are already testing operators’ resolve. The weekly horizontal rig count hit 338 in mid-January, more than 60 per cent above its low in August. Private operators, which account for about 15 per cent of onshore US oil production, have led the resurgence, taking advantage of falling costs caused by the drop in demand for oilfield services from publicly listed companies.

“We can drill cheaper,” says Wil VanLoh, head of Quantum Energy Partners, a large private equity shale investor, referring to his portfolio companies. “By definition, private capital is growth capital . . . we out-drill our cash flow until the time we get to positive free cash flow.”

Investors have fled the US shale patch in recent years

It is the kind of message that public company bosses, insisting they will not be drawn into another competitive drilling binge, do not want to hear — especially as some analysts project more oil price increases. Goldman Sachs predicts Brent, the international benchmark, will rise to $65 a barrel by mid-year.

Rystad's head of shale research, Artem Abramov, says he expects 2021 to “become the best year for the industry from the perspective of free cash flow generation”. It may even allow for profitability — and new production growth, testing operators' promises to investors.

At an average WTI price of just $52 a barrel this year — around the current price — the shale operators Rystad covers would rake in almost $41bn from operations. After capex commitments, debt payments and more than $4bn returned to shareholders, they would still have $8bn of net cash in hand. The question is what they do with it.

“I think they lose discipline and they probably bring on too much growth, and damage the market again — like they did every year in the past,” says Mr LeBlanc. “They're in a prisoner's dilemma. They never have discipline as a group, because they're all competing with each other.”

FT: China Oil Futures Hit Record Levels

Beijing eyes Rmb-denominated markets that seek to challenge dollar's dominance

By Thomas Hale

Activity in China's oil futures market has risen to record levels as the country seeks to develop the role of its currency in a trade dominated by the US dollar.

Open interest in oil futures on the Shanghai International Energy Exchange (INE), a measure of the total number of contracts outstanding, leapt to a daily average of 118,249 in 2020 — four times higher than in 2019. Trading volumes climbed more than 20 per cent year on year.

A rise in trading and positions in the contracts, which were launched in 2018, forms part of a longer-term push by Beijing to establish renminbi-denominated markets that ultimately seek to challenge the dollar's dominance.

The new market “has done well beyond a lot of people's expectations, including mine”, said Jian Yang, research director at the JPMorgan Center for Commodities at University of Colorado Denver. He added that the market could provide “potentially huge opportunities for promoting global usage” of the renminbi.

China is the world's largest importer of crude oil — a role that has intensified thanks to the country's swift economic recovery from the coronavirus crisis. Last year it imported a record 542m tonnes of crude oil, up 7 per cent from 2019.

But its oil futures market, which is vital for allowing investors to hedge against or speculate on price movements, is still dwarfed by dollar-denominated international benchmarks.

Renminbi oil futures traded on the Shanghai Stock Exchange launched in 2018, followed by contracts for copper in November last year that sought to rival London's dominance in metals trading.

The establishment of its own commodities contracts has been a slow-burn priority in China for the past decade, but has gathered pace alongside financial market liberalisation policies pursued last year as foreign capital rushed to the country in the midst of the pandemic.

Last year, overseas purchases of Chinese bonds and stocks through Hong Kong programmes amounted to about Rmb1tn. In November, China increased foreign investor access to futures markets on the mainland, as part of reforms to its tightly controlled financial system.

Michal Meidan and Adil Imsirovic at the Oxford Institute for Energy Studies noted in a recent paper that the INE contract was still "far from being a benchmark".

But they added that a near collapse in global oil markets last year had boosted the Chinese market's appeal as increases in storage capacity encouraged established foreign traders to deliver more into China.

"As liberalisation of the Chinese energy market continues, delivered oil market in China will grow in importance and the role of the INE contract will increase with it," they wrote.

Tom Reed, vice-president at Argus Media, said that some international hedge funds were exploring participating in the Chinese oil futures market. He suggested that the increase in activity was likely to be driven primarily by speculation, including by the country's retail traders.

"It's a financial market, but not in the sense that Brent is," he said. "It's somewhere for people to put their money and try to make profits from short-term [movements]".

FT: GameStop Curbs Put Clearing Houses Under the Spotlight

Volatility prompts firms with crucial settlement role to increase collateral demands

By Philip Stafford and Joe Rennison

The crucial role played by clearing houses in financial markets has been thrust into the spotlight after contentious moves by US brokers such as Robinhood and Charles Schwab to restrict retail investors' bets on stocks at the heart of the Reddit-fuelled trading boom.

Customers reacted angrily on Thursday as brokers moved to stop them opening new positions in certain red-hot stocks, accusing them of unfair treatment or even a Wall Street establishment plot. But the brokers gave a more mundane explanation: the extra volatility in share prices meant they had to hold more capital at the institutions that clear their trades.

What do clearing houses do?

These unobtrusive venues normally sit in the background of daily market activity but they can become the centre of attention during periods of volatility when they require more cash — or "margin" — from their members to ensure that deals are honoured as customers expect.

An equities trade that has been executed can take up to two days to be legally settled, creating a risk of it failing if either side of the trade defaults. A clearing house stands between the two sides to manage the risk to the market if that happens.

Each day members of the clearing house, which range from small brokers like Robinhood to big Wall Street banks such as JPMorgan and Citigroup, are required to put up margin as insurance for their trades.

The amount is calculated by the clearing house and is based on the amount of trading carried out by each member, as well as the volatility of the individual securities traded. Margin is generally collected at the start of the trading day, although there can be intraday calls in frenzied periods, in an attempt to protect the wider market from sudden trade failures.

The clearing member often has limited time to make up the shortfall and the margin typically has to be an asset that is highly liquid, such as cash, US government bonds or shares. In the middle of the market volatility last March, one US bank was required to find $9.6bn of margin for derivatives trades within an hour.

How do brokers such as Robinhood fit into this?

In common with rivals such as Schwab and ETrade, Robinhood clears its own trades and is a member of the main US equities clearing house, run by DTCC.

While self-clearing saves on the fees that would otherwise go to another clearing broker, it also means Robinhood takes on the risk that an executed trade does not settle, and needs to have more cash on hand to cover shortfalls. It also faces higher costs if the clearing house raises margin requirements in volatile periods to protect against a member default.

“The extreme volatility is a big factor behind this,” said Andy Nybo, managing director at Burton-Taylor International Consulting. “They need to make sure they are able to meet cash requirements, whether it is for clearing or to investors that are owed money due to trading activity.”

As Robinhood said in a blog post on Thursday, the requirements “can be substantial in the current environment.” It declined to comment further.

Between Wednesday and Thursday, the margin call from DTCC across the US equities market rose from $26bn to $33.5bn, the clearing house confirmed.

DTCC said the frenzied trading in shares such as GameStop and AMC Entertainment “generated substantial risk exposures at firms that clear these trades . . . particularly if the clearing member or its clients are predominantly on one side of the market.”

How did brokers respond?

Safety mechanisms built into the market’s infrastructure across Wall Street led to periodic halts in trading activity on Thursday. In order to ensure they had enough money to cover margin and capital requirements, Robinhood and others such as Schwab and TD Ameritrade raised margin for trading on some of the names at the heart of the volatility, which required more cash be set aside after each trade.

This limited its margin needs from escalating further. By allowing users to close positions, it was still permitting trades that would reduce its immediate need for cash.

Robinhood also raised the margin requirements for customers that had not paid for the total value of their trading up front, having cut its margin requirements in December in an attempt to drive more trading activity. That meant some customers suddenly needed to come up with cash to cover trades.

Behind the scenes, Robinhood moved to raise a fresh $1bn in capital from its existing investors, which it announced ahead of trading on Friday. The company said the fundraising was a “strong sign of confidence from investors that will help us continue to further serve our customers”.

Anthony Denier, chief executive of Webull, another company that was forced to restrict trading in some shares, said in an interview with Yahoo Finance that its clearing firm “simply could not afford” the cost of entering into new trades.

“This has nothing to do with a decision or some sort of closed, cigar smoke filled room of Wall Street firms getting together to the dismay of the retail trader,” he said.

WSJ: Why Did Robinhood Ground GameStop? Look at Clearing

Frenzied trading in GameStop and other stocks highlights role of clearinghouses

By Telis Demos

When some online brokers including Robinhood Markets Inc. and Webull Financial LLC moved this week to restrict trading in GameStop Corp. GME 67.87% , AMC Entertainment Holdings Inc. AMC 53.65% and other stocks, fueled by Reddit’s WallStreetBets forum, they did so in part because of obligations with clearinghouses that help ensure trading across the market isn’t disrupted by defaults. Here’s how it works.

What is a clearinghouse?

Consider the basics of trading: Buyers and sellers must agree on a price. The buyer then must pay the seller, and ownership must be formally transferred.

Enter clearinghouses. The clearinghouse collects and distributes payments and transfers ownership. So traders are free to focus just on price, and to take the best price in the market regardless of who is offering it. Neither side has to worry about the other's ability to pay.

For stocks in the U.S., the main clearinghouse is National Securities Clearing Corp., which is part of a larger clearing organization that operates in other markets, called Depository Trust & Clearing Corp.

Clearinghouses serve to mutualize risk. Members keep cash or collateral such as Treasury securities at the clearinghouse to cover their own activities and the obligations of other members should they fail. The clearinghouse might ask the members to post more of this money, often known as margin, if they are making riskier trades. The aim is to ensure that no individual member's failure causes the whole system to collapse.

How does the financial crisis figure in this?

In response to the 2008 collapse of broker-dealer Lehman Brothers Holdings Inc., lawmakers writing the Dodd-Frank Act sought to beef up supervision of clearinghouses and to push more trading into clearinghouses. The focus was primarily on so-called over-the-counter derivatives, like credit-default swaps, that didn't have a central marketplace. The reforms also affected some longstanding clearinghouses, including National Securities Clearing Corp., by designating them as systemically important financial market utilities, which subjected them to greater regulatory scrutiny.

Why would a clearinghouse have to increase requirements?

As noted earlier, margin requirements often rise with risk. A sharp rise in the price of any security raises the prospect that it will decline just as fast, potentially adding to the risk of those trading and holding as collateral these securities.

A challenge in the stock market is that settlement is not instant. The system allows two days after the day a trade happens until the shares and money must change hands, known as "T+2" settlement. Over those two days, the risk that a party might be unable to complete a trade can, in rare circumstances, change dramatically based on market conditions.

One such circumstance might be when the price of a security is extraordinarily volatile. In that case, the seller is exposed to increased risk that in the event of a failure of a buyer to pay up, the security they would be stuck still owning is worth dramatically less. The extraordinary volatility of a stock like GameStop would increase such a concern.

Another is the risk that a party suddenly owes an outsize amount of cash. In a normal market, any clearing member likely has a mostly balanced book of buys and sells, meaning they are both paying and receiving cash. And often many of their own customers' trades cancel each other, meaning they have no net obligation to the clearinghouse. But when a firm has a huge imbalance of buy orders, its obligation to pay cash skyrockets. This may have been the case this week, when there was much demand for just one or two stocks.

So who decides it's time to increase margin requirements?

How a clearinghouse judges these risks, and therefore when it makes demands for more upfront funds, is typically formulaic. Margins can be based on equations such as value-at-risk. Exactly how the formula works, and who is responsible for losses in what order, are important elements. In the case of National Securities Clearing Corp., losses would be covered by the defaulting member's funds before the clearinghouse's own funds or other members' funds would be used.

A broker like Robinhood would also have to make decisions about its own capital, and how much it was willing or able to tie up in settlement. A broker may face separate obligations for capital levels, like with the SEC. Other brokers also clear via another intermediary—like Apex Clearing, through which WeBull clears—that is a member. These intermediaries may have their own risk controls they apply to their clients.

By Michael P. Regan

The rarely discussed role that clearing firms play in settling stock trades is at the heart of what caused Robinhood and other brokerages to restrict trading of some companies this week.

Larry Tabb, head of market-structure research at Bloomberg Intelligence, explains how the process works in a Q&A below.

Question: So what is the most important thing to understand here?

Tabb: The settlement process -- cash and securities officially change hands two days after a trade. During those two days, a lot of things can happen. The problem is, what happens when a trading counterparty and/or a firm cannot afford to pay for the securities they bought? If that occurred, and if the clearinghouse didn't guarantee the other side of the trade, then the client would either not receive securities or not get paid, and the trade would have to be broken.

That is very bad. Not necessarily for a retail client buying 100 shares or so, but what if it was a big fund or a major player, like Robinhood or let's say Lehman Brothers?

So if Lehman were to default (which it did) on all of its trades, then all of the folks on the other side of Lehman's trades would send in their securities to Lehman, but wouldn't get paid. Then the brokers who didn't get paid wouldn't be able to afford to pay for the securities that they bought. So you would have cascading failures.

So to ensure this doesn't happen, they have clearinghouses. The clearinghouse takes the other side of the trade and guarantees settlement even if someone like Lehman goes bust. To do that, they have a waterfall of capital. First there is the securities in the client's account (which support the broker and not the clearinghouse), then the margin provided by the broker, then there is capital provided by the clearing member, then there are IOUs by the big brokers to fund the clearinghouse, then there are central banks.

Question: Can you explain how high-flying stocks like GameStop and AMC make clearing firms require more margin collateral?

Tabb: So the amount of margin needed is determined by the riskiness of the securities that are bought. Most securities' value stays pretty stable. However, given the volatility of these names and their overvalue, the problem is: Who knows what they are worth? And given that two-day lag, the clearinghouse can't guarantee that the buyers will pay for their securities nor the sellers will come up with the securities to deliver.

Question: So if I'm a Robinhood customer, and I buy shares of GameStop or AMC or any of these wild Reddit stocks, what would prevent my counterparty from being able to deliver? I'm guessing if it's a super-high short interest, the brokerage on the other side may struggle to find the stock to deliver?

Tabb: Yup. And the problem is, if I am a hedge fund and I am short GME at $30, I have to buy it back at $500 or pay some astronomical fee to borrow it.

Question: So firms like Citadel Securities, which execute trades for brokerages like Robinhood, have nothing to do with this?

Tabb: No.

Question: So a clearing firm somewhere got concerned, and called Robinhood and said this has all gotten out of hand, we need more money in your account?

Tabb: So Depository Trust & Clearing Corp. -- actually National Securities Clearing Corp., which is owned by DTCC -- upped the capital that is needed to guarantee those trades. Now the broker can't guarantee those trades with the clients' cash -- a la MF Global -- the broker needs to pledge their own capital. And given the massive trading in GameStop, AMC, the amount of capital was really substantial. And Robinhood and a few others just didn't have the capital. So Robinhood needed to borrow $1 billion to cover their clients' settlement.

Reuters: Analysis: To the Brink and Back on GameStop - Wall Street vs Reddit

By Svea Herbst-Bayliss and Maiya Keidan

On three hours of sleep a night and with no time to eat, one New York-based hedge fund manager overseeing billions in assets called last week the most stressful of his life.

"Nothing was making sense anymore," he said, as he watched the stock of GameStop Corp soar, while he bet it would fall.

Wednesday was the worst. Fueled by chatter on Reddit and other social media to take on Wall Street, investors used venues like online trading app Robinhood to bid up the brick-and-mortar retailer. GameStop surged 135%, on its way to gaining more than 1,500% in January without any change in its business outlook. Hedge funds scrambled. By this point trading had become so unpredictable across all sectors that funds were forced to dump their winning stocks to balance out their portfolios.

"It's time to cut out," the manager said he told his team. "Let's live for another day."

The experience of this manager and a handful of others interviewed by Reuters over the last days, who all requested anonymity for fear of personal threats from retail investors, is a keyhole into a week of losses on Wall Street they say was far worse for them than last year's historic pandemic sparked sell-off.

As a new week of trading begins, it remains to be seen how long the Reddit-fueled rally in traditionally unloved stocks will last.

More immediately, it could mean more market losses if hedge funds have to keep selling to meet redemptions or right their portfolios. Longer term, they may have to shift strategies to find their footing and turn the tide to their advantage.

"What is not clear as yet is whether this disruption will evolve into a market accident," said Mohamed El-Erian, chief economic advisor of Allianz.

CROWDED TRADE

The extent of losses has exposed a big weakness on Wall Street. Analytics firm S3 said GameStop short sellers had mark-to-market losses of nearly $20 billion so far this year.

Several hedge fund managers said the idea to short GameStop had long been a favorite at exclusive "idea dinners", where fund managers swap their best trades.

Managers also noted traders, many of whom who work at multi-strategy funds that employ pods of portfolio managers, traders and analysts, often know each other well and may compare notes. Gabe Plotkin's Melvin Capital, one of the funds gored most by GameStop's gains, took a $2.75 billion bailout from his one-time mentor Steve Cohen and Citadel's Ken Griffin. The funds involved have taken a dent: Cohen's Point72 Asset Management lost roughly 15% in January partly because of its investment in Melvin. Melvin's assets slid during the month from around $12.5 billion to $8 billion, a source familiar with the situation said.

Maplelane Capital, another fund that bet against GameStop, had lost roughly 45% in January, a person familiar with the fund's returns said. Even Viking Global Investors, one of the world's best-performing hedge funds, was off some 7%, people familiar with the returns said.

Representatives for Plotkin, Cohen and Griffin declined to comment.

"Being short consensus stocks is just bad business," said Dinakar Singh, a former Goldman Sachs trader who now runs hedge fund Axon Capital and was not short the stock. "It is great while it is working but when it isn't anymore one guy's problem triggers everyone's headache. It becomes a circular disaster."

INVESTING 'INSANITY'

Fund managers said the week's experience is changing the way they do business. Citron's Andrew Left, who ignited the retail trading frenzy by publicly detailing GameStop's issues, acknowledged defeat by Friday. He had covered his positions, taken a loss, and said he will stop publishing short-seller reports, a strategy that earned him millions and made him a prominent name in the industry.

Hedge funds will also be much more cautious about having short positions going forward for fear of becoming a "mindless target", said one former hedge fund manager, adding that "kind of defeats the purpose of hedge funds." Traditionally hedge funds promised investors a cushion against market declines by being able to sell short and make money when stocks drop.

Funds are also less likely to use trading strategies such as put options, a kind of derivative that has to be disclosed and that Melvin and Maplelane used, the managers said.

At the same time, though, one thing will not change: Wall Street thinking of new ways to make money again.

Already the tide started to turn somewhat late in the week for hedge funds as Robinhood and other some online brokerages used by millions of retail investors restricted trading in the stock.

Many hedge funds still remain on the other side of the GameStop trade, with the number of shares shorted having dropped only 8% during the week as firms like Melvin covered positions. One New York-based banker said his clients were looking for other possible targets of retail trading frenzy and positioning themselves ahead of it to make money if the eye of Reddit turned that way. "People have spent all week running their screens on other situations that might fit this criteria," the banker said. "You're going to see more of it."

"This isn't investing, this is insanity," said Kyle Bass, founder, Hayman Capital Management LP. "A month, two months from now, I will be flabbergasted if GameStop isn't below $100."

Firm owned by hedge-fund billionaire Ken Griffin executes orders for Robinhood customers

By Alexander Osipovich

Small investors banding together online to pump up stocks like GameStop Corp. say they are defying Wall Street. But one of the biggest players in global markets stands to benefit from their frenetic trading.

Citadel Securities, the electronic-trading firm owned by hedge-fund billionaire Ken Griffin, has played a quiet but critical role in the frenzy of the last two weeks.

The firm—an affiliate of Mr. Griffin's hedge fund, Citadel—executes orders placed by customers of Robinhood Markets Inc., TD Ameritrade and other online brokerages that have enjoyed surging volumes during the coronavirus pandemic.

Citadel Securities makes money by selling stocks or options for slightly more than it's willing to buy them. The difference is often just a fraction of a penny per share. But repeated millions of times a day, it adds up to serious money.

Last year, net trading revenue at Citadel Securities was $6.7 billion, almost double the previous high in 2018, a person familiar with the matter said.

Among the forces propelling that growth was an influx of newbie traders, many stuck at home due to Covid-19 lockdowns. Lured by easy-to-use trading apps and an industry shift toward zero-commission trades, individual investors opened more than 10 million new brokerage accounts in 2020, JMP Securities estimates.

Meanwhile, a thriving subculture of day traders grew in corners of the internet like Reddit's WallStreetBets forum, setting the stage for last week's manic trading in GameStop, AMC Entertainment Holdings Inc. and several other popular stocks.

"This is the market that Ken Griffin and Citadel Securities have been waiting for," said Christopher Nagy, a former TD Ameritrade executive who is now a director of Healthy Markets Association, an investor group. "The last time the environment was this good for retail market-makers was back in the dot-com bubble."

The firm drew scrutiny last week when its majority owner, Mr. Griffin, participated in a $2.75 billion emergency cash infusion into Melvin Capital Management, a short seller that was facing steep losses due to the huge rally in GameStop's stock.

Announced Monday, the deal meant Citadel, the hedge-fund firm, was propping up a fund that had bet against GameStop stock, while Citadel Securities had been profiting from the order flow of small investors placing bullish bets on GameStop.

Citadel Securities says it's separately managed from the hedge-fund side of Mr. Griffin's business. The firm also released data showing that during the past week, retail orders pouring into its systems for GameStop were roughly balanced between buyers and sellers, casting doubt on the popular narrative that small investors drove the stock to its record close of $347.51 on Wednesday.

The data showed that 29% of GameStop trading volume Monday through Thursday was handled by Citadel Securities, underlining its huge role in the market for stocks popular with individual investors. Overall, about 41% of U.S. retail stock-trading volume goes through Citadel Securities, while the next-biggest player in the business, Virtu Financial Inc., has a market share of around 32%, the firms say.

"We witnessed an extraordinary level of retail trading last week," a Citadel Securities spokesperson said. "At many times over the course of the week, the large brokerage firms depended upon our capabilities to handle the deluge of orders."

Citadel Securities also accounts for a large chunk of trading volume on public markets like the New York Stock Exchange as well as in options, futures, Treasuries and many markets overseas. Founded in 2002, the firm became a dominant player in electronic trading due to its technological prowess, quantitative skills and a hard-driving company culture. Rivals say it has grown increasingly tough to compete with Citadel Securities' scale and efficiency.

"They're really trying to take an Amazon approach to trading, where they try to squeeze out everyone else who's not on their scale," said Scott Knudsen, a former executive at rival trading firm IMC Financial Markets who now leads Cove Markets, a cryptocurrency-trading startup.

Citadel Securities' retail business has repeatedly drawn controversy. Like Virtu and other market makers, Citadel Securities pays brokerages for the right to trade against individual investors' orders. During the first three quarters of 2020, the firm made over $700 million in such payments to major online brokerages, according to Piper Sandler.

Critics say this practice, called payment for order flow, skews brokers' incentives so they seek to maximize revenues rather than ensure customers get the best price. The practice is banned in some overseas markets, like the U.K. Earlier this month, former U.S. Sen. Carl Levin published an op-ed piece in the Financial Times urging the incoming Biden administration to ban payment for order flow, calling it "a conflicted practice that siphons billions out of U.S. investors' funds each year."

Brokers and trading firms, including Citadel Securities, say payment for order flow benefits investors, because they get a better deal than if the orders were sent to the NYSE or the Nasdaq Stock Market. Citadel Securities says it saved individual investors a total of $1.3 billion last year by executing their orders at better prices than those available on exchanges.

The argument is that, in fact, both sides win: Citadel Securities can offer individual investors better prices on stocks than it would on an exchange, because it knows it's trading against a player too small to move the market. In contrast, when Citadel Securities trades on an exchange, it may end up trading with a fund manager that is driving a stock up or down with institutional-size purchases or sales—a situation that could result in losses for Citadel Securities.

Still, regulatory penalties have fueled suspicion about the firm's handling of individual investors' orders. In 2017, Citadel Securities paid $22.6 million to settle Securities and Exchange Commission charges that it misled customers about providing the best price on investors' trades. Last year, the firm paid $700,000 to resolve claims by the Financial Industry Regulatory Authority that it traded ahead of customer orders in over-the-counter securities. In both cases, Citadel Securities didn't admit wrongdoing.

FT: GameStop Mania: Why Reddit Traders Are Unlikely to Face Prosecution

Regulators would need to find evidence of deception to prove market manipulation, say lawyers
By Kiran Stacey

Last week's stock market turmoil sparked a probe by US financial regulators into whether market manipulation was involved, but lawyers doubt it will lead to prosecutions.

The Securities and Exchange Commission announced on Friday it was looking into what happened when users of Reddit chat rooms drove shares in a handful of companies — including the games retailer GameStop — dramatically higher.

But while retail investors succeeded in squeezing large institutional investors, experts do not believe their actions are likely to amount to market manipulation.

"If someone has been posting on a subreddit [messaging board] that they are very enthusiastic and are acquiring shares in a company, and all the while they are selling, then you have a potential violation," said Joseph Grundfest, a Stanford professor and former commissioner at the SEC.

"But if in all of the tweets and postings there is no misrepresentation, then you could well find that there are no violations in law."

Last week's market frenzy has presented regulators with an unusual challenge. While speculation has driven rushes on stocks before, it is rare for retail investors to buy in such numbers that they squeeze out large institutions that have bet against those companies.

The buying spree targeted companies against which institutional investors had taken out short positions, betting on their decline.

Retail investors discussed how, if they bought in enough numbers, they could force short sellers to buy shares to stem their losses, thereby adding fuel to the rally. Traders egged each other on over Reddit message boards, repeating a mantra borrowed from Disney series The Mandalorian: "This is the way".

Regulators are worried this co-ordinated activity has created a bubble which is likely to burst, potentially causing ruinous losses for some retail investors. Allison Herren Lee, the acting chair of the SEC, said in a joint statement with three other commissioners on Friday: "Extreme stock price volatility has the potential to expose investors to rapid and severe losses and undermine market confidence."

But if the SEC wants to take enforcement action against any of the market participants, legal experts say they will have a difficult case to prove.

The Securities Exchange Act of 1934 makes it illegal to use "any manipulative device or contrivance" in buying or selling regulated shares.

But manipulation, say legal scholars, is a term of art. "Manipulation is like what [Supreme Court justice] Potter Stewart said about obscenity," said Todd Henderson, a law professor at the University of Chicago. "You know it when you see it."

Most commonly, regulators have interpreted manipulative trades to involve deception: whether lying about a company's performance, or the true owner of a share, or a trader's true opinion about a company.

And while Reddit users appear to have co-ordinated to help drive up shares in companies whose underlying performance might not have merited it, it is unclear whether they deceived anyone in doing so.

"If you are telling people to buy a company in bad faith, that is manipulation," said John Coffee, a professor at Columbia Law School and a former legal adviser to the New York Stock Exchange. "But these people are true believers; there is nothing illegal about making wildly optimistic statements."

The SEC rarely brings manipulation cases at all — they accounted for just 5 per cent of enforcement actions in 2019-2020 — and almost never in cases where they are not alleging deception.

One case that might prove a precedent is the 2001 SEC action against Jonathan Lebed, the New Jersey teenager who made hundreds of thousands of dollars buying stocks in thinly traded companies before hyping them on internet message boards. But Mr Lebed was accused of deception: regulators said he used dozens of different online aliases to create the illusion of widespread interest in those stocks.

Even if regulators do decide that manipulation might have occurred last week, many experts believe they are unlikely to act against day traders who do not have significant individual market power. They point out that Gary Gensler, Joe Biden's nominee to head the SEC, made his name in the Obama era as a financial regulator who was tough on Wall Street, and is unlikely to prioritise prosecuting retail traders.

"Even if the SEC decides something was wrong here, the decision over whether to go after Joe Bag o'Donuts is a political one," said Mr Henderson.

The SEC is not only looking into the traders who bought stock last week however: it is also probing the brokerages that enabled the trades, before placing temporary curbs on them, triggering sudden share price drops.

The trading restrictions put in place by online brokerages such as Robinhood attracted the ire of politicians from across the political spectrum, from the progressive congresswoman Alexandria Ocasio-Cortez, to the conservative senator Ted Cruz. Some online commentators even accused the brokerages of being part of a Wall Street plot to protect certain hedge funds whose losses were mounting.

Robinhood, however, said it was required to act because of the extreme volatility in the markets, referring to SEC rules which force brokerages to hold a certain amount of capital as a ratio of outstanding trades. Given the unprecedented volume of trading occurring at the time, legal experts believe the company might have breached these net capital requirements had it not acted to stem the flow of trades and raise capital.

If enforcement action is unlikely, many believe last week's volatility could trigger a shake-up of rules that were largely written in the era before commission-free trading and widespread use of internet message boards.

"We saw what happened when social media arrived at the US Capitol," said Jill Fisch, professor of business law at the University of Pennsylvania, referring to the mob attack in Washington DC earlier this month. "Now we are seeing what happens when social media arrives in capital markets, and regulators will have to respond."

Bloomberg Law: LSE's Schwimmer Expects EU to Give Clearing Equivalence to U.K.

By Viren Vaghela

- CEO's view is at odds with EU-based politicians, officials
- London bourse completed its $27 billion Refinitiv deal Friday

London Stock Exchange Group Plc's chief said he expects the British capital to remain Europe's center for clearing trades, despite warnings from Brussels officials and governments on the continent.

David Schwimmer said LSE's LCH unit, which cleared $1.1 quadrillion of swaps last year, remains a critical element of the European Union's financial infrastructure even after Brexit. Given the prospect of business bleeding to New York instead of Frankfurt, he's hopeful that the EU will extend access approval beyond June 2022, when a temporary transition arrangement expires.

"In the past few years, we have seen repeated decisions of temporary recognition, recognizing the importance of LCH," he said in an interview Friday after the LSE announced the completion of its blockbuster deal for Refinitiv. "We look forward to working with EU authorities to get permanent recognition."

EU politicians have been vocal in demanding that companies shift euro clearing out of London and into the 27-nation bloc. They have achieved some success, with Eurex in Frankfurt increasing its share of euro clearing to 19%. But business may be moving to the U.S., which has had EU equivalence recognition since 2016.

The potential trickle to New York strengthens the U.K.'s chances of securing its own agreement. Schwimmer said that the trillions in derivatives trading that has moved to the U.S. from London this year was "an unintended consequence," and it's "not in the EU's interest."

Finance Center

He said LSE was comfortable about staying based in London given the city's position as a global financial center, with "a practical and effective regulatory regime and a critical mass of expertise."

Schwimmer also addressed the government's potential revamp of stock-listing requirements, which comes as some observers complain that technology IPOs are passing London by. The review should enable London to maintain high standards of corporate governance while addressing changes to the market and the desires of companies listing stock, he said.

The "free float" requirement that a quarter of a London-listed company's stock be in the public's hands is too high, Schwimmer said. "Many other markets take a very different approach."

He also said investors and companies are interested in LSE-listed special purpose acquisition companies. SPACs have seen a boom across the Atlantic, and some observers also want looser rules for those blank-check companies.

Refinitiv Integration

As the Refinitiv deal was finally completed Friday, Schwimmer said that he's now turning his mind to integrating his signature acquisition. The $27 billion transaction, which gained EU approval this month, gives LSE global scale amid surging demand for data and analytics.

The sealed deal marks a departure from a series of failed transactions involving major stock exchanges. In 2017, a tentative plan to combine LSE and Deutsche Boerse AG aimed to create a European champion but was vetoed by regulators for diminishing competition.

LSE-Refinitiv will be a trading powerhouse across fixed income, currencies, equities and derivatives. It will generate about 70% of revenues from data, up from LSE's current 40%, according to Bloomberg Intelligence. The parent company of Bloomberg News competes with Refinitiv to provide financial news, data and information.

The deal's completion comes at the end of a frantic week for markets. Retail traders in the U.S., often young and active on social media and new mobile-trading platforms, have sparked mammoth share-price spikes. Schwimmer said market regulators will need to study the current episode.

"Sometimes it's positive disruption, sometimes negative disruption created by new technology and new social forces," Schwimmer said.

Bloomberg Law: LSE's Refinitiv Bid Faces Tough EU Probe on Data, Trading

By Aoife White and Stephanie Bodoni

London Stock Exchange Group Plc faces an extended European Union probe into its planned $27 billion takeover of data provider Refinitiv as regulators raised a raft of competition concerns over the tie-up.

The European Commission set a deadline of Oct. 27 to rule on the deal, flagging potential issues ranging from the companies' combined control of financial data and the effect the deal could have on trading and clearing of bonds and derivatives.

Regulators also cited in an emailed statement concerns over "a very large combined market share" in the electronic trading of European government bonds on LSE's MTS and Refinitiv's Tradeweb.

"If I was David Schwimmer I'd be thinking this is the worst possible outcome," said Niki Beattie, founder at Market Structure Partners, referring to the LSE chief executive officer. "LSE might have been hoping the EC might have gone after one element but they have gone after three." Merger officials have "hit every aspect of what this deal is about. It is also not clear what could be given up" to easily satisfy regulators "as the entities are inter-related," Beattie said.

The closely watched deal review could set a precedent for future mergers as exchange groups seek to diversify business models away from volatile trading revenues and into lucrative data and subscription services. Scrutiny of the deal comes as EU Competition Commission Margrethe Vestager has expressed concerns about how some companies can amass data and become gatekeepers for an industry.

The EU said in Monday's statement it will also scrutinize trading and clearing of interest-rate derivatives, consolidated real-time datafeeds and desktop solutions as well as index licensing citing the possibility that rivals could be shut out from accessing important Refinitiv data.

'Competitive Terms'

"It is key for a well functioning financial market to ensure that market participants continue to have access to financial market infrastructure and financial data products on competitive terms," Vestager said in the statement. She said the probe will assess whether combining the activities of LSE and Refinitiv "would negatively affect competition in these markets."

LSE said it "continues to engage constructively" with the commission and remains "committed to closing the transaction in 2020.”

Schwimmer has previously refused to discuss potential divestments and said in February that he didn't expect Borsa Italiana's important position in the group to change. Borsa Italiana owns the MTS bond platform.

The EU frequently demands the sale of overlapping businesses to prevent a merged entity from becoming too powerful and has been unafraid of wielding its ultimate threat to veto deals. While longer scrutiny raises the potential risk of blocking a deal, it can also be beneficial by allowing companies to argue for fewer concessions, or to hammer out more complicated divestments or changes to licensing or distribution.

The EU said its initial investigation shows LSE and Refinitiv seem to be close competitors on government-bond trading, particularly between dealers and investors. It could be difficult for a new trading venue to start up and attract enough clients to rival existing platforms.

Regulators flagged high barriers to entry for interest-rate derivative trading and clearing, where customers rarely switch trading venues or clearing houses. The EU said it will investigate “the competitive dynamics in trading and clearing of exchange-traded funds and foreign exchange instruments.”

The EU also has “preliminary concerns” that rivals for consolidated real-time data feeds and desktop services could be shut out from accessing LSE's input data.

Refinitiv offers products including the Eikon terminals, the FXall platform and trading execution system Redi. Bloomberg LP, the parent of Bloomberg News, competes with Refinitiv to provide financial news, data and information.

FT: Buffered ETF Popularity Surges but Regulatory Hurdle Threatens

The products reduce risk, but there are calls to 'bundle' them with leveraged and inverse ETPs

By Steve Johnson

Risk-reducing buffered ETFs that aim to take some of the danger out of investing in stock markets enjoyed a banner year in 2020 with a surge in the number of launches and assets under management.

However, a push by a grouping of the exchange traded fund industry's biggest players could potentially derail the fast-growing sector by stripping funds of their designation as ETFs.

Buffered, or defined outcome, ETFs provide investors with a degree of downside protection if the stock market falls. In return, investors give up some of the potential gains, only receiving the return of the underlying index up to a fixed, preset cap if it rises over the contract period.

The most recent monthly edition of the Innovator S&P 500 Power Buffer ETF (PJAN), for example, launched on January 2, protected investors against the first 15 per cent of any loss over the subsequent 12 months, in return for any gains being capped at 9.75 per cent. The cap and protection change every time the ETF resets.

Buffered funds enjoyed a breakthrough year in 2020, with 65 launches (up from the previous record of 19 in 2019) accounting for more than 20 per cent of all ETF debuts in the US, according to data from FactSet.

Early movers such as Innovator ETF, First Trust, Pacer and TrueShares have been joined by an insurance company arm — Allianz Investment Management — for the first time, which has been managing similar strategies in an insurance wrapper for decades.

Total buffered ETF assets have surged from $300m to $5bn in the past 12 months, according to Allianz.

John Southard, co-founder and chief investment officer of Innovator Capital Management, the early industry leader with about $3.5bn of assets in defined outcome ETFs, said take-up was driven in part by extremely low bond yields.

“It's for the investor who says ‘I want to stay invested in the market but I want some downside buffer in place. Maybe I'm late in my investing cycle. I'm withdrawing money from my retirement account, so I can't afford a big downdraft,’” said Mr Southard, who with Bruce Bond, chief executive, co-founded PowerShares, which later became Invesco's ETF arm.

Yet the tried and tested formula of a 60/40 portfolio of equities and bonds has become less attractive as “bond yields are so low, people don’t want 40 per cent of their portfolio in something yielding 1-2 per cent so advisers are having to look for alternatives”, said Mr Southard. Amid record high markets, investors “scared” of a market crash are also potential buyers, he said.

Johan Grahn, vice-president, portfolio management at Allianz IM said it had seen a “tremendous reception to the ETFs”, since the rollout of its initial buffered fund in June heralded the German insurance company’s first-ever foray into ETFs.

“We have many decades of managing these strategies for the insurance side of the business,” said Mr Grahn. “We manage $150bn of risk around the world and a lot of the underlying structures are the same as for the ETFs.

“We are now taking some of that expertise that we have built up over time and building that into an ETF.”

Mr Grahn said defined outcome ETFs were “solving an age-old problem in a very elegant way” in that it allowed a “de-risking of equity exposure”, and their arrival was “a function of the ETF market evolving”.

“The market really earned its spurs in 2020. These strategies held up really well in [the market sell-off] in March. That was a gift to the industry,” said Mr Grahn, whose ETFs have so far attracted $135m of assets.

So far, buffered ETFs are only available in the US.

Mr Southard said Innovator had preliminary discussions about launching products in Europe but, given the bank-dominated distribution model in parts of the continent, had decided to focus on the US.

Thus far, most products are based on US equity indices, although Innovator has three further ETFs linked, respectively, to developed market equities ex-US, emerging markets and US investment grade bonds.

Further growth could be slowed, however, if a grouping of the ETF industry’s most powerful players gets its way.

The asset managers have proposed that buffered ETFs should lose the “ETF” designation, and instead be called exchange traded instruments, a move that could slow their take-up in an investor community that has become familiar with the ETF label.

The consortium of BlackRock, State Street, Vanguard, Charles Schwab, Fidelity Investments and Invesco, which between them control more than 90 per cent of the US ETF market, wrote to US regulators last year calling for “clearer identification and categorisation of exchange traded products”.

Specifically, it argued that “certain ETPs with complex structures and/or certain embedded risks” should be categorised as exchange traded notes (ETNs) commodities (ETCs) or instruments (ETIs) rather than as ETFs.

“Investors need to know with one click what type of instrument they are buying,” said Anna Paglia, global head of ETFs and indexed strategies at Invesco.

“ETFs were created as plain vanilla types of vehicles to get exposure to market returns, but the market has evolved dramatically. Right now we have a variety of instruments that go by the name ETFs.”

However buffered ETF providers are unhappy that, under the proposals, the vehicles would be rebranded as ETIs alongside leveraged and inverse ETFs, which use derivatives to increase risk, rather than reduce it.

Mr Grahn pointed out the products would be harder to market “if you have to put a different label on it and explain it”.

“We don’t want to be unfairly put in a category that would create confusion,” said Mr Southard. “Just because we have options in our portfolios does not mean we have additional risk. In fact we are lower risk.”

WSJ: SEC to Review Brokers’ Restrictions on GameStop, AMC Trading

Securities regulators say they are on the lookout for potentially manipulative trading

By Dave Michaels

Securities regulators said Friday they plan to closely review the actions of some brokerage firms that restricted investors' ability to trade volatile stocks such as GameStop Corp. GME 67.87% this week.

The Securities and Exchange Commission's statement on Friday is the clearest indication yet that regulators are examining potential misconduct around the trading mania that swamped stocks such as GameStop, AMC Entertainment Holdings Inc. AMC 53.65% and Novavax Inc. NVAX 64.87% Robinhood Markets Inc. restricted investors' ability to purchase shares in GameStop and 12 other companies on Thursday as it dealt with the impact on its financial requirements of a surge in trading.

Robinhood raised $1 billion to shore up its ability to clear and execute trades in those popular and volatile stocks, which the broker on Friday allowed clients to resume trading.

Regulators also said they are on the lookout for potentially manipulative trading. This week's sharp price swings have been aided by bullish individual traders communicating on websites such as Reddit's WallStreetBets about which shares to buy. Traders drove up demand for stocks that other investors such as hedge funds had bet against, resulting in a "short squeeze" that ramped up the prices of GameStop more than 10-fold.

"We will act to protect retail investors when the facts demonstrate abusive or manipulative trading activity that is prohibited by the federal securities laws," the SEC said in a statement issued by its four commissioners. "Market participants should be careful to avoid such activity."

Some securities lawyers say the commentary and coordination apparent on WallStreetBets could be grounds for a market-manipulation case. The SEC has declined to say whether it has opened a formal enforcement investigation of this week's trading. Manipulation cases are generally difficult for the SEC to bring because they require showing that stock promoters or traders misled the market through statements or the pattern of their transactions.

The SEC's statement also said it wants public input about the "structure and operation" of markets. Some commentators have questioned why novice investors are able to trade using borrowed money or purchase options contracts that allow them to speculate more cheaply than buying shares.

The surge of retail participation through platforms such as Robinhood's has also revealed the market's strong dependence on high-speed trading firms, which execute many orders for the retail brokers. Brokers that route investors' orders to Susquehanna International Group LLP and Wolverine Trading LLC had difficulty connecting to the firms on Wednesday and routed their trades elsewhere, people familiar with the matter said.

FT: Robinhood's Bid To 'Democratise Finance' Collides with Wall St Reality

An urgent dash for cash and a rebuke from loyal users highlight strains for online broker Miles Kruppa, Madison Darbyshire and Philip Stafford

Robinhood's ambition to "democratise finance" is set for one of its biggest tests after a week of chaotic trading that pushed it to seek an urgent injection of $1bn and infuriated many of its most loyal clients.

The tumult has exposed the competing priorities the popular trading app faces between pleasing its users and the realities of operating in the heavily regulated financial industry.

The battle between individual investors and Wall Street hedge funds that reached a peak last Thursday sent shockwaves through the Silicon Valley company that has come to exemplify the new breed of organised groups of day traders with access to sophisticated tools.

Frenetic trading in shares such as GameStop and AMC rippled across the US brokerage industry, causing a cascade of equities and options trading curbs that drew the ire of many individual investors who felt the platforms were limiting their success, and the scrutiny of Wall Street's top regulator.

Many brokers faced a sudden surge in requests for cash from clearing houses — important institutions in the financial system that ensure trades are settled in an orderly manner and prevent the failure of one company to make good on its commitments from threatening the broader securities trading market.

A tumultuous Thursday

The demands were particularly acute for Robinhood. Named after the legendary outlaw in English folklore, the California-based broker has claimed to trace its ambitions to “democratise finance” to the Occupy Wall Street movement in 2011.

Chief executive Vlad Tenev revealed late on Sunday California time that the National Securities Clearing Corporation, an equities clearing house, had requested margin deposits of about $3bn at 3am Pacific time on Thursday. He described that amount as “an order of magnitude more than what it typically is”. Later, the NSCC reduced the demand to $700m, Mr Tenev said on social media app Clubhouse.

“I think the one thing that is maybe not clear to people is Robinhood is a participant in the financial system,” Mr Tenev said. “We have to work with all of these counterparties.”

The NSCC could not immediately be reached for comment outside business hours in the US, but said last week it did not comment on requirements of individual members.

Ribbit Capital, one of Robinhood’s early investors, stepped forward on Thursday to lead a new round of convertible debt financing. Iconiq Capital, another existing investor, joined Ribbit, and the two firms together wired more than $500m to the company, said people familiar with the financing. Robinhood simultaneously drew down more than $500m from credit lines with major banks, underscoring the group’s abrupt and significant need for cash.

One person close to the company said it satisfied the demands from the clearing house before the cash from investors was delivered to its account.

By late in the day on Thursday, Robinhood revealed it had commitments from existing investors to inject more than $1bn to fortify the group’s balance sheet. The investors have the option of converting their debt investment into equity at either a valuation for the company of about $30bn or a 30 per cent discount to an eventual initial public offering price, whichever is lower, said people familiar with the fundraising.

The deal represented a relatively low-risk bet on the future of Robinhood, though it could prove costly to the company if it undershoots its targeted valuation in an IPO. Private investors most recently valued Robinhood at $11.7bn last year.

Robinhood said the investment was a “strong sign of confidence from investors that will help us continue to further serve our customers”.

‘You can only be disruptive to a point’

Robinhood’s cash crunch and the dealmaking that ensued illustrate the difficult balancing act facing the company, which has come to fame through its pledge to liberate individuals from commissions commonly charged by established rivals.

“Robinhood has taken a ‘move fast and break things’ approach to financial services, but financial services is a highly regulated industry where you can’t break things,” said Brennan Hawken, an analyst at UBS.

Robinhood’s decision last week to restrict trading on certain popular shares, without initially providing detailed information on what had happened behind the scenes, triggered an avalanche of criticism from investors.

Many retail investors on r/WallStreetBets said they felt betrayed by Robinhood’s decision. Investors took to the channel to co-ordinate mass “reviewing”, where users gave Robinhood one-star reviews in major app stores, as well as to promote new competitors in commission-free trading, such as Public and WeBull.

The backlash is part, analysts say, a failure of messaging, creating expectations of disruption that were undermined when Robinhood had to act like an established brokerage.

“We would be at least as worried by the reputational damage as we would feel short-term excitement by the trading volumes and the publicity,” said James Anderson, manager of Baillie Gifford’s Scottish Mortgage Investment Trust, and early backer of fast-growing tech companies such as Tesla and Amazon.

Larry Tabb, head of market structure at Bloomberg Intelligence, added: “You can only be disruptive to a certain point, because at the end of the day, you’re one side of a trade.”

Mr Tenev acknowledged last week that the firm was caught off-guard by the “lightning-fast” speed with which social media spread information and created such an intense jolt of trading.

Robinhood may struggle to hold on to its outsider identity as it is forced to play by the rules, industry participants say.

"In the late 90s you couldn't throw a stone without hitting a new online brokerage," said Mr Tabb. "What happened to these guys is they eventually realised the market is bigger than traders . . . They all got gobbled up. Now they look like traditional financial conglomerates."

WSJ Robinhood Needed $3 Billion to Shore Up Volatile Trading in GameStop, Other Stocks

CEO Vlad Tenev explained in an interview alongside Tesla boss Elon Musk why the brokerage blocked users from trading

By Anna Hirtenstein

Robinhood Markets Inc. blocked trading of volatile stocks such as GameStop GME 67.87% last week after a clearinghouse asked for $3 billion to back up the trades, the trading app's chief executive said in an interview posted online.

Robinhood and other brokers experienced a deluge of demand from users to invest in a handful of popular stocks and options contracts. Wild moves in the value of those stocks and options prompted clearinghouses that process and settle trades to demand increased cash collateral to insulate themselves from possible losses.

"The request was around $3 billion, which is, you know, about an order of magnitude more than what it typically is," Robinhood Chief Executive Vlad Tenev said. He spoke Sunday night in an interview alongside Tesla boss Elon Musk on a live stream of Clubhouse, an invitation-only social networking app popular in Silicon Valley.

A Robinhood spokesman didn't immediately respond to a request for comment about the online interview.

Robinhood blocked trading in more than a dozen stocks and related options on Thursday. It loosened restrictions Friday but still allowed only limited trading. Mr. Tenev said the trading app will be able to further relax the "stringent position limits" on the securities on Monday after last week's capital raise.

In a post on its website Sunday, the popular online brokerage said it narrowed the list of limited stocks down to eight. But there were still some limits to trading. For GameStop, the most tightly-restricted stock, users could just buy one share and five option contracts.

Robinhood clears trades through the National Securities Clearing Corporation, a subsidiary of the Depository Trust & Clearing Corporation, which is owned by a consortium of banks, broker-dealer firms and other financial institutions.

By restricting users from trading the most volatile stocks, the company was able to lower its deposit bill to the DTCC by $700 million, which it then paid, Mr. Tenev said. On Thursday, Robinhood raised over $1 billion from investors. It also borrowed $500 million from banks last week.

Robinhood is a popular avenue for individual investors on Reddit's WallStreetBets forum to buy and sell stocks, particularly as it doesn't charge transaction fees. Robinhood came under fire for its restrictions on trading last week, attracting attention from lawmakers such as Alexandria Ocasio-Cortez and Ted Cruz who tweeted against the move.

In the online interview, Mr. Musk, questioned the motive behind Robinhood retail trading limits, asking whether hedge funds had pressured the company or wielded influence at the DTCC.

"I don't have any reason to believe that, then you're getting into conspiracy theories," Mr. Tenev responded.

Citing confidentiality rules, a DTCC spokeswoman declined to comment directly about Robinhood's margin requirement.

"Certain securities, including GME, AMC and others, have experienced extreme volatility that have generated substantial risk exposures at firms that clear these trades at NSCC," she said in an emailed statement.

"Margin requirements protect the entire industry against defaults and systemic risk in volatile markets," the spokeswoman said, declining to comment on Robinhood's margin requirement.

Dean Kearney,

Greetings from the CFTC. It is great to see someone of your background leading one of the nation's top Catholic law schools. Earlier in my career, I clerked for Justice Thomas (b)(6) I was wondering if you happen to have 10-15 minutes at some point this week for a brief conversation of a personal nature.

Thanks for considering my request.

POLITICO Pro: Tarbert Wants CFTC to Revive Less-Stringent Oversight

By Zachary Warmbrodt

New CFTC Chairman Heath Tarbert said today that his agency, the nation's primary derivatives regulator, should return to "principles-based" oversight that would entail a more flexible attitude to policing financial markets.

In a Fox Business op-ed, Tarbert said the CFTC had traditionally taken the less-stringent approach. In his view, that allowed U.S. derivatives markets to evolve to meet the demands of the economy while enabling the agency to respond to major developments.

"Reinvigorating our historical principles-based approach, where appropriate, will help our markets remain fair, innovative, and vibrant," he said.

Tarbert's op-ed is a change of tack from the way the CFTC took on regulation of derivatives trading after the 2008 financial crisis and the enactment of the 2010 Dodd-Frank law. The landmark law led to the imposition of dozens of new rules on off-exchange swaps that had helped fuel the Wall Street meltdown.

"Today the CFTC and the derivatives markets are at a crossroads," Tarbert said. "More than a decade after the financial crisis, the agency is still working to implement Dodd-Frank, which established a framework for regulating swaps. But we must not allow our response to the last crisis to plant the seeds of the next, nor let it smother innovative technologies. Instead of taking the 'ready, fire, aim' approach all too common in Washington, I am building the CFTC's agenda with an open mind."

Tarbert said in the op-ed that it will be a top priority of his to resist foreign regulatory creep into American clearinghouses after Brexit.

Another priority will be finishing a Dodd-Frank rule intended to limit derivatives speculation in certain commodity markets. "The trick will be making sure these rules do not strip those markets of the flexibility needed to perform their fundamental risk-management functions," he said.

Coinspeaker: Bakkt to Launch Its Bitcoin Futures Exchange in Q3 2019

By Staff

Bitcoin futures contracts platform Bakkt is determined to launch its services in the third quarter of this year and gaining approval from the NYDFS would allow it to operate as a limited-purpose firm.

The long-awaited launch of the cryptocurrency exchange subsidiary by the Intercontinental Exchange (ICE) Bakkt, could happen in Q3.

The Bitcoin futures contracts platform is however still waiting for the approval of the New York Department of Financial Services (NYDFS) in order to operate their so-called Bakkt Warehouse, which would allow Bakkt to work as a limited-purpose trust company.

If it's approved, Bakkt Warehouse should serve as a qualified Bitcoin custodian that supports its physically delivered futures.

One trading executive, who requested to remain anonymous said that the future is different from the warehouse, but the product depends on the warehouse.

In the document published in May this year, the company said they had provided the regulated infrastructure for traders to deliver and receive Bitcoin for dollars in standardized settlement cycles. The futures contracts will be cleared by ICE Clear U.S. and will be compliant with CFTC regulations.

And while Bakkt is finally near its platform launch, there are some people in the industry that are saying there are some issues that might get in the way.

Some of them think that the company's move is too risky, claiming that the guaranty fund set by the company is too small to cover positions at risk. ICE will only reportedly contribute $35 million to start the fund for losses related to Bitcoin contracts.

Ricky Li, co-founder of trading firm Altonomy says that while guaranty funds are usually required and administered by a state as a safeguard for if insurers are unable to pay policyholders, what Bakkt does isn't normal practice in the clearing risk management system.

He compared the size of Bakkt's funds, which have around $400 million in open positions at risk with its $35 million guaranty fund. Bakkt, however, seems to acknowledge this inflated risk, because, in the materials provided by ICE, it explains that there are plans to increase the guaranty fund over time, after the launch.

They agree that it was low, but not "alarmingly" so and that the plan is still good enough to attract traders like themselves. Li compared it with other popular exchanges like BMX for which he said, has minimal transparency for their consumer protections.

Let's not forget that last week Bakkt's Bitcoin Futures launched the user acceptance tests. The mission is to support the development of trusted infrastructure for securely transacting in the new market for digital assets. From the company, they said this launch ushers in a new standard for accessing crypto markets.

Bakkt itself hasn't had an easy way to the top. First time the launch was due last November. Then, problems getting the project past regulators showed up and the launch suffered further delays in January that was also delayed. The United States Commodity Futures Trading Commission reportedly caused delays by conducting an investigation regarding regulatory compliance and potential market impact.

One thing is however sure. Bakkt will draw resources from some big companies with knowledge in fields of risk management and technology to create a federally regulated platform. Once investors feel at ease trading in regulated environment volatility should smoothen.

Also, by providing a qualified custodian for cryptocurrencies, Bakkt could enable various institutional investors to make investments in the crypto asset class.

Cointelegraph: US Commodity Futures Trading Commission Rehires Advisor From Coinbase

By Max Boddy

The United States Commodity Futures Trading Commission (CFTC) has announced that it is hiring Andrew L. Ridenour as senior counsel to the chairman. Up until recently, Ridenour worked at the major cryptocurrency exchange Coinbase. CFTC Chairman Tarbert unveiled Ridenour and others as new hires on July 17, commenting that the "counsel and expertise of my team will be essential to our efforts to keep our derivatives markets vibrant and hold wrongdoers accountable."

Who is Andrew Ridenour?

According to Ridenour's LinkedIn profile, he worked at the CFTC for 9 years as special counsel at the Division of Market Oversight and senior trial attorney. Ridenour then took a hiatus from the government to work for the crypto exchange Coinbase as counsel for institutional products for a little over a year and a half, before returning to the CFTC.

While at Coinbase, Ridenour apparently developed legal structures and business plans for the exchange's trading and custodial services. Now rejoining the CFTC, he will reportedly offer legal and policy counsel to the chairman pertaining to the futures and derivatives markets.

Ridenour holds postgraduate degrees in both law and international relations, with a J.D. from Tulane University Law School as well as an M.A. from Tulane University.

New chairman, new regime?

As previously reported by Cointelegraph, Heath Tarbert was sworn in as the CFTC's chair just two weeks ago. His predecessor, J. Christopher Giancarlo — AKA the "Crypto Dad" — was regarded as a pro-cryptocurrency regulator. Tarbert's views on cryptocurrency, on the other hand, are more unknown as of yet.

Tarbert holds a Ph.D. in comparative law from Oxford and has worked for Supreme Court Justice Clarence Thomas. Talbert has also worked as Assistant Secretary of the Treasury for International Markets and Development under President Trump, as well as for the secretary for international affairs.

FT: Deutsche Bank Sets Deadline for Equity Derivatives Sale

Co-head of German lender's bad bank expects bids in September as it seeks to dispose of assets

By Laura Noonan, Stephen Morris and Olaf Storbeck

Deutsche Bank has set a September deadline for bids on the vast portfolio of equity derivatives it is selling, as the struggling lender looks to expedite a key part of its ambitious restructuring.

The derivatives are among the assets earmarked for disposal in Deutsche's bad bank, which it is relying on to free €10bn to help foot the bill for the overhaul as well fund investments in technology, compliance and control functions.

The so-called capital release unit, or CRU — the second non-core unit Deutsche has created since the financial crisis — stands in contrast to traditional “bad banks” which have often been used for defaulting property loans and other toxic assets. Alongside equity derivatives, Deutsche's CRU includes cash equities that it is looking to offload as well as interest-rate trades with poor returns.

“We've had a huge amount of interest, people saying they want to be part of the auction process, and expect to start getting firm bids in September,” Ashley Wilson, the co-head of the CRU told the Financial Times in his first public comments since taking the role. The bank will begin auctioning the equity derivatives portfolio in the middle of next month.

The bank has wound down almost all of its cash equities positions, Mr Wilson added, despite only announcing it would close the trading business three weeks ago. The business is one of the casualties of Deutsche chief executive Christian Sewing's effort to refocus the struggling lender on its German retail operations and banking services to corporate Europe.

The cash equities business has already been “de-risked” after the bank exited block positions with its clients and eliminated its central risk books, which it uses to offset risks both for customers and itself. French rival BNP Paribas is in talks to buy Deutsche's prime broking business, as well as its electronic equities platform.

A senior investment banker at rival to Deutsche Bank said there was “a lot of appetite” for the German lender's assets, with international banks, private equity firms and hedge funds all considering the portfolio. “Quite a few people who are very well funded are looking for yield,” he added. “The big question obviously will be the price.”

However, any sales of equity derivatives will probably take months to complete as buyers must complete the arduous process of taking over individual client accounts. Deutsche has said that it plans to sell or run down 60 per cent of the CRU holdings by the end of 2019, but has not given timetables for specific assets.

Mr Wilson's division, which he co-heads with Louise Kitchen, also has around €80bn of fixed-income assets. Mr Wilson said those assets had been “categorised and prioritised and we are close to completing the de-risking strategy for each asset class”.

A former Deutsche executive said the volume of fixed-income assets was “a shock” since “there is literally nothing left from before the financial crisis, these are positions the bank created in the last three or four years”, adding this suggested that Deutsche was “still doing really risky, toxic deals post-crisis”.

Bankers at rival firms said fixed-income assets are harder to offload because they are typically more complex and require agreement from more parties. At the same time, the capital rules that have made these fixed-income assets less appealing for Deutsche also render them less attractive to potential bidders.

The CRU is staffed by thousands of employees from Deutsche's equities division, who now have the task of unwinding the business they sought to build up.

So far only a few hundred employees from the equities division have been let go in London and New York, with bigger waves of lay-offs expected to come in “tranches” as the bank offloads portfolios. Those looking for new jobs are required to declare talks with potential employers and to recuse themselves from deals with those counterparties.

Risk.Net: Basis Swaps Spike Amid US Rates Chatter

Budgetary wrangling and talk of Fed cuts spark Libor-OIS basis shift

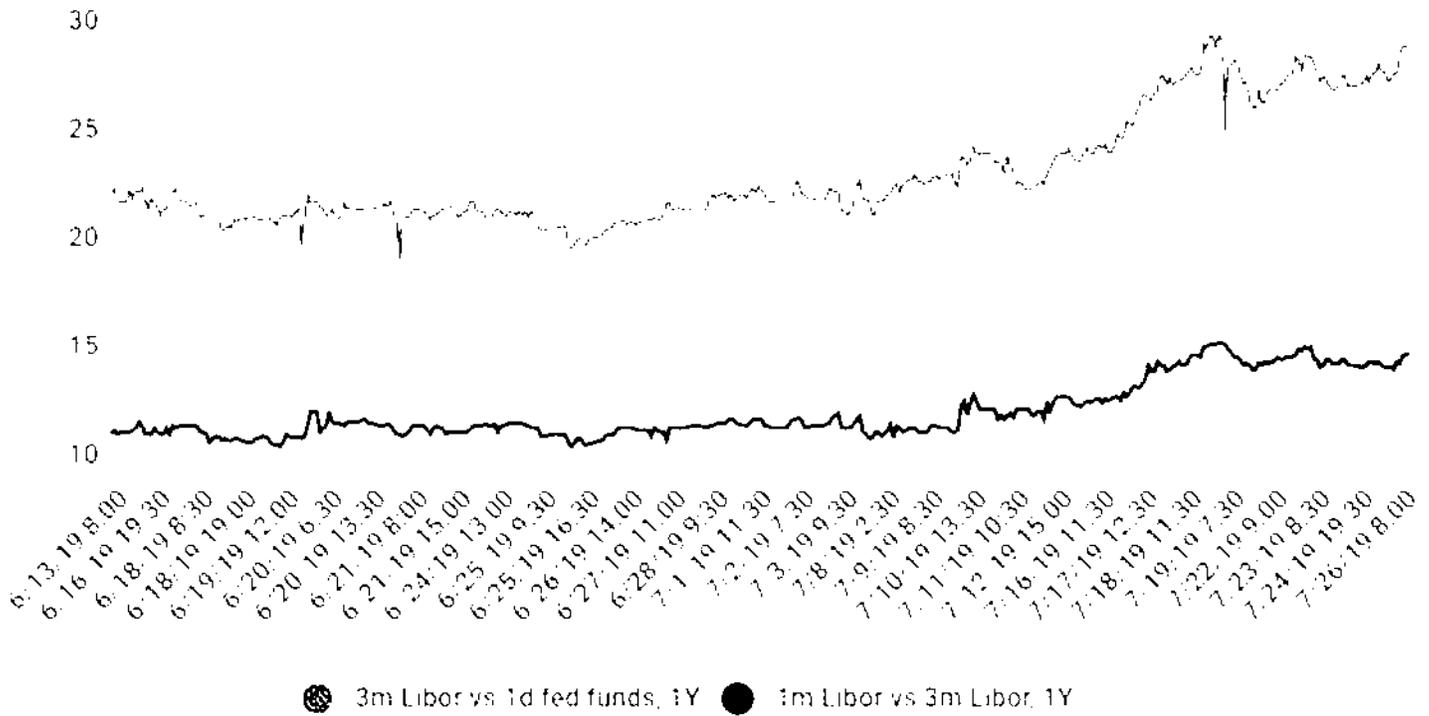

By Ben St Clair

Traded volumes of US dollar basis swaps surged to nine-month highs in July as firms reacted to rising uncertainty in the rates market, with one dealer said to have traded upwards of $30 billion in swaps alone.

Strategists point to recent statements from officials at the US Federal Reserve and news of a debt ceiling compromise as contributing factors to the widening basis between Libor and overnight index swap rates, which led to a subsequent surge in swap trading, but disagree on their relative significance.

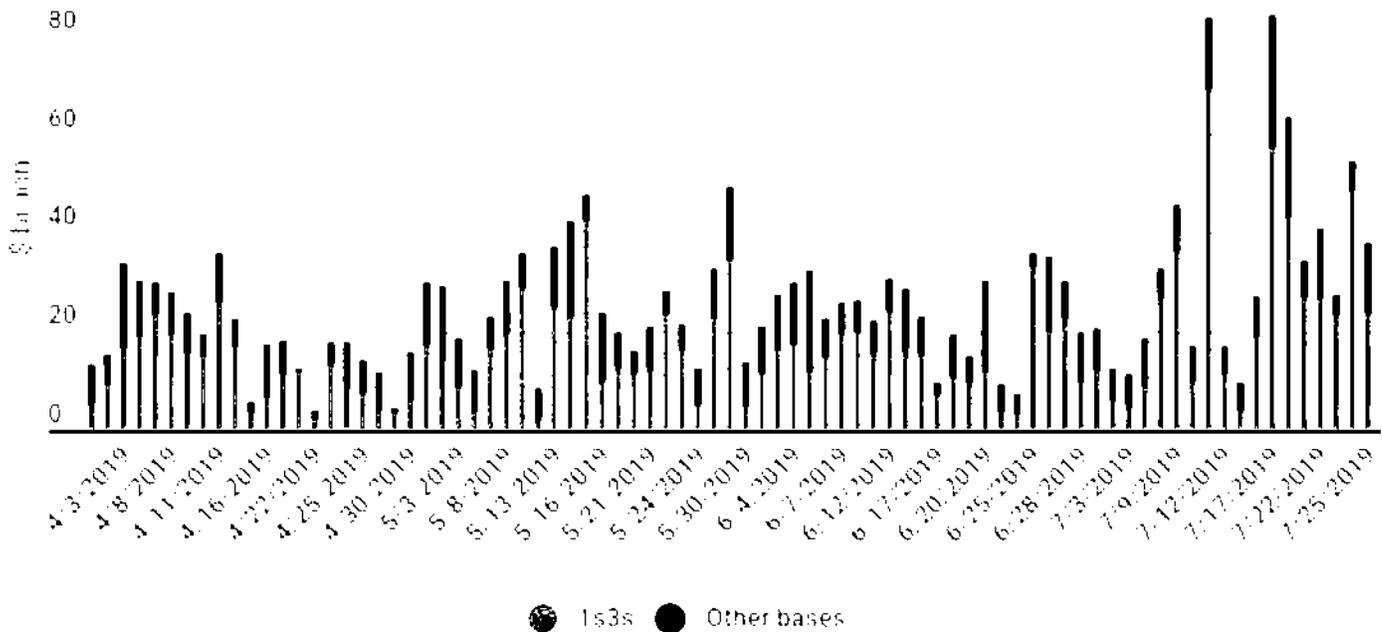

“The path of Fed policy is no doubt influencing the story. But I think that the bigger and more persistent driver here are expectations for tighter overall US dollar funding conditions, higher general collateral repo rates and how that spills over into Libor,” says Mark Cabana, head of US rates strategy at BofA Securities.

More than $80 billion of basis swaps were traded on July 11 and again on July 17, followed by $64 billion on July 18, compared to daily average volumes of $27 billion in 2019 to date. Traders use basis swaps to hedge floating rate exposure in different tenors or for speculative reasons.

As has been the case on average this year, more than half of the volumes were seen in the one-month/three-month Libor basis swap market, also known as 1s3s swaps. The 1s3s basis peaked just short of 16 basis points on July 18, from roughly 12bp just over a week earlier.

Observers say this basis market moved because it is correlated with the forward rate agreement/overnight index swap (FRA-OIS) spread, which represents the difference between short-dated Libor and overnight funding rates. This spread widened as well.

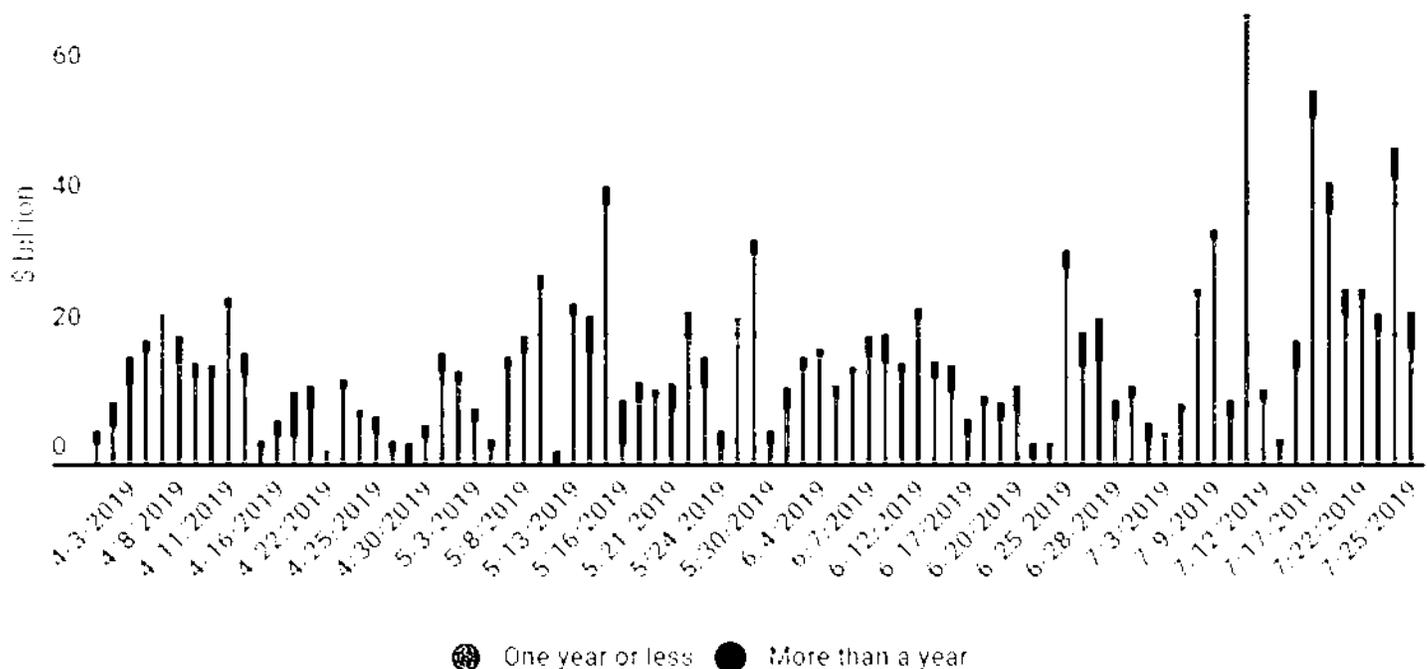

The over-the-counter 1s3s trades are attractive to banks looking to hedge cashflows and liability offsets, as well as hedge funds speculating on the shape of the Libor curve.

The increases in daily volume are the result of more speculative trading, as market participants bet on where the basis will end up, strategists believe.

Traders looking to use 1s3s for hedging generally prefer longer dated swaps, says Praveen Korapaty, chief interest rates strategist at Goldman Sachs. "They're usually looking at a five-year basis swap, a 10-year basis swap, or something along those lines. Activity at the very front end is probably dominated by fast money accounts."

Trading on high volume days – July 11, 17 and 18 – saw a higher proportion of shorter-dated 1s3s swaps than the average day this year.

Source: DTCC

A surge in notional volumes could also reflect the fact that taking risk on short-dated swaps requires a higher notional to match an equivalent longer-dated swap's DV01, or the dollar value of a one point move in interest rates.

Cutting comments

The cause of the widening is a source of debate. Some believe dovish comments on July 18 by New York Fed president John Williams played a contributing role. Expectations of a deeper rate cut would put downward pressure on short-term rates while Treasury issuance keeps Libor high and widens the basis, says Subadra Rajappa, head of US rates strategy at Societe Generale.

Goldman's Korapaty agrees, saying talk of Fed cuts has been more of a factor driving recent spread volatility: "Some of the more recent volatility in the [Libor-OIS] spread has been the result of shifting perception of the timing and scale of Fed rate cuts," he says.

In any case, the 1s3s basis is moving in the wrong direction if Fed rate cuts are the whole story behind the surge of basis swaps, says BofA's Cabana. If rates were expected to move down in the coming months, the one-month rate would fall less than the three-month, leading to a tighter basis. "The [1s3s] basis should be negative or moving lower to reflect expectations for cuts in the future," he says.

A senior swaps trader at a large dealer claims a single bank was responsible for $25 billion–$30 billion of one day's 1s3s swap trading in anticipation of increased short-term Treasury issuance on the back of an agreement to raise the US debt ceiling. The Fed statements had "nothing to do with it. This is just the Treasuries," the trader says.

An increase in short-term Treasury issuance would crowd the market for collateral, pushing repo rates and Libor higher, according to Rajappa. A wider FRA-OIS and 1s3s basis would follow.

"Supply is coming, and the market is already preparing for it. It's pricing that type of pressure," says Cabana.

Korapaty believes any recent movement in the Libor-OIS spread is more influenced by the prospect of a rate cut than by increased supply of US Treasuries.

"Libor-OIS could see widening as a result of a sharp ramp-up in bill supply following the debt limit deal, but that's a story that hasn't seen quite the same swings that the Fed rate cut story has seen," he says.

Raise the volume

The first jump in traded notional of US dollar basis swaps – $83.9 billion on July 11, according to data from the Depository Trust & Clearing Corporation, nearly five times higher than the previous day – occurred on a day between two key market-moving events.

The previous day saw Fed chairman Jerome Powell's first day of congressional testimony, and the following day saw the release of Treasury secretary Steven Mnuchin's letter to congressional leaders notifying them the government could run out of money in early September, putting pressure on lawmakers to make a deal before heading into their summer recess.

The July 11 volume jump followed a roughly 16% widening in the 1s3s basis the day before.

A week later, on July 17 and 18, volumes jumped again to $84.2 billion and $63.7 billion, respectively. Each day came with its own set of news, and a double-digit per cent widening of the 1s3s basis.

On July 17, House speaker Nancy Pelosi said she wanted a vote on government spending and the debt ceiling before Congress recessed. The next day Treasury secretary Mnuchin said the Trump administration and congressional leaders had reached an agreement on a budget deal that would cover another two years of borrowing.

The July 18 speech by the New York Fed's Williams briefly raised investor bets for a 50 basis point cut in the Fed's target rate, according to the CME's FedWatch Tool. The New York Fed later backtracked on William's comments, saying they were not related to potential policy actions at the Fed's upcoming meeting.

Swap volumes last week declined slightly, and the 1s3s basis stands at roughly 15bp. The Fed's upcoming meeting takes place on July 30 and 31.

POLITICO Pro: Fed, FDIC Extend Living Will Deadline for Roughly 100 Banks

By Victoria Guida

The Federal Reserve and FDIC announced today that they are extending the living will filing deadline for about 100 foreign and domestic banks while they work to finalize a proposal that would set a new schedule for resolution plans. Barclays, Credit Suisse, Deutsche Bank and UBS will not have to file another full living will — under which they plan out how they would break up in the event of bankruptcy — until July 1, 2021. But they will have to submit limited plans by July 1 of next year "describing how they have addressed the shortcomings identified in December 2018 and providing updates concerning certain resolution projects."

The agencies also said 82 foreign banks had satisfactory living wills and won't have to file again until July 1, 2021, an extension also given to 15 domestic banks. "This extension will mitigate uncertainty around the banks' filing requirements while the agencies' April proposal to revise the resolution plan rule remains pending," they said in a press release.

The regulators requested more specific information in the next resolution plans from HSBC, BNP Paribas, Royal Bank of Canada, Banco Bilbao Vizcaya Argentaria, Bank of Montreal, Santander and TD Bank.

WSJ: More Exchanges Add 'Speed Bumps,' Defying High-Frequency Traders

Over a dozen financial markets are expected to have speed bumps or similar features by 2020

By Alexander Osipovich

High-frequency trading firms are hitting a growing number of "speed bumps" around the world—the latest blow to a business that has struggled in recent years.

Exchanges on both sides of the Atlantic are increasingly embracing the mechanisms, which impose a split-second delay before executing trades.

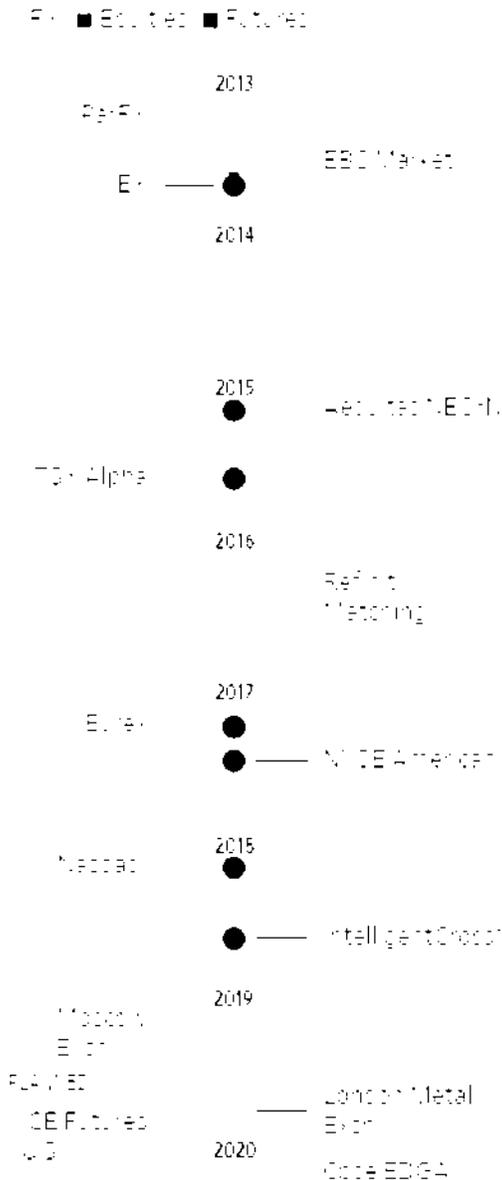

By 2020, more than a dozen markets in stocks, futures and currencies from Toronto to New York to Moscow will slow trading via speed bumps or similar features, if all of the currently planned launches occur. Five years ago, only a few markets had speed bumps.

Supporters say speed bumps can help thwart ultrafast strategies that hurt investors. Critics, including many electronic-trading firms, say they make markets unnecessarily complex and unfairly favor certain market participants.

Taking a Pause

More than 10 markets have added speed bumps and other features since 2013.

Speed-bump launches

Timeline of Speed-Bump Launches by Market. Includes BBG Market, Refinitiv Matching, IntelligentCross, London Metal Exch, Code EDGA.

By trying to blunt the impact of ultrafast trading, exchanges are defying high-speed trading giants that account for a huge portion of their volume, in a bid to appeal to more-traditional clients. Financial institutions such as banks and pension funds have long complained that high-frequency trading, or HFT, eats into their profits.

"It's finally boiled to the point where the exchanges started paying attention to what their clients are saying," said Roman Ginis, founder of IntelligentCross LLC, a startup U.S. stock-trading platform.

HFT firms make money through rapid-fire trading of stocks, futures and other assets. The industry is controversial, due to negative depictions in works such as Michael Lewis's book "Flash Boys." The traders say such portrayals are unfair and that HFT benefits investors.

The industry has consolidated in recent years as mounting costs for technology and market data have squeezed profits. Research firm Tabb Group estimates HFT firms' revenues from U.S. equities trading were $1.8 billion last year, down from $5.7 billion in 2010. Exact numbers are difficult to obtain because most HFT firms are private.

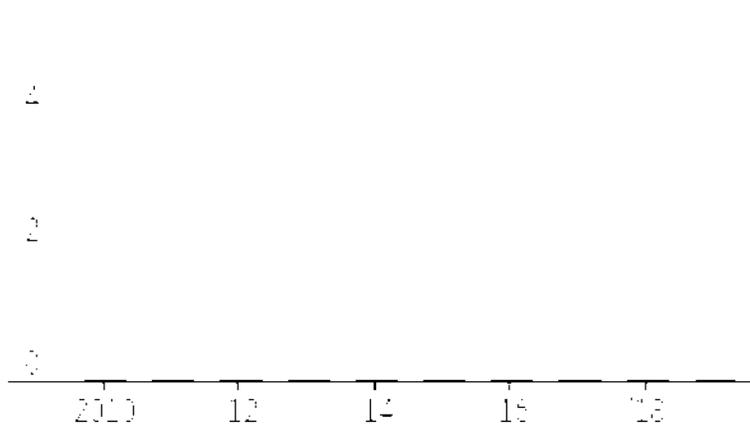

Among the exchanges set to debut their first speed bumps are the London Metal Exchange, which plans to add an eight-millisecond delay to gold and silver futures later this year. Chicago-based Cboe Global Markets Inc. CBOE -0.63% hopes to add a speed bump on its EDGA stock exchange in 2020, if it wins regulatory approval.

LME, Cboe and other markets adopting speed bumps say they want to neutralize “latency arbitrage,” a strategy in which a fast trader takes advantage of a moving price before other traders can react.

Suppose an investor has posted a quote to sell shares of Ford Motor Co. at $10.00, and the price is about to tick up to $10.01. An HFT firm might buy Ford shares from that investor just before the price rises, then immediately sell them, earning a one-cent-a-share profit. Such firms use sophisticated algorithms and fast data-transmission networks to forecast small price changes and act on them quickly.

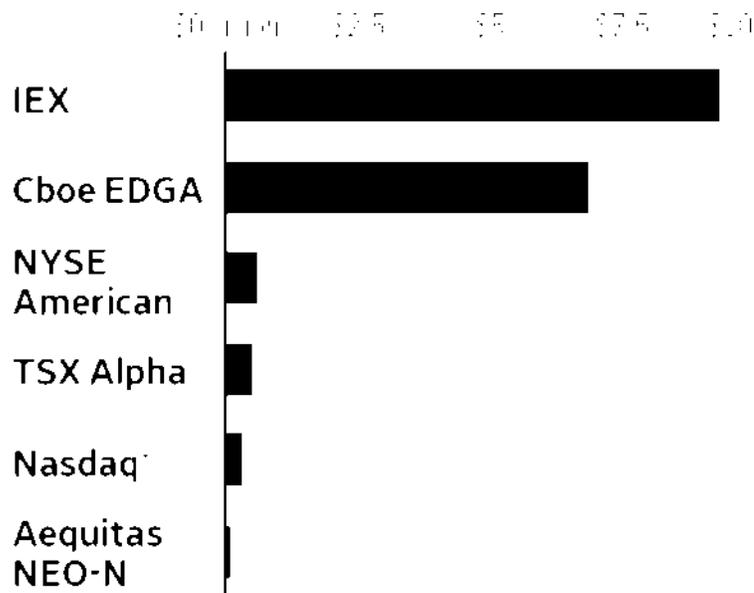

A speed bump could help that investor. Cboe’s proposal would force the HFT firm to wait four milliseconds before buying the Ford shares. But the same delay wouldn’t apply if the investor sent Cboe an electronic message canceling his or her $10.00 sell order. That gives the investor a brief window of time to avoid being picked off by the faster trade.

Most of the latest speed-bump plans have a similar, “asymmetrical” design, meaning they don’t apply equally to all trades. Such speed bumps are typically meant to favor market participants that publicly quote prices on an exchange, rather than those that try to buy or sell using those prices.

Source: IEX Group Inc. (IEX), Cboe Global Markets (Cboe EDGA), NYSE American, TSX Alpha, Nasdaq, Aequitas NEO-N. Note: Figures are approximate and based on data from the chart.

In many cases, the new speed bumps cover small, thinly traded markets, and they could help exchanges juice trading volumes by encouraging traders to post more quotes.

LME's and Cboe's planned speed bumps are asymmetrical. Atlanta-based exchange giant Intercontinental Exchange Inc. ICE -1.57% won approval for such a speed bump on its U.S. futures market in May. Eurex, the derivatives arm of Germany's Deutsche Börse AG, has deployed asymmetrical speed bumps on some markets since 2017, and Moscow Exchange, MOEX +1.22% in Russia, added such a speed bump to a dollar-ruble foreign-exchange market in April. The proliferation of such speed bumps is troubling, because it means investors can't be certain of the prices they see on exchanges, said Jamil Nazarali, global head of business development at electronic-trading giant Citadel Securities. "The big risk is that you're going to see a lot of phantom liquidity, which will harm execution quality for both retail and institutional investors," he said.

Proponents say asymmetrical speed bumps could help end a costly, futile race in which HFT firms seek to build ever-faster technology—such as microwave networks and even lasers—to shave nanoseconds off the time they take to execute trades.

"Anti-latency arbitrage mechanisms are here to stay," said Matt Clarke, who oversees European client relationships for U.K.-based XTX Markets, one of the few high-speed trading firms that support the speed-bump trend.

"They're a natural reaction to the destructive speed race, so we are seeing them proliferate in multiple asset classes across the world," he added.

The evidence is mixed on whether speed bumps help investors. Last year, a Securities and Exchange Commission economist released a study that found the speed bump on IEX Group Inc., the startup exchange featured in "Flash Boys," had reduced costs for investors. But some market experts have criticized the study.

FT: G7 Crypto Opposition Masks Warmer Stance for Wholesale Markets

Regulatory fears over digital assets are narrow, focusing on consumer protection

By Philip Stafford

It started with Donald Trump, who last week lashed out at cryptocurrencies and bitcoin, saying they are "not money" and he is not a "fan".

Now, finance ministers from the rest of the G7 group of major economies find themselves in the unusual position of agreeing with the US president. On Thursday they expressed unease about the use of digital assets for money laundering, tax evasion and drug trafficking.

Crypto-enthusiasts — not typically keen on government intervention at the best of times — could be forgiven for thinking that regulators are seeking to stamp out the growth of digital assets in a war on innovation.

But regulators' high-profile concerns are relatively narrow. They focus on Facebook's proposed Libra project and other crypto coins, as part of a focus on consumer protection.

In wholesale markets, institutions wanting to trade crypto-related assets are receiving rather different signals. They believe watchdogs are getting more comfortable with this new world.

In the past month the UK approved its first asset manager that specialises in cryptocurrencies, while LedgerX won US approval to trade bitcoin futures and swaps that are settled in the digital currency.

This is a critical change. It means customers will be paid in cryptocurrency when the contract expires, in the same way that buyers of commodity future take physical delivery of oil and foodstuffs. Other exchanges have applied for similar treatment for crypto and hope to win approval.

Optimists believe this support will herald the arrival of fund managers and banks into the crypto market. After all, bitcoin's recent sharp price moves offers traders some rare and welcome volatility in an otherwise listless market.

Some will no doubt test the water. But the problem remains finding someone to trade them on behalf of the customer. By law, funds have to keep securities with a qualified custodian, and that broker must be able to prove it can keep the assets safe from, for example, hackers.

But a crypto asset is not necessarily a security, legally-speaking. It is just a string of numbers and letters. It can be difficult to recover lost or stolen assets, or even to prove possession or control.

Annette Nazareth, a partner at law firm Davis Polk, and a former SEC Commissioner, notes that for banks, trading crypto assets is a legal grey area. Without showing they can meet the rules, they cannot be approved for this activity, she said. Last week, US regulators suggested they would be more comfortable with brokers just arranging deals and not holding the digital securities.

"For the most part, [that] statement doesn't resolve these uncertainties," said Ms Nazareth.

Despite the somewhat more constructive approach in wholesale markets, national authorities are still keen to know who watches the watchmen.

MLex: Facebook Privacy Settlement with FTC Challenged by Privacy Group

By Mike Swift

Facebook's $5 billion privacy settlement with the Federal Trade Commission will face a court challenge from privacy advocates, who today took the first steps to argue that a federal judge in Washington should reject the proposed agreement as inadequate.

The Electronic Privacy Information Center, which is already suing the FTC in federal court to get more access to records involving enforcement records against Facebook, today filed a motion in US District Court for the District of Columbia, asking a judge to schedule a series of written briefings on EPIC's argument that the proposed settlement falls short of protecting the privacy of Facebook users.

"The public needs to be heard before this settlement is finalized," said Marc Rotenberg, EPIC's president. "There are simply too many questions about this deal and whether the FTC has actually safeguarded the privacy interests of Facebook users."

The proposed settlement, EPIC said in the filing (see here), "fails to safeguard the interests of Facebook users. The proposed Consent Decree, now before this Court, also directly implicates the rights of EPIC and others who have helped establish the underlying legal authority that is the basis for this settlement, who have routinely filed privacy complaints with the FTC alleging violations of the Consent Order, who have complaints currently pending before the Commission, and who have worked for more than a decade to protect the interests of Facebook users."

The FTC's settlement with Facebook of allegations that the social media giant violated a 2012 consent decree was hit with a wave of criticism as soon as it was unveiled Wednesday (see here). The settlement was approved along party lines, with the FTC's three Republicans supporting it, and its two Democrats issuing strongly-worded dissents.

The judge who will decide whether to approve the proposed settlement in federal court for the District of Columbia was chosen Thursday: US District Judge Timothy J. Kelly. Appointed to the federal bench by President Donald Trump in September 2017, Kelly is a former assistant US attorney who prosecuted a variety of offenses, including violent crime, drug trafficking, and white-collar offenses.

Kelly was the chief counsel for national security and the senior crime counsel to the US Senate Judiciary Committee from 2013 to 2017.

In his short time on the federal bench, Kelly has already gotten significant media attention. After the White House last year revoked the press credential for Jim Acosta, CNN's chief White House correspondent, Kelly ordered the administration to restore Acosta's press credential.

Facebook will also have to get approval from a federal judge in San Francisco for its $100 million settlement of charges by the US Securities and Exchange Commission (see here). The SEC says Facebook violated securities laws by describing the misuse of user data as a hypothetical risk for two years when it had in fact already happened through the Cambridge Analytica privacy leak.

That SEC case will be heard by US District Judge James Donato, who has extensive experience hearing privacy cases involving Facebook. An initial hearing in that case is scheduled for late October.

Donato is also presiding over a lawsuit that alleges Facebook's use of facial recognition technology violated the Illinois Biometric Information Privacy Act. Donato's ruling that approved class-action status for that suit is being challenged by Facebook at the US Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit (see here).

The FTC's previous high settlement in a privacy case before this week's Facebook settlement, a $22.5 million penalty against Google, was challenged by the advocacy group Consumer Watchdog in 2012 (see here).

Consumer Watchdog's lawyer, Gary Reback, said at the time that the Google settlement was "so markedly deficient that it fails to meet the relevant legal standards of 'adequacy' and furthering 'the public interest,'" in part because the FTC failed to get a permanent injunction on Google's behavior, and because the fine was too small (see here).

Ultimately, however, the Google settlement was approved by US District Judge Susan Illston, who ruled (see here) that the settlement was "substantively fair, adequate, and reasonable."

Consumer Watchdog doesn't plan to file a challenge to either Facebook settlement, the group's president, Jaimie Court, told MLex.

FT: London Stock Exchange Deal is Signpost for City

Plan to buy Refinitiv is logical and instructive for the Square Mile

By the editorial board

The London Stock Exchange may be days away from doubling in size via the acquisition of Refinitiv, the data spin-off from Thomson Reuters. Over the weekend the LSE confirmed a Financial Times report that the two groups are in advanced talks.

If a deal comes to fruition, it would seal yet another permutation of the potential combinations that trading platforms have explored in recent years. But alongside the microcosmic rejigging of market structures, the LSE's chosen way forward — under the leadership of American chief executive David Schwimmer and American chairman Don Robert — may also signpost the future of the City of London.

The $27bn purchase would turbo-charge the LSE's move away from its original core business of facilitating the trading of shares. That cash equities business has become increasingly low margin, amid stiffer competition, technology advances and a deepening trend for companies to be owned privately rather via stock exchange listings.

Buying Refinitiv consolidates the LSE's shift into data services begun under previous chief executive Xavier Rolet. It also further broadens the LSE's asset class profile across fixed-income and interest rate products and services.

Most symbolically, it strengthens the group's standing in other parts of the world, particularly North America and Asia. If Boris Johnson were looking for a touchstone for global Britain, the new prime minister could scarcely have found a better one.

It is all a radical change of direction from two years ago, when a merger between the LSE and Frankfurt-based Deutsche Börse was on the cards.

The then chief executives of the two exchange groups had conceived that deal before the UK's 2016 Brexit referendum, but bravely continued to push it even after the vote. They spun a valid line that even if political ties were to be cut, a combined exchanges business could act as a valuable economic bridge, maximising continental Europe's access to capital.

But in the spring of 2017 the putative deal was blocked by the European Commission, nominally on antitrust grounds. Concerns expressed about likely market dominance in derivatives may have been a convenient excuse to scotch a deal made unacceptable by the politics of Brexit.

Regardless of the merits of that merger — or the corporate fallout of it having been blocked — Europe's capital markets may have suffered more. Easier access to the City of London's capital could have brought substance to the rhetoric of the EU's proposed capital markets union, Brexit notwithstanding. Without the deal, and without evidence of alternative impetus, CMU risks being a white elephant.

For the City, the darkening cloud of a no-deal Brexit causes logical concern among financiers. It could severely disrupt the ability of UK-based banks, insurers and asset managers to service clients across the EU — business that is estimated to account for about a fifth of the City's overall revenue.

Thanks to far-sighted thinking by managers, and resolute direction from the Bank of England, the City is probably as well prepared as it could be for a hard Brexit, having established bridgeheads across the continent that should allow business to be continued, albeit less efficiently and at a higher cost.

But Brexiters have long urged businesspeople to focus less on the disruption of leaving the EU and more on the opportunity to boost business with the rest of the world. For 300-plus years the London Stock Exchange has been a key cog in the City of London machine. The City should indeed take note of its outward-looking reinvention.

Risk.Net: SGX's Koh Defends Clearing Methods Post-Nasdaq

Existing tools still work, despite external scrutiny on default management, says risk chief

By Aileen Chuang

Agnes Koh, the chief risk officer at Singapore Exchange (SGX), understands the public scrutiny of derivatives clearing houses in the wake of the damaging default at Nasdaq last year. But she also believes her company and many of its peers have curbed risk on their own, and warns against overly prescriptive regulation that could hinder clearing houses in managing future defaults.

Koh argues that existing tools such as liquidating brokers to resolve a default event will continue to work well for futures clearers.

“The regulators have set their minds and hearts on ensuring there are harmonised risk standards across CCPs,” says Koh. “There are already existing CCP risk practices – and the guidance makes it very clear to all, especially for those participants who are new to the clearing ecosystem.”

Since the Einar Aas default, some banks have voiced concerns over the clearing of certain products at central counterparties (CCPs). Regulators, meanwhile, have pushed CCPs to tighten standards around everything from membership requirements to margin adequacy – and, most prominently, to review practices around the sale of portfolios from defaulting members.

SGX was already in the midst of a two-year review of its margin methodology at the time of the Nasdaq loss, with the broad aim of improving responsiveness to changes in volatility and reducing procyclicality. The review culminated in a raft of changes to the clearing house’s model, which it announced in March.

In parallel, SGX has revised its default auction rules for risky and concentrated products, following a consultation that ended 12 months ago. The exchange announced its new procedures in July, featuring mandatory auctions for certain instruments.

The initiatives add to a sense that SGX and other exchanges are wary of regulators imposing unnecessary rules on the clearing process when CCPs are already addressing any deficiencies themselves. Global standard-setters released a discussion paper on changes to CCP auctions in June.

Koh, a former regulator and 14-year veteran of the exchange, is not shy of pushing global supervisors to take local market dynamics into account when setting standards: in 2016, she issued a rallying call to fellow Asia-Pacific jurisdictions to lobby against “irrelevant” elements of the Fundamental Review of the Trading Book that risked damaging liquidity in younger capital markets.

If it ain’t broke

Existing default management practices, if executed correctly, can insulate CCPs and their members from harmful losses, Koh insists. She uses the Lehman Brothers collapse in 2008 as an example. Lehman’s Singapore entity did not itself default, as it had sufficient collateral to meet its financial obligation to SGX’s clearing houses; but the CCP took pre-emptive measures that included imposing additional margin requirements and porting customers’ positions to other clearing members, enabling it to execute an orderly wind-down of Lehman’s remaining positions.

“We worked closely with our liquidating brokers to complete the liquidation process,” Koh says. “Both our clearing houses did not suffer any financial loss from the fallout, and we were able to return excess collateral to the liquidators of Lehman.”

The use of liquidating brokers as a first measure to dispose of portfolios works well for exchange-traded derivatives with robust liquidity, Koh argues. But it is important for CCPs to retain the flexibility to call on a range of weapons in response to default.

“We need to remind the industry that a CCP can work with many tools, depending on the kind of products that you’ve listed and the complexity in the market and members,” Koh says. “For example, in the listed market, where the instrument is very liquid and with efficient price discovery, the use of liquidating brokers, which have worked in the past, will continue to work in the future.”

As part of recent changes to its default management rules, SGX has proposed mandatory auctions for products that have non-linear risks or enjoy cross-product margin offsets and strong portfolio effect.

“It’s more efficient to liquidate them as a whole, rather than breaking them into individual products and liquidating them separately,” says Koh.

The mandatory auction will be limited to non-defaulting clearing members that have open cleared positions in the contracts that constitute the auction portfolio at the time of the relevant default event. But those clearing members may involve their customers in pricing the auction portfolio, SGX says.

If the bourse doesn’t want to pursue a mandatory auction, it also has the option of other recovery tools, such as liquidating a defaulted portfolio in the open market. This may take the form of a voluntary auction where a broader range of bidders, from inside and outside the clearing member pool, are invited to participate.

“This mode of liquidation may be particularly suitable for liquid outright futures contracts with linear risk, which may attract interested parties from both members and non-members to bid for,” says Koh.

Not all cleared markets are liquid, though. Some are dominated by a few large directional players, which means that any auction process may have only a handful of prospective participants. There is talk that some futures products are simply not fit for clearing.

Koh has sympathy for the concerns, but believes regulators should treat each market on its own merits and resist issuing blanket diktats.

“There are differences in the product, market structure and membership among the various CCPs,” she says. “It’s highly unlikely that we will have a one-size-fits-all approach. That’s why I think workshops could be a discovery process for the industry.”

Koh is actively involved in industry workshops and conversations with regulators. She is currently an executive committee member of CCP12, a global association for central counterparties. Koh worked for the Monetary Authority of Singapore for 11 years until 1998, steering investment of the central bank’s foreign reserves and developing a framework for investment in new asset classes. She later joined a management consultancy, providing accounting and tax services to small and medium-sized enterprises.

Marginal gains

The other looming issue exercising banks in futures markets is margin coverage. Even before the Nasdaq episode, dealers were concerned at the steep rise in margin breaches – instances in which models do not fully capture a sharp price move in the underlying, necessitating a top-up from the client.

The market's largest futures clearers, CME Group and Ice, are in the throes of updating their legacy Span models to ones based on value-at-risk, which promise greater accuracy. SGX, which licenses the Span framework from CME, has pre-empted those changes by tweaking its current margin model to give more weight to recent volatility so that base margins are more responsive to the prevailing volatility regime, Koh says.

While still using Span model outputs, the CCP has amended the input parameters, ditching the previous standard deviation approach that gave equal weight to all price observations during the previous year when setting margin requirements, and adopting volatility scaling so that margins are more sufficiently responsive to the prevailing volatility regime.

SGX then backstops this with an anti-procyclicality floor, ensuring margins cannot dip lower than those that would be arrived at using a 10-year lookback, even during benign periods of low volatility. "The 10-year lookback means that, should there be a sudden catastrophe or unexpected event, there won't be a shocking spike in margin requirement and imposing liquidity constraints on our members," says Koh.

The changes, which will apply to SGX's entire suite of listed derivatives, in effect leave the bourse with something akin to a Span 1.5 model. With CME set to roll out Span 2.0 in the first half of 2020, exchanges including SGX may ultimately have to move away from the existing version. Koh declines to comment on the timeline of any change, but says SGX will keep evaluating the necessary improvement.

Margin models and default processes are not the only area of change for SGX. Last November, the exchange surprised rates users by revealing plans to shut its swaps clearing business. Clearing of interest rate swaps denominated in Singapore dollars is mandatory, and with rivals LCH and CME only clearing the shorter end of the curve, that risked leaving in the lurch some clients that were trading longer-dated swaps: SGX was the only CCP offering clearing of Malaysian ringgit swaps and Singapore dollar swaps with a maturity of more than 15 years.

In response to market demand, LCH extended clearing for Singapore dollar swaps out to 21 years. SGX began a de-clearing process with IHS Markit and clearing members on the trades of Singapore dollar swaps and Thai baht and ringgit non-deliverable interest rate swaps before it hit the April deadline. The exchange then executed "trade compression and subsequent re-clearing of some positions to LCH", Koh says.

SGX is refocusing its franchise on clearing over-the-counter foreign exchange futures, it says – a sounder long-term bet, with Singapore the world's third-largest forex trading hub after London and New York.

FT: 'China's Nasdaq': Shanghai's New Tech Trading Venue Explained

Beijing hopes Star will take business from Hong Kong and New York

By Hudson Lockett

More than 140 technology and science companies across China have signed up to list their stocks on a new facility run by the Shanghai Stock Exchange. On Monday, the first batch of 25 will begin trading on the new venue, the Star Market. The idea behind Star — billed as China's answer to Nasdaq — is to encourage investment in domestic tech innovators, ensuring they have the resources to develop.

But previous attempts by China to convince the country's top tech talent to sell shares at home have fallen short. Beijing hopes that reforms to how companies list and trade — along with the clear backing of President Xi Jinping — could help Star take business from New York and also Hong Kong at a time when China and the US are engaged in a tussle for technological supremacy.

What is different this time?

Unlike the main boards at the Shanghai and Shenzhen exchanges, stocks will not require government approval to be listed. One marketing company has already withdrawn its application, according to the SSE, which said the business was unable to answer questions to the exchange's satisfaction.

The Star market also permits companies to list before they make any money, and to issue dual-class shares that preserve founders' control over operations. Investors, for their part, will be allowed to short-sell individual stocks for the first time in mainland China.

And, unlike the country's other bourses, the new market has no limit on the ratio of a share price to a company's earnings at the time of listing. Since 2014, the China Securities Regulatory Commission has tried to deter aggressive pricing of initial public offerings by applying an unofficial cap of 23 times historic earnings.

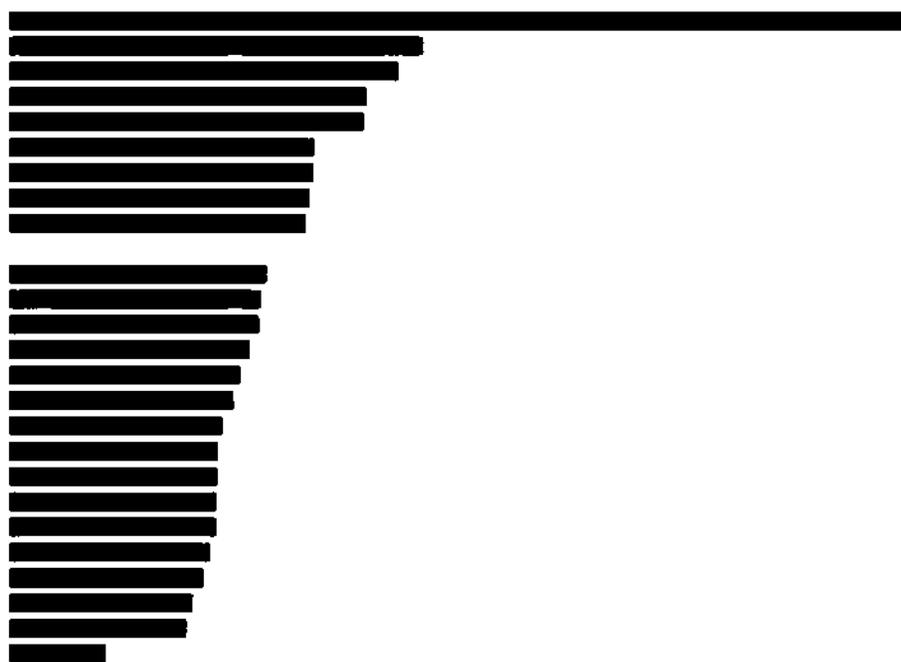

The impact of the new listings regime is clear from the pricing of the 25 companies that start trading on Monday. These have an average price-to-earnings ratio of more than 53, according to an analysis by the Financial Times, compared with less than 14 for shares on Shanghai's main board. That suggests investors are willing to take advantage of the greater leeway in pricing IPOs on the Star market.

Shanghai's 'Star' tech board lets valuations off the leash

Firms to gain more latitude for the first 25 companies to list

Shanghai's new 'Star' board, set to launch in July, will allow the first 25 companies to list to raise up to 10% more than their IPO valuations, according to local media. The board, which is part of the Shanghai Stock Exchange, is expected to be the first of a new set of exchanges to be established in the city. The board will be open to companies with a market value of at least Rmb1 billion ($150 million) and a P/E ratio of at least 10. The board will also allow companies to raise up to 10% more than their IPO valuations, which is a significant increase from the current 5% limit. The board is expected to be the first of a new set of exchanges to be established in the city. The board will be open to companies with a market value of at least Rmb1 billion ($150 million) and a P/E ratio of at least 10. The board will also allow companies to raise up to 10% more than their IPO valuations, which is a significant increase from the current 5% limit.

Which companies are listing?

The new system — as well as vocal encouragement from Beijing — has spurred more than 140 companies to apply to list on the board with the aim of raising a combined Rmb128.8bn ($18.7bn), according to local media. That would surpass total IPO fundraising on Shanghai's main exchange last year by $7bn. The first 25 to list have already raised Rmb37bn, with a median fundraising target of Rmb876m.

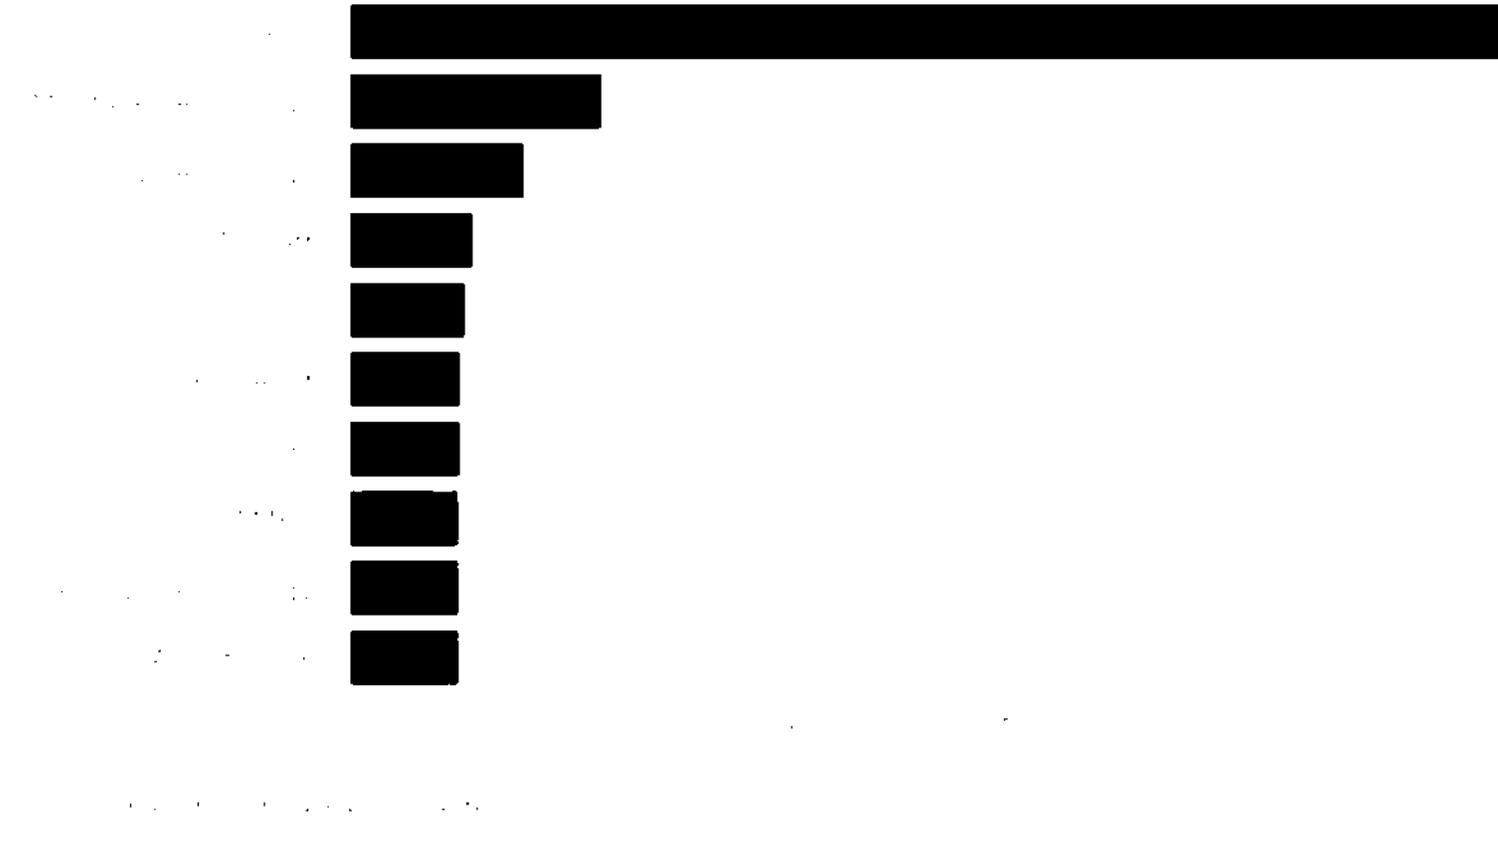

None of the companies debuting on Monday is particularly well-known outside China. However, state-run China Railway Signal & Communication — the biggest listing of the batch at Rmb10.5bn — made global headlines in 2011, when its equipment was partly blamed for a deadly high-speed train crash near Wenzhou. Most of the others manufacture electronics or specialised equipment.

Other IPOs in the first batch include chipmaker Montage (Rmb2.3bn) and Ronbay, a battery materials supplier (Rmb1.6bn).

The lack of any restrictions on P/E ratios will be likely to focus investors' attention on companies with the highest ratios, and whether they pop on the first day — as many stocks elsewhere in China do. These include semiconductor equipment maker AMEC (a P/E of 170.8), electronics producer Raytron (79) and software maker ArcSoft (74.4).

China's new board seeks to keep tech talent close to home

Top fundraising targets for Star board of 100-90 billion

What will happen when trading starts?

The Star market's debut week, in particular, holds the potential for far greater price swings than those seen elsewhere in China because, for the first five days after listing, Star stocks are not subject to any limit on daily price moves. After then, so-called "circuit breaker" rules will kick in, suspending trading of a stock for 10 minutes if it rises or falls 30 per cent from its opening price, then for another 10 minutes if it moves another 60 per cent in either direction. Given that the new market has Mr Xi's personal backing, however, analysts are expecting initial trading to be buoyant. And more state support for the Star board is on the way. Last week, a spokesperson for China's state asset regulator said: "We strongly advocate and support" the listing of central state-owned enterprises on the Star market."

Biden, Yellen Urge Senate Dems To “Go Big” On COVID-19 Relief.

USA Today (2/2, Wu, 12.7M) reports President Biden “told a group of 10 Republican senators their roughly $600 billion counteroffer on a COVID-19 stimulus package was ‘way too small,’ top Senate Democratic leaders said Tuesday following a virtual meeting with Biden and Treasury Secretary Janet Yellen.” Senate Majority Leader Chuck Schumer said following a meeting of Senate Democrats that Biden “said that he told Senate Republicans that the $600 billion that they proposed is way too small.” Biden and Yellen “found their proposal insufficient to address the COVID-19 pandemic, Schumer said, though he noted Biden told Democrats he was open to ‘some modifications’ on the relief bill.” Schumer said Yellen “specifically noted” the GOP plan excluded expansions of the Child and Earned Income Tax Credits, and thus “didn’t do enough to help.”

The New York Times (2/2, Broadwater, Tankersley, 20.6M) reports Biden and Yellen “met virtually with Senate Democrats at their lunch on Tuesday afternoon,” during which they “spoke about the need for Congress to respond boldly and quickly,” according to Schumer. Schumer said Biden “was very strong in emphasizing the need for a big bold package,” and that although Biden “said he told Republicans he was willing to make some modifications to his proposal, he and Ms. Yellen told the group that if the Senate embraced the Republican plan, ‘we’d be mired in the Covid crisis for years,’ according to Mr. Schumer.”

The AP (2/2, Mascaro, Boak) reports, “both Biden and Yellen recalled the lessons of the government response to the 2009 financial crisis, which some have since said was inadequate as conditions worsened.” The Washington Post (2/2, Werner, Stein, Kim, 10.52M) reports Yellen, during the call, “emphasized the need for a robust relief package at an unsettled moment for the economy, which has begun shedding more jobs – and for the pandemic, as new coronavirus variants emerge.” Schumer said of the GOP plan, “I think it is [Biden’s] belief, it is Secretary Yellen’s belief, it is our belief, that if we did a package that small, we’d be mired in the covid crisis for years.”

Politico (2/2, Levine, Everett, 6.73M) reports Yellen “answered questions from senators and encouraged the caucus to pursue a large stimulus.” Senate Democrats “said afterward that the call with Biden and Yellen was positive and vowed that the Senate would move swiftly on coronavirus relief, with or without Republican buy-in.” Senate Finance Chair Ron Wyden said, “We’ve really gotta get this bill out early on.” President Biden “and Janet Yellen are interested in a bipartisan package and talk about it. But they make clear the American people want something that really helps them.” Axios (2/2, Treene, 1.26M) reports Yellen “emphasized Biden’s insistence on ensuring they didn’t underestimate the money needed to keep the economy in check, and then took several questions, which resulted in the meeting descending into chaos,” according to a source on the call.

Reuters (2/2, Lawder) reports Yellen said in a statement following the call Tuesday that new CBO growth forecasts showed the US “desperately” needs Congress to pass Biden’s relief package. Yellen said, “Last year, the economy shrunk more than any other since the end of World War II. With the growth that the CBO projects, it will be years before the country reaches full employment again.”

The Wall Street Journal (2/2, Duehren, Subscription Publication, 8.41M) and The Hill (2/2, Carney, 5.69M) also report.

Yellen Holds “Warm & Productive” Call With IMF Head.

Reuters (2/2, Shalal) reports Treasury Secretary Janet Yellen and IMF Managing Director Kristalina Georgieva “agreed on Tuesday on the need for multilateral solutions to address debt vulnerabilities and other issues facing the global economy, the Treasury Department said.” Yellen’s call with Georgieva “was the latest in a series of initial calls with top global finance officials after taking office last week.” Treasury’s statement said, “Secretary Yellen conveyed her intention to work closely with the IMF on the priorities of continuing to respond effectively to the COVID-19 pandemic, re-invigorating economic growth to support a strong global recovery, fighting inequality, and forcefully addressing the threat of climate change.” Georgieva described the call in a tweet as “warm & productive.”

Reuters (2/2, Shalal) reports Treasury Secretary Janet Yellen and World Bank President David Malpass, in a call on Tuesday, “stressed the need to coordinate in responding the global pandemic, improving vaccine access for the poorest countries, and combating climate change, Treasury said.” During the call, Yellen “emphasized that climate change is an existential threat to our environment and global economy and urged robust support to low-income countries,” according to a Treasury Department statement, which added that Yellen “highlighted the need to work closely to help countries reduce debt vulnerabilities and improve debt sustainability and transparency.”

Reuters (2/2, Shalal) reports Treasury Secretary Janet Yellen “spoke on Tuesday with Mexican Finance Minister Arturo Herrera and underscored her desire to maintain close U.S.-Mexico coordination on economic and security issues, the Treasury Department said in a statement." Yellen "told Herrera that Mexico could be a strong partner in working on key priorities, including responding to the COVID-19 pandemic, supporting a robust economic recovery, fighting inequality, and addressing the threat of climate change." Yellen also "told Herrera she looked forward to further engagement on shared interests, including combating illicit finance and facilitating economic development in Central America, Treasury said."

Reuters (2/2, Daniel) also reports Yellen and Herrera discussed "the need for an international agreement on taxing the digital economy, Mexico's finance ministry said."

Reuters (2/2, Shalal) reports, "Nearly 30 Congolese and international human rights groups and several U.S. lawmakers have called on the Biden administration to reverse a last-minute move by the Trump administration to ease sanctions against Israeli mining magnate Dan Gertler." The Treasury Department "imposed the sanctions in December 2017 and June 2018, accusing Gertler of using his friendship with Democratic Republic of Congo's former President Joseph Kabila to win sweetheart mining deals worth more than a billion dollars," but the Trump administration "eased the sanctions in a secret action in its last week in office, a license granted by the Treasury Department showed." In a joint letter to Treasury Secretary Janet Yellen and Secretary of State Antony Blinken, human rights groups "urged" them to "reverse course, arguing that the Trump administration's move undermined U.S. anti-corruption efforts and set a dangerous precedent undercutting the Global Magnitsky sanctions program."

Politico (2/2, Guida, 6.73M) reports that Treasury Secretary Janet Yellen "will meet with key financial regulatory agencies to scrutinize recent price surges in GameStop stock and other companies, the latest move by policymakers to respond to market maneuvers tied to a group of investors on Reddit." The meeting, "which will take place as soon as Thursday, will focus on findings from the Securities and Exchange Commission, according to a Treasury official. It will also include the Federal Reserve, the New York Fed and the Commodity Futures Trading Commission, which oversees derivatives." Politico adds, "The frenzy in a range of stocks has increasingly drawn in policymakers, particularly after brokerage Robinhood Financial suddenly limited trading in GameStop, AMC Entertainment and other stocks, citing demands from a clearinghouse for $3 billion to back up trades as it continued to rack up purchase orders from its customers."

Reuters (2/2, Lawder, Hunnicutt), The Washington Post (2/2, Stein, Siegel, 10.52M), and The Wall Street Journal (2/2, Davidson, Subscription Publication, 8.41M) also report.

Treasury Bringing In Officials To Focus On International Affairs.

Reuters (2/2, Shalal, Lawder) reports economist and former IMF and Treasury official David Lipton "will return to government service as a senior adviser to Treasury Secretary Janet Yellen, six sources familiar with the matter said." Lipton "will focus on the U.S. role within the Group of Seven advanced economies and the larger Group of 20 economies in a temporary role, several sources said on condition of anonymity." Bringing Lipton to Treasury "to guide international matters will free Yellen to focus on the U.S. economy and work to ensure passage of President Joe Biden's $1.9 trillion rescue plan, which has run into resistance from Republicans in Congress, the sources said."

Bloomberg (2/2, Mohsin, 3.57M) reports Yellen "is eyeing former Treasury official Marisa Lago, who now works for New York Mayor Bill de Blasio, and Heidi Crebo-Rediker, a former chief economist at the State Department, for undersecretary of international affairs at the Treasury, according to people familiar with the matter. The role requires Senate approval."

Eisinger: Biden Needs More Than "Aggressive Appointments" To Undo Corporate-Friendly Policies.

In an op-ed for The New York Times (2/2, 20.6M), Jesse Eisinger of ProPublica writes that some of President Biden's appointees and nominees "are among the most aggressive financial and corporate regulators of recent years," including Treasury Secretary Janet Yellen, who has "has generated tempered optimism" as "a late convert to the cause of aggressive financial regulation." However, "it's only a start. Persuading Mr. Biden, an avowed lifelong moderate, to reverse decades of corporate-friendly stances, even among Democratic administrations, will require more than a few aggressive appointments."

A press release "from the administration of Mayor Bill Peduto" said a "proposal for the city to establish the new rental assistance program was slated to be introduced to City Council today as a measure to help meet the ongoing needs of those facing financial crisis from the Covid-19 pandemic." The program "is expected to use federal funding available through the Consolidated Appropriations Act signed into law on Dec. 27." Allegheny County "received $27 million and the city $8.9 million in U.S. Treasury grants from the new legislation, according to an announcement, with the funding expected to be used to assist households having trouble paying rent and utilities due to the pandemic."

White House Announces Push To Distribute COVID Vaccines To Pharmacies.

ABC World News Tonight (2/2, story 3, 2:45, Muir, 8.01M) reported on the "new push to send vaccines to pharmacies across the nation. The White House [is] now directing one million doses to be sent to 6,500 pharmacies." ABC's Eva Pilgrim said the White House announcing shipments of vaccines "will begin going straight to select pharmacies starting next week." White House COVID coordinator Jeffrey Zients: "This pharmacy program will expand access in neighborhoods across the country, so you can make an appointment and get your shot conveniently and quickly."

Gabe Gutierrez said on NBC Nightly News (2/2, story 4, 1:45, Holt, 6.35M), "Across the country, from Georgia to California, frustration over the rollout is reaching the White House, which today announced details of its pharmacy vaccination program. By next week, February 11, the government says it will deliver one million doses to 6,500 retail pharmacies nationwide, eventually expanding to 40,000." Walgreens Chief Medical Officer Kevin Ban: "We have all of the infrastructure, all of the connection in community to be able to help those people who have been hard hit by the pandemic." Gutierrez: "Andy Slavitt is a senior COVID-19 adviser to the White House who says he's concerned providers are holding back second doses." Slavitt: "I think that's a function of what happens in a shortage. People hoard. If they are holding back second doses that were intended as first doses, they don't need to do that."

The AP (2/2, Alonso-Zaldivar) reports Zients "announced the moves on a call with the nation's governors Tuesday morning and then detailed them to the public in an afternoon news conference." The Washington Post (2/2, Schemm, Cunningham, 10.52M) reports Zients "cautioned that supply constraints will limit the early availability of shots in drugstores. He said the administration wanted to target supplies to pharmacies serving 'socially vulnerable communities.'" Politico (2/2, Lim, 6.73M) reports that the new pharmacy initiative "is separate from an ongoing federal program to have Walgreens and CVS vaccinate residents of long-term care facilities."

The Wall Street Journal (2/2, Parti, Armour, Subscription Publication, 8.41M) reports the Administration also announced plans to boost supplies of Moderna and Pfizer vaccines sent to states for the next three weeks and purchase enough additional doses to vaccinate most of the US population by the end of summer. The AP (2/2, Alonso-Zaldivar) reports the Administration "is allowing state and local governments to receive additional federal dollars to cover previously incurred expenses relating to the pandemic." The New York Times (2/2, LaFraniere, Weiland, Robbins, 20.6M) says the announcements "were clearly intended to show that Mr. Biden was making rapid strides on the vaccine front amid huge frustration in the country over tight supplies and a chaotic, cobbled-together system for administering the available shots."

Asked on MSNBC (2/2, Hayes, 2.69M) about issues with the vaccine rollout, NIAID Director Fauci said, "Overwhelmingly, if you look at the entire country, the supply does not at this point meet the demand. So if you get on the phone with mayors and governors, the biggest complaint is we need more vaccine." Fauci continued, "We will be doing better as we get into February and March and April. ... We will be getting more, but right now, we need to get more vaccine in the hands of the administrators who are going to be administering the vaccine."

Pfizer Expects To Supply US With 200M Vaccine Doses Months Early. CNBC (2/2, Lovelace, 7.34M) reports on its website that Pfizer intends to "deliver 200 million doses of its coronavirus vaccine to the U.S. by May, earlier than its initial forecast of July, according to slides published Tuesday by the company ahead of its fourth-quarter earnings call." Pfizer "also said it can potentially deliver 2 billion doses globally by the end of this year now that health-care providers can extract an additional sixth dose of the vaccine from the vials."

Moderna Asks FDA To Allow It To Overcome Vial Shortage. The New York Times (2/2, Zimmer, 20.6M) reports that the FDA "could decide within a few weeks how much more vaccine Moderna, the developer of one of the two federally authorized Covid-19 vaccines, can put into its vials. Moderna says it can raise the number of doses per vial from 10 to as much as 15." Moderna "has already been ramping up production of its vaccine, only to find a bottleneck in the bottling, capping and labeling process. With F.D.A. approval, more doses could start going into each bottle quickly."

CDC Seeks To Accelerate Efforts To Detect COVID Variants.

On NBC Nightly News (2/2, story 5, 1:15, Holt, 6.35M), Miguel Almaguer reported the CDC "is hoping to analyze 6,000 COVID samples a week, a race to track down dangerous and potentially deadlier variants of the virus." Almaguer added, "With the UK strain already detected in a majority of states, researchers fear if the South African and Brazilian variants are more resilient to vaccines, the death toll could climb to 600,000 in three months."

In an op-ed for the Washington Post (2/2, 10.52M), Ashish K. Jha, Dean of the Brown University School of Public Health, writes that the new strains of the coronavirus are "a powerful reminder that we must remain vigilant in fighting the virus, even as vaccines promise an end to the pandemic. And they are a warning that if the world doesn't bring the virus under control everywhere, this nightmarish pandemic could continue for years longer than it needs to."

Northeast Vaccine Sites Resume Rollout After Snowstorm.

The AP (2/2) reports, "Coronavirus vaccination sites across the Northeast ramped back up Tuesday after a two-day snowstorm that also shut down public transport, closed schools and stranded travelers with canceled flights." Officials "said that since vaccine supplies were thin to begin with, they didn't anticipate having big problems getting caught up on distribution after a day or two of cancelled appointments." As of Tuesday, some vaccination sites in New York City "remained closed, but others, including those run by the public hospital system, were open," and in Massachusetts, "a Boston site that was supposed to open Monday for residents ages 75 and older did not." In Connecticut, "efforts are under way to provide vaccinations by the end of the week to" 10,000 people whose appointments were canceled Monday, and New Jersey's "six megasites for COVID-19 vaccines were still closed" on Tuesday.

Health Officials Say Wealthy Citizens Taking Up Vaccine In Poor Neighborhoods.

The New York Times (2/2, A1, Goodnough, Hoffman, 20.6M) reports, "Although low-income communities of color have been hit hardest by Covid-19, health officials in many cities say that people from wealthier, largely white neighborhoods have been flooding vaccination appointment systems and taking an outsized share of the limited supply." Residents of "underserved neighborhoods have been tripped up by a confluence of obstacles," including hard-to-navigate websites and phone lines, lack of transportation and time off, and vaccine hesitance. Several "cities are trying to rectify inequities" in distribution, but have faced obstacles, including "fear that singling out neighborhoods for priority access could invite lawsuits alleging race preference." Additionally, the ability "to address inequities depends on how much control they have over their own vaccine allocations and whether their political leadership aligns with that of supervising county or state authorities."

Nationwide Push For Schools To Reopen Intensifies.

The AP (2/2, Kunzelman, Ramer) reports, "Pressure is building on school systems around the U.S. to reopen classrooms to students who have been learning online for nearly a year, pitting politicians against teachers who have yet to be vaccinated against COVID-19." Even as "some communities maintain that online classes remain the safest option for everyone," parents, politicians, and administrators "have complained that...children's education is suffering from sitting at home in front of their computers and that the isolation is damaging them emotionally." They have also "argued...that reopening schools would enable parents to go back to work." The CDC has found that there is little evidence of transmission when schools observe public health measures. However, "many teachers have balked at returning without getting vaccinated first against the scourge that has killed over 440,000 Americans."

WPost Analysis: Cardona Won Education Nomination Through Push To Reopen Schools. The Washington Post (2/2, Meckler, Anderson, 10.52M) reports that Education Secretary-designate Cardona last summer pushed districts in Connecticut "hard to return to five days a week," and "saw all but one school district in his state adopt some flavor of in-person education in the fall" despite "noisy protests" from teachers and nationwide online learning. The Post says, "That record helped pluck the 45-year-old schools commissioner out of seemingly nowhere to become President Biden's nominee," as the President has named opening schools as one of his top priorities. Cardona, who "faces a Senate confirmation hearing Wednesday," has the support of both large teachers unions in his state, with leaders "saying he maintained productive and cordial relationships" during discussions about reopening despite disagreements.

WSJournal: Biden Is Absent On Reopening Schools. The Wall Street Journal (2/2, Subscription Publication, 8.41M) editorializes that the Biden Administration's pledge to follow the science is being undermined in regard to schools reopening, arguing that the President is absent in supporting local government officials battling teachers unions that have resisted calls to return to in-person learning despite data that suggests it is safe to do so.

States Look To Reallocate Unused Doses From Nursing Homes.

The New York Times (2/2, Fausset, 20.6M) reports that a number of states, including Maine, Michigan, Minnesota, Missouri, Ohio, and Oklahoma, are shifting supplies from the Pharmacy Partnership for Long-Term Care Program after discovering "a big logistical problem." The federal program allocated "thousands of precious doses...for nursing home patients that [were] not using them all," leaving "tens of thousands of doses...sitting untouched in freezers." The Times says the shift is "a telling example of how chaotic the inoculation effort in the U.S. has been so far," in part due to "a formula that turned out to significantly overestimate how many shots would be needed for long-term care facilities." Distribution also saw trouble with "a considerable number of residents" and staff "turning down" vaccinations.

Anti-Vaccine, Anti-Mask Activists Find Converging Ideologies.

The Wall Street Journal (2/2, A1, Pulliam, McKay, Maher, Subscription Publication, 8.41M) reports that anti-vaccine and anti-mask activists are combining efforts to protest for what they call "health freedom," signaling mistrust in government and pharmaceutical companies. Officials are increasingly concerned that the groups, including state lawmakers, are spreading misinformation and impeding efforts to get the COVID pandemic under control.

LAPD Warns Of Arrests After Anti-Vaccine Protest At Dodger Stadium. The Los Angeles Times (2/2, Rector, 3.37M) reports that "days after anti-vaccination and far-right protesters disrupted operations at one of the nation's largest COVID-19 vaccination sites at Dodger Stadium, Los Angeles Police Chief Michel Moore on Tuesday said any such protests in the future would be met with quick arrests." Moore said that demonstrations will be restricted to an area near the entrance in order to respect the protesters' First Amendment rights while continuing operations at the site without interruption. The pledge follows "outrage from local officials who demanded that no incident like the one over the weekend be allowed to happen again."

Cuomo Set To Open Restaurants Despite Worsening Case Counts.

The New York Times (2/2, Keefe, 20.6M) reports that on Friday, New York Gov. Andrew Cuomo (D) indicated that New York City "could reopen indoor dining on Feb. 14, typically a busy day for the restaurant industry." According to the Times, "As the governor spoke, average per-capita case counts in New York City were 64 percent higher than when he announced an indefinite ban on indoor dining in December." The Times says "the decision to reopen indoor dining came amid growing criticism of the governor for scorning the expertise of public health officials over the advice of the business lobby."

WPost Criticizes Michigan Restaurants For Ignoring Restrictions.

An editorial in the Washington Post (2/2, 10.52M) says more than 60 restaurants in Michigan are openly ignoring pandemic restrictions. The restaurants "formed Stand Up Michigan, a group that held rallies against pandemic restrictions." The Post says Stand Up Michigan "has taken the defense of rights too far. Personal freedom does not mean the right to endanger others. ... It is absolute madness to encourage the kind of behavior – indoor dining at restaurants – that will spread the disease and lead to sickness and death."

Russian Vaccine Found To Be 91.6% Effective.

The New York Times (2/2, Kramer, 20.6M) reports Russia "cleared a hurdle in its vaccine rollout on Monday with the publication in the respected British medical journal The Lancet of late-stage trial results showing that the country's Sputnik V vaccine is safe and highly effective." The Times says that while Russia "drew criticism from Western experts when it approved the vaccine for emergency use in August – before late-stage trials had even begun – and started vaccinations that month," the peer-reviewed article "cleared those doubts. It showed the vaccine had an impressive efficacy rate of 91.6 percent against the virus and was completely protective against severe forms of Covid-19." According to Reuters (2/2, Ivanova), "Experts said the Phase III trial results meant the world had another effective weapon to fight the deadly pandemic and justified to some extent Moscow's decision to roll out the vaccine before final data had been released." Reuters says the results from the Gamaleya Institute in Moscow "were in line with efficacy data reported at earlier stages of the trial, which has been running in Moscow since September."

CNN (2/2, Rahim, 89.21M) reports on its website that the findings "are based on data gathered from 19,866 participants, of which around three-quarters (14,964) received two doses of the vaccine and a quarter (4,902) were given a placebo. Sixteen cases of symptomatic Covid-19 were confirmed in the vaccine group 21 days after participants received the first vaccine dose. Sixty two cases were found in the placebo group – equating to an efficacy of 91.6%." Politico Europe (2/2, Martuscelli, 15K) reports the Sputnik V vaccine "is based on an adenoviral vector, which involves using a modified version of the common cold to induce cells to produce the spike protein found on the coronavirus." Politico adds the Russian vaccine "is distinguished from Oxford/AstraZeneca's shot – which is based on similar technology – because it uses two different viruses in each shot."

The Wall Street Journal (2/2, Kantchev, Subscription Publication, 8.41M) says the "peer-reviewed study" is "handing Moscow a geopolitical coup and a potential slice of the multibillion-dollar vaccine market as it seeks to promote the Covid-19 shot abroad and curb the pandemic at home." The Journal also says the "the endorsement of Sputnik V presents a significant victory for Russian President Vladimir Putin in the global vaccination race, providing a vote of confidence in the capability of Russian science and medicine and helping to deflect some of the criticism Moscow encountered for its fast-tracked development of the vaccine and lack of published trial data."

However, NIAID Director Fauci said on MSNBC (2/2, Hayes, 2.69M), "It's really very good news about the success of the Russian trial, which showed more than a 90% efficacy. That's exactly what you want. You want to get the virus suppressed throughout the world, because when you're dealing with a pandemic, if there's a good degree of infection and spread in any part of the world, it's always a threat to where you are."

Mexico Poised To Approve Russian Vaccine. The AP (2/2, Delgado) reports Mexico is "on the verge of approving the Russian COVID-19 vaccine Sputnik V following the publication of early results of an advanced study, Mexican officials said Tuesday."

France Declines To Administer AstraZeneca Vaccine To People Over 65.

The AP (2/2) reports France "will only administer the AstraZeneca coronavirus vaccine to people under age 65, President Emmanuel Macron said Tuesday after the government's health advisory body cited a lack of sufficient data about its effectiveness in older people." According to the AP, the decision "could shake up the French vaccination strategy, because the country has prioritized nursing home residents and people over 75," and because France "had counted on the AstraZeneca vaccine for a large part of its upcoming inoculations, until the company announced delays affecting countries around Europe and the world."

UK Officials Identify Presence Of South African Variant.

The New York Times (2/2, Kwai, 20.6M) reports that "painfully aware of the dangers posed by mutations of the coronavirus after a variant fueled a surge in deaths this winter," the UK "has sounded a full-scale alarm over the detection of another variant, this one first registered in South Africa." The Times adds that in "one of the largest concerted testing efforts in the country since the outbreak of the pandemic, the British authorities dispatched mobile units and began testing for 80,000 residents living in areas where the variant had been detected,” and “as of Monday, health officials had identified 105 cases of the variant in Britain, including in London, with 11 of them not linked to international travel.” According to the Washington Post (2/2, Achenbach, Booth, 10.52M), “The worrisome mutation, at a site on the virus RNA called E484K, has drawn close scrutiny from infectious-disease experts, who have given it the nickname ‘Eeek.’” The Wall Street Journal (2/2, Steinhauser, Sugden, Subscription Publication, 8.41M) reports vaccines appear to be less effective than this variant and as a result could make it more difficult to overcome the pandemic.

Portuguese Hospitals Struggling Amid Spike In COVID Patients, Deaths.

The New York Times (2/2, Minder, 20.6M) reports hospitals in Portugal are “overwhelmed,” as the country “is in the grips of its worst crisis of the pandemic.” According to the Times, Portugal “has recorded 12,757 total coronavirus-related deaths, 5,576 of those in the last month alone,” and the country has “the highest death rate in Europe.” The Times adds hospitals are “being forced to turn away critically ill patients,” and “those who do show up at hospitals in Lisbon are finding a system on the brink, with scores of people lining up outside and waiting for treatment in ambulances.”

African Countries Confront Increasing Deaths Amid Struggle To Obtain Vaccines.

An AP (2/2, Meldrum, Mutsaka) article headlined “African Countries Scramble To Bury Virus Dead, Get Vaccines” highlights that South Africa has begun turning shipping containers into “overflow mortuaries,” even as “some other African nations are now looking to China for the next wave of vaccine doses.”

Senate Opens Debate On Budget Resolution 50-49 As Biden Seeks “Big, Bold Package.”

The CBS Evening News (2/2, story 5, 0:55, O’Donnell, 4.87M) reported President Biden “is signaling he does not intend to negotiate the terms of his COVID relief bill. He came out of Monday’s nearly-two-hour meeting with Senate Republicans determined to go big.” CBS’ Ed O’Keefe said the President is “pushing ahead with his nearly $2 trillion COVID relief plan, telling Senate Democrats in a lunchtime call that the Republican counteroffer, $600 billion, isn’t enough for this crisis. ... Democrats are trying to fast-track the President’s proposal, with or without Republican support.” Senate Minority Leader McConnell, “who once used the same tools to push through a $1.5 trillion tax cut, criticized the Democrats.” McConnell: “They’ve chosen a totally partisan path. I think that’s unfortunate.”

White House Communications Director Kate Bedingfield said on CNN (2/2, 3.06M), “President Biden’s hope is that we are still going to get Republican support for this package. What he is unwilling to do, though, is to slow the process down, or to put forward a package that he doesn’t believe meets the needs of the moment or the needs of this crisis.” Asked about the possibility of targeting stimulus checks, Bedingfield said the President “has signaled that he is open to looking at tailoring the checks, but he strongly believes that these $1,400 checks...need to get out the door to the people who need them.”

Reuters (2/2) reports the Senate “voted on Tuesday to open debate on a budget resolution, starting a process that would allow Democrats to pass [Biden’s] proposed $1.9 trillion coronavirus aid bill without Republican support.” Bloomberg (2/2, Wasson, 3.57M) reports, “With a 50-49 vote Tuesday, the Senate opened debate on a budget resolution for the 2021 fiscal year, a maneuver that would clear the way for the president’s relief plan to pass in the chamber with a simple majority rather than the 60-vote threshold for most legislation.” The vote was along party lines, with Sen. Pat Toomey (R-PA) absent due to the snowstorm.

The Washington Post (2/2, Stein, Werner, 10.52M) reports that the White House is “open to narrowing eligibility for the next round of stimulus payments but not lowering those payments below $1,400 per person.” However, White House Press Secretary Jen Psaki indicated that Biden is “wary of limiting the income thresholds on the payments too dramatically.”

CNN (2/2, Hoffman, Foran, Nobles, 89.21M) reports on its website that Schumer said Biden told Senate Democrats “that he wants a ‘big, bold package’ on Covid-19 relief and that he told Senate Republicans that their $600 billion proposal is ‘way too small.’ It was a point [Psaki] reiterated during her briefing – there are certain ‘bottom lines’ that Biden wants to be in the next round of Covid-19 relief, including direct payments reaching more Americans than what the Republican proposal would include.” Psaki said, “His view is that at this point in our country, when one in seven American families don’t have enough food to eat, we need to make sure people get the relief they need and are not left behind.”

CNBC (2/2, Pramuk, 7.34M) reports on its website, “Democrats have contended they need to inject more money into the health and economic response as soon as possible.” Fox News (2/2, Dorman, 23.99M) reports on its website that from the left, Rep. Rashida Tlaib (D-MI) “is taking aim at President Biden’s White House, suggesting officials are needlessly stalling coronavirus relief for Americans.” She tweeted, “Quit messing around and send people the survivor checks we promised them.”

Sen. Jon Tester (D-MT) said on CNN (2/2, 1.99M), “I think it would be great to have a bipartisan bill to get through. I think that would be the best of all worlds. It would show that Congress can work. On the other side of the coin, I think it is also very important that we get a bill that moves the economy forward. If it can only be done with Democrats, so be it. But the bottom line is, it has to be done.”

In his New York Times (2/2, 20.6M) column, Jamelle Bouie says the Republican proposal “is just the Biden plan except worse – less comprehensive, less ambitious, less generous. And there’s no rhyme or reason to these cuts; it’s just stinginess for stinginess’s sake.” Paul

Waldman writes in the Washington Post (2/2, 10.52M) that Biden should “call the Republicans on their bluff. If they care so much about fairness that they don't want to see families with incomes over $100,000 get a stimulus check, he should agree to that demand, but only if they'll boost the minimum wage to $11.”

Manchin Votes To Move Forward Via Reconciliation. The New York Times (2/2, Fandos, Haberman, 20.6M) reports that on Tuesday, Sen. Joe Manchin (D-WV) “said he would vote to move forward with the budget process.” Fox News (2/2, 23.99M) says on its website that Manchin “bowed to immense pressure Tuesday and announced he would vote in favor” of the budget resolution, “but would continue to fight for bipartisanship in the process of negotiations.” Manchin told reporters, “The resolution I'm going to support – this process. I only support this if it's an open process. But it is urgent. This is the only way we can get a bipartisan package.”

Roll Call (2/2, Krawzak, 130K) reports Manchin “has expressed concern about the size of the additional $1,400 rebate checks in Biden's plan, for instance, and on Tuesday he said he would support a higher minimum wage, perhaps $11 per hour, but not the $15 hourly wage Democrats have promised.” Marc Thiessen writes in the Washington Post (2/2, 10.52M) that Biden “needs every Democrat plus Vice President Harris to ram through his bill without any GOP support,” which means Manchin “has veto power. Now is the moment to exercise that power and prod Biden to live up to his rhetoric about unity and cooperation.”

Romney Says GOP Must Be “Consistent” In Arguments About Spending. In an interview with the Salt Lake \(UT\) Tribune (2/2, 284K), Sen. Mitt Romney (R-UT) said, “When we had a Republican president and House and Senate, we kept on spending massively and adding almost a trillion dollars a year to the national debt. Now we say this is outrageous adding so much to the debt? They say we did the same thing when we were in charge. It does show that you have to be consistent in your arguments.”

White House Officials Hope Biden's Executive Actions Will Build Momentum For COVID Relief Package. Politico (2/2, Korecki, Caputo, 6.73M) reports Biden has “institut[ed] a record 45 executive actions that fulfill campaign promises on everything from climate change to racial equity to immigration, undo a number of Donald Trump's policies, and have shaped the news cycle along the way.” Politico says White House aides are so firm in their belief that the actions have “helped build momentum for the president as he tries to sell a historic $1.9 trillion ‘rescue’ package” that “officials and allies are now practically daring Republicans to fight them, convinced that the public is firmly on the side of quick action.” However, there is “a broad sense among Republicans that Biden and Democrats will fall out of favor with voters.”

Vanden Heuvel: Biden Has Declared “The Era Of Small Government” Over. Katrina Vanden Heuvel writes in the Washington Post (2/2, 10.52M) that in Biden's first 10 days, he “has demonstrated that he intends to be a transformative, not a transitional president – launching initiatives that go beyond those of the Obama era. At long last, a Democratic president is declaring that the era of small government is over.” Biden, she adds, “is essentially announcing that the Washington consensus – one that favors deregulation, austerity and pro-corporate trade policies – is bankrupt.”

Study: Nearly $18B In Jobless Benefits Were Not Distributed Due To State, Federal Delays.

The Hill (2/2, Elis, 5.69M) reports according to a new study from the “left-leaning group” the Century Foundation, “almost $18 billion in unemployment aid was not distributed last month due to delays at the state and federal level, including former President Trump's decision to wait a week to sign a massive coronavirus relief measure.” The analysis “determined that a combination of factors at various levels of government has prevented crucial aid from being delivered to jobless Americans. Part of that was due to inaction by Trump, the study said.” Although the Labor Department “moved furiously to ensure that states could continue the benefits despite the lapse, the Century Foundation's analysis found extensive state-level delays in resuming benefits, as well as implementing new ones.”

More Women Lost Jobs Than Men During COVID Recession.

The CBS Evening News (2/2, story 7, 2:05, O'Donnell, 4.87M) reported the recession caused by COVID “is the first in which more women have lost jobs than men.” According to experts, “the true unemployment rate for women in America at the end of 2020 was 30%.” CBS' Adriana Diaz added, “Women held a majority of service jobs lost in the pandemic, and due to the demands of schooling, this fall, four times as many women left the workforce as men.” In December, “156,000 jobs were lost, all of them from women.”

Warren To Join Senate Finance Committee.

The Hill (2/2, Lane, 5.69M) reports Sen. Elizabeth Warren (D-MA) will become a member of the Senate Finance Committee, “which has jurisdiction over taxes, trade policy, health insurance, Social Security and safety net programs.” The Hill says the position will give Warren “a prominent platform to push forward progressive proposals on tax policy and health care.”

Roll Call (2/2, Lesniewski, 130K) says Warren, who is “known for her aggressive oversight of Wall Street and financial institutions, will remain a member of the Banking Committee.” Warren said in a statement, “I look forward to being a progressive voice at the table to secure meaningful relief and lasting economic security for struggling families, including as an aggressive advocate for accomplishing much of our agenda through the budget reconciliation process.” Warren also said she would advocate for “a wealth tax on fortunes over $50 million to fund needed investments for working families.”

Bezos Stepping Down As Amazon's Chief Executive.

The AP (2/2, Pisani) reports Amazon founder Jeff Bezos is stepping down as the company's CEO. In a blog post to employees, Bezos “said he plans to focus on new products and early initiatives being developed at Amazon." Bezos also "said he'll have more time for side projects: his space exploration company Blue Origin; the newspaper he owns, The Washington Post; and his charities." Bloomberg (2/2, Soper, Day, 3.57M) says Bezos "will step down from his post in the third quarter of 2021," and Reuters (2/2, Dastin, Rana) that he will be replaced by current cloud computing head Andy Jassy. The Seattle Times (2/2, Khashimova Long, 1.19M) reports Bezos "will transition to the role of executive chair of Amazon's board of directors." The Washington Post (2/2, Greene, Romm, 10.52M) calls the transition "the most radical shake-up in Amazon's corporate ranks in its nearly 30-year history."

USA Today (2/2, Guynn, Tyko, 12.7M) reports Bezos' "surprise announcement came as Amazon reported record fourth-quarter sales that topped $100 billion for the first time." The Wall Street Journal (2/2, Herrera, Subscription Publication, 8.41M) says the company reported $125.5 billion in fourth-quarter sales and net income of $7.2 billion. NBC Nightly News (2/2, lead story, 2:20, Holt, 6.35M) led with the story, and the CBS Evening News (2/2, story 8, 0:15, O'Donnell, 4.87M) and ABC World News Tonight (2/2, story 6, 1:35, Muir, 8.01M) provided similar coverage, along with the New York Times (2/2, Weise, 20.6M), Axios (2/2, Chen, 1.26M), and a website story from CNN (2/2, Duffy, 89.21M).

Exxon, BP Report 2020 Losses.

The AP (2/2) reports Exxon Mobil and BP "reported staggering losses for 2020 on Tuesday as the pandemic crushed energy demand and undercut oil prices." Exxon reported "the largest losses in its history – nearly $20.1 billion for the fourth quarter, including more than $19 billion to write down the value of company assets. For the full year, it lost $22.4 billion." While BP reports a fourth quarter profit of $825 million, it "still lost $18.1 billion in 2020." The results follow Chevron's report last week "that it lost $5.5 billion last year." The Wall Street Journal (2/2, Matthews, McFarlane, Subscription Publication, 8.41M) provides similar coverage.

The New York Times (2/2, Krauss, 20.6M) says "such painful years could become more commonplace as growing concerns about climate change, tighter regulations, and the rise of electric cars and trucks force a reckoning for an industry that has dominated the global economy over much of the last century."

Leonhardt: Economy Performs Better Under Democrats.

In a piece for the New York Times (2/2, 20.6M), David Leonhardt writes that there has been "a stark pattern in the United States for nearly a century. The economy has grown significantly faster under Democratic presidents than Republican ones." In part, this "surely involves coincidence," but "the pattern is so strong and long-lasting that coincidence alone is unlikely to be the only explanation." Leonhardt adds, "The pattern holds regardless of which party is running Congress. ... Over the last four decades, in fact, Republican presidents have run up larger deficits than Democrats." Leonhardt argues there is "one broad possibility with a good amount of supporting evidence: Democrats have been more willing to heed economic and historical lessons about what policies actually strengthen the economy, while Republicans have often clung to theories that they want to believe. ... Democrats, in short, have been more pragmatic."

Professor: GM's Clean Energy Pledge Will Have Broad Economic Impact.

In an op-ed for the New York Times (2/2, 20.6M), Jody Freeman, an environmental law professor at Harvard Law School, writes that the repercussions of GM's announcement "that it will stop making gas-powered cars, trucks and sport utility vehicles by 2035 and become carbon neutral by 2040" will "ripple broadly across the economy, accelerating the transition to a broader electric future powered by renewable energy." Freeman calls the move "a sea change" that "puts pressure on other auto companies, like Ford and Toyota, to make equally ambitious public commitments." In addition, it "may push the Biden administration to be equally daring when setting greenhouse gas and fuel efficiency standards for cars and truck, which Mr. Biden has promised to strengthen. It may also encourage the European Commission, now revising its 2030 standards, to aim higher."

Biden Reinstates Tariffs On UAE Aluminum.

The New York Times (2/2, Swanson, 20.6M) reports President Biden on Monday "reinstated tariffs on aluminum exported from the United Arab Emirates...reversing President Donald J. Trump's decision to lift them on his last day in office." It was "one of Mr. Biden's first significant moves on trade and suggests that his administration may be inclined to maintain the type of hefty tariffs Mr. Trump imposed on foreign metals to protect domestic industry." The Times says "that position found favor with unions and progressive Democrats, but disappointed industries and businesses that have argued the tariffs raise costs."

Senators Call On White House To Address Auto Chip Shortage.

Reuters (2/2, Shepardson) reports Senate Majority Leader Schumer, Sen. John Cornyn (R-TX), and 13 other senators on Tuesday "urged the White House to work with Congress to address the global semiconductor shortage that is hampering auto manufacturing." Reuters says automakers have been "shutting assembly lines due to problems in the delivery of semiconductors, which have been exacerbated in some cases by the former Trump administration's actions against key Chinese chip factories."

Senate Confirms Mayorkas As DHS Secretary On 56-43 Vote.

The Washington Post (2/2, Miroff, 10.52M) reports the Senate on Tuesday in a 56-43 vote confirmed Alejandro Mayorkas as DHS secretary, "ending what has been the most contentious confirmation process of Biden's cabinet picks." The Post adds Mayorkas "is the son of Jewish refugees from Cuba who goes by the nickname 'Ali,'" and the New York Times (2/2, Fandos, Haberman, 20.6M) emphasizes that he is "the first Latino and the first immigrant to hold that job." The Times highlights that Sens. Shelley Moore Capito (R-WV), Susan Collins (R-ME), Lisa Murkowski (R-AK), Rob Portman (R-OH), Mitt Romney (R-UT), and Dan Sullivan (R-AK) "voted with all the Democrats to confirm Mr. Mayorkas," who was "a former deputy secretary of homeland security as well as a former director of the department's legal immigration agency, Citizenship and Immigration Services," but the AP (2/2, Fox) reports the vote was "the narrowest margin yet for a Biden Cabinet nominee." According to the AP, "Biden's team had hoped to have Mayorkas confirmed by Jan. 20," but Sen. Josh Hawley (R-MO) had "placed a hold before the inauguration, forcing a delay in the confirmation vote."

The Hill (2/2, Beitsch, 5.69M) reports Hawley, "a possible 2024 GOP presidential candidate who objected to the Electoral College results," had "objected to Mayorkas over his statement that he would support Biden's efforts to stall construction of the border wall that was President Trump's signature issue." According to The Hill, "Hawley's decision to push back a vote on Mayorkas was controversial, angering not just Democrats but former DHS secretaries on both sides of the aisle who saw swift confirmation as critical while the U.S. is confronting several emergencies."

In addition, Bloomberg (2/2, Courtney, 3.57M) reports Senate Minority Leader McConnell "opposed Mayorkas' confirmation, saying he doesn't deserve a role in government after he turned U.S. Citizenship and Immigration Services into an 'unethical favor factory.'" Bloomberg says McConnell was referencing a 2015 DHS Inspector General's report that "faulted Mayorkas' heavy-handed approach while serving as the head of USCIS to visas for politically connected people including then-Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) and Hillary Clinton's brother, Anthony Rodham."

However, the Los Angeles Times (2/2, O'Toole, 3.37M) reports that Senate Majority Leader Schumer described Mayorkas' nomination as "history-making" and said his qualifications were "unassailable," while Roll Call (2/2, DeChalus, 130K) reports incoming Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Chairman Gary Peters "said Mayorkas couldn't come on board soon enough." The Wall Street Journal (2/2, Hackman, Mann, Subscription Publication, 8.41M) says his confirmation "ends nearly two years during which DHS has gone without a confirmed secretary or deputy secretary, a period marked by rapid personnel turnover and actions including the agency's intervention in protests last year in Portland, Ore."

Meanwhile, Politico (2/2, Rodríguez, 6.73M) says Mayorkas "is expected to get to work immediately, after attending an event at the White House on Tuesday afternoon where President Joe Biden signed three immigration-related executive orders." Politico adds Vice President Harris "did a ceremonial swearing-in for Mayorkas directly afterward." Fox News (2/2, Shaw, 23.99M) reports on its website that Mayorkas "takes control of the department at a time when it faces the challenge of the continued threat of violence in the wake of the Jan. 6 riots in Washington D.C., as well as the implementation of sweeping immigration changes by the Biden administration."

USA Today (2/2, Wu, Behrmann, 12.7M) also reports that as DHS secretary, Mayorkas "will lead a task force on family separation, focused largely on reuniting migrant parents and their children." Axios (2/2, Perano, 1.26M) reports Mayorkas will "further be tasked with addressing the SolarWinds cyberattack on the U.S., which intelligence says was conducted by Russian operatives."

Senate Confirms Buttigieg As Transportation Secretary On 86-13 Vote.

The New York Times (2/2, Verma, 20.6M) reports the Senate on Tuesday in an 86-13 vote "confirmed Pete Buttigieg, a former mayor of South Bend, Ind., and a 2020 Democratic presidential candidate, to be transportation secretary, putting in place the official who will help oversee President Biden's overhaul of the nation's infrastructure." The Times adds the vote "made Mr. Buttigieg, 39, the nation's first openly gay cabinet secretary to be confirmed by the upper chamber and Mr. Biden's youngest cabinet member." USA Today (2/2, Wu, Behrmann, 12.7M) reports incoming Senate Commerce, Science and Transportation Chair Maria Cantwell "praised him Tuesday as a 'young, energetic mayor' who could 'help us usher in a new era of transportation.'"

In addition, Politico (2/2, Snyder, Mintz, Beasley, 6.73M) highlights that in contrast to "after four years of leadership under former President Donald Trump's Transportation Secretary Elaine Chao, a Washington, D.C., insider who was notoriously unavailable to reporters," Buttigieg brings his "political celebrity and legion of super fans to a mammoth agency that's not used to headlines – unless they're jokes about 'Infrastructure Week.'" The Washington Post (2/2, Laris, Duncan, 10.52M) says that since Inauguration Day, Buttigieg has been in "a media blitz that offers a view into his role as transportation secretary and efforts to advance the Biden administration's broader agenda." The Post adds Buttigieg "has taken the new administration's broader message to people who might miss it," and, "in the process, he's seeking to expand views of what it means to be transportation secretary – a job Biden says will have an outside role in pushing his priorities but one that comes with sharp limits on formal powers."

The AP (2/2, Yen) reports that Buttigieg "takes over a Transportation Department with 55,000 employees and a budget of tens of billions dollars." The AP adds he has "pledged to quickly get to work promoting safety and restoring consumer trust in America's transportation networks as airlines, buses, city subway systems and Amtrak reel from plummeting ridership in the coronavirus pandemic." He is also "expected to play an important role in promoting Biden's sweeping green initiatives, helping to oversee stronger automotive fuel economy standards to reduce greenhouse gas emissions and support the president's push later this year on a $2 trillion climate and infrastructure plan." CNBC (2/2, Josephs, 7.34M) reports on its website that under Buttigieg, DOT "could become a driving or limiting force in the adoption of emerging technologies, specifically autonomous and electric vehicles."

However, Roll Call (2/2, Wehrman, 130K) labels Buttigieg as "an anomaly and a lingering sign of partisan strife: Of the other secretaries of Transportation dating back to the Carter administration, only Trump's nominee, Elaine Chao, received any opposing votes. Six senators voted against her in 2017."

Civil Rights Groups, Black Farmers Critical Of USDA Nominee Vilsack.

A Washington Post (2/2, Reiley, 10.52M) article titled "With Hunger Surging And Farms In Crisis, Biden's Controversial USDA Nominee Lays Out His Plans" says that if confirmed as secretary of agriculture, Tom Vilsack "will reprise his role in a political and economic landscape vastly different from that during his eight years in the same job during the Obama administration." The Post adds that while Vilsack "is expected to enjoy a smooth confirmation process with broad bipartisan support, he has come under criticism from civil rights groups and Black farmers who say he didn't go far enough last time to eradicate long-standing racial discrimination in farming and at the department."

Environmentalists Reportedly Concerned About Regan's Willingness To Work With Republicans.

The New York Times (2/2, Friedman, 20.6M) reports that Michael Regan's "willingness to reach across the aisle helped secure his nomination to be the next administrator of the Environmental Protection Agency," and "on Wednesday, Mr. Regan will testify before the Senate Committee on Environment and Public Works for his first test of whether he can win over Republicans in Washington as well." However, according to the Times, "environmental activists say a consensus approach is precisely what the E.P.A. doesn't need." The Times adds, "The next E.P.A. administrator must complete major new regulations on power plants, automobile tailpipes, mercury emissions and waterways – and be willing to anger Republicans in the process."

Senate To Hold Tanden Confirmation Hearing Next Week.

Politico (2/2, Emma, 6.73M) reports the Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee has scheduled its first confirmation hearing for Neera Tanden for next Tuesday, where senators will "press the nominee on her plans for leading the Office of Management and Budget," though the Senate Budget Committee "has yet to schedule a confirmation hearing." Politico says that while the President and CEO of the Center for American Progress "is expected to face an easier path to confirmation now that Democrats hold a narrow majority in the Senate, she will likely field tough questions from Republicans and a more partisan vote than some of Biden's other nominees, like Treasury Secretary Janet Yellen, whose nomination sailed through the upper chamber with bipartisan support."

Biden Considers Rahm Emanuel For Ambassador Role, Sources Say.

NBC News (2/2, Lederman, Lee, 4.91M) reports on its website that President Biden "is considering former Chicago Mayor Rahm Emanuel for a high-profile ambassadorship, potentially to China, three people with knowledge of the discussions said," or to Japan, but Fox News (2/2, Singman, 23.99M) reports on its website that when asked about the report, the National Security Council "told Fox News that they do not have any personnel announcements to make at this point." According to Fox News, there has been "speculation around Biden appointing Emanuel to some sort of role in his Cabinet or his administration for months."

Austin Dismisses DOD Advisory Boards, Including Controversial Trump Appointees.

The Washington Post (2/2, Ryan, Lamothe, 10.52M) reports Defense Secretary Austin on Tuesday "suspended the work of dozens of Pentagon advisory boards and asked hundreds of appointees to step down in what officials described as partly an effort to counteract a flurry of appointments that took place in the Trump administration's final days." The Post adds Pentagon spokesman John Kirby "said that the work of more than 40 boards would be halted over the next five months while Austin conducts a 'zero-based review,' which also seeks to optimize the bodies' work."

Politico (2/2, Seligman, 6.73M) says the announcement, which was "first reported by The Wall Street Journal (2/2, Youssef, Subscription Publication, 8.41M), affects only members who were appointed by the defense secretary, or one of the civilian or military leaders of the armed services, not to those appointed by the president or Congress." According to Politico, "The ousting comes just days after Austin halted the in-processing of new members, effectively preventing a number of...Trump's acolytes, who were still completing paperwork and undergoing security checks, from actually serving on the panels."

The AP (2/2, Baldor) says Austin's action "essentially purg[es] several dozen who were appointed last-minute under the Trump administration." According to the AP, former Acting Defense Secretary Christopher Miller had "removed a number of longtime members from several defense policy, health, science and business boards and replaced many with loyalists of former President Donald Trump," and now "more than 30 of those replacements will...be forced to resign, including former GOP House Speaker Newt Gingrich, retired Brig. Gen. Anthony Tata and former Trump campaign manager Corey Lewandowski." However, Reuters (2/2, Ali) reports the review "does not affect at least two well-known Trump aides: Sean Spicer, a former White House spokesman who was appointed to the Naval Academy Board of Visitors, and Kellyanne Conway, a senior Trump aide who was appointed to the Air Force Academy Board of Visitors."

FBI Investigating After Two Agents Killed, Three Others Shot While Serving Warrant In Florida.

Norah O'Donnell opened the CBS Evening News (2/2, lead story, 3:00, 4.87M) by reporting on a "bloody shoot-out in a quiet neighborhood north of Miami," that has left "two veteran FBI agents...dead and three others...shot after they were ambushed outside of an apartment complex in sunrise, Florida. The shooter, who was being investigated on child pornography charges, reportedly used a doorbell video camera to watch the agents approach his home before blasting gunfire through his unopened front door." O'Donnell added the shooter "is dead after a standoff that shut down traffic and locked down parts of the city and the entire FBI is reeling, trying to figure out how a routine operation turned into a horrible massacre." Manuel Bojorquez continued that President Biden "expressed his condolences to the families of those agents on this, one of the deadliest days for the FBI in decades."

On NBC Nightly News (2/2, story 2, 1:35, Holt, 6.35M), Sam Brock reported Tuesday "is now the deadliest day for the FBI since 9/11 and the first time that two FBI agents have been killed in the line of duty in more than 30 years, since south Florida in 1986," while Reuters (2/2, Lynch, Hosenball, Chiacu) highlights that the last fatal shooting of an FBI agent on duty "was on Nov. 19, 2008, which also unfolded during the execution of a warrant."

On ABC World News Tonight (2/2, lead story, 2:50, Muir, 8.01M), Victor Oquendo said sources "tell us there is no such thing as executing a safe warrant. When you enter a home, a hallway can create a bottleneck. Law enforcement describes that as a fatal tunnel." The New York Times (2/2, Diaz, Goldman, 20.6M) reports a law enforcement official "said it appeared [the suspect] killed himself before agents were able to arrest him." According to the Times, "His identity was not released until his family could be notified of his death."

Law enforcement sources told the Miami Herald (2/2, Neal, Rabin, Weaver, Ovalle, 647K) that the gunman "is believed to have monitored the approach of the agents with a doorbell camera and ambushed them through the unopened door with a hail of bullets from an assault-style rifle." CNN (2/2, Campbell, Levenson, Flores, Weisfeldt, 89.21M) reports on its website that the FBI "said its Inspection Division is investigating the shooting."

Meanwhile, the AP (2/2, Spencer, Balsamo) reports FBI Director Wray has "identified the two slain agents as Daniel Alfin and Laura Schwartzenberger, both of whom specialized in investigating crimes against children." The AP adds that Schwartzenberger, 43, "had been an agent with the FBI since December 2005 and worked in the Miami field office on a squad of agents handling violent crimes against children, according to court records," while Alfin, 36, "who also investigated child exploitation cases, had previously worked at FBI headquarters handling major cases involving violent crimes against children, according to court records."

The Washington Post (2/2, A1, Zapotosky, Firozi, 10.52M) reports Wray in a statement said Alfin and Schwartzenberger "exemplified heroism today in defense of their country. The FBI will always honor their ultimate sacrifice and will be forever grateful for their bravery. We continue to stand by our FBI Family, and the families of these Special Agents, in the days to come, bringing every resource we can to get through this together." The Wall Street Journal (2/2, Gurman, Campo-Flores, Subscription Publication, 8.41M) provides similar coverage.

The Hill (2/2, Chalfant, 5.69M) reports the President said, "I can only imagine how these families are feeling today." Biden continued, "One of the things when you're in a combat zone of the military or you're an FBI agent or a police officer, every family ... dreads the possibility of a call, receiving that phone call." He added, "My heart aches for the families." According to the President, "They put their lives on the line and it's a hell of a price to pay."

Fox News (2/2, Rambaran, 23.99M) reports on its website that lawmakers "also offered their condolences." Sen. Marco Rubio (R-FL) said, "Our prayers are with their families and the three agents who were injured in the cowardly attack." Rubio added, "It serves as yet another reminder that the courageous members of our law enforcement community put their lives on the line every day to make our communities safer from the type of sick, depraved people who would exploit and prey on our children."

Manhattan DA Considers Prosecuting Bannon For Border Wall Fundraising Scheme.

The Washington Post (2/2, Jacobs, 10.52M) reports the Manhattan District Attorney's Office "is weighing whether to bring a state court case against Stephen K. Bannon, who was indicted on federal fraud charges for his role in a fundraising scheme to build a border wall but received a last-minute pardon from President Donald Trump, according to people familiar with the matter." According to the Times, Bannon "and three others were charged by federal prosecutors in Manhattan with falsely claiming that they would not take compensation as part of their 'We Build the Wall' fundraising campaign to underwrite part of the construction of a wall on the U.S.-Mexico border. The three others charged with Bannon were not pardoned by Trump."

New Port Richey, Florida, Police Charged Only BLM Activists After Clash With Proud Boys.

The Washington Post (2/2, Craig, 10.52M) reports that when local Black Lives Matter activists "started marching through the small, coastal town of New Port Richey, Fla., last summer – shouting slogans through bullhorns demanding racial justice – it took only a few days for the Proud Boys and other counterprotesters to show up and confront them," and police subsequently "started enforcing the town's rarely used noise ordinance, which essentially forbids disturbances louder than a close conversation between two people. But only the Black Lives Matter protesters were cited." The Post says police last month "dropped the citations," but "not before the Tampa-suburb became another front in the national debate over whether authorities treat left-wing protesters too harshly while cozying up to far-right extremists."

Six Arrestees Recount "Abuse By Officer Who Knelt On George Floyd."

Under the headline "'Don't Kill Me': Others Tell Of Abuse By Officer Who Knelt On George Floyd," the New York Times (2/2, A1, Lartey, Vansickle, 20.6M) reports that in "interviews with The Marshall Project, three people who were arrested by" Minneapolis police officer Derek Chauvin "and a witness in a fourth incident described him as an unusually rough officer who was quick to use force and callous about their pain." According to the Times, "The interviews provide new insight into the history of a police officer whose handling of Mr. Floyd's arrest, captured on video, was seen around the world and sparked months of protests in dozens of cities."

Football Team Faces Protests After Addition Of Officer In Tamir Rice Shooting.

The New York Times (2/2, Eligon, 20.6M) reports the involvement of Timothy Loehmann, the white police officer who fatally shot 12-year-old Tamir Rice in 2014, with the Cleveland Warriors has prompted protests against the team this week by fellow players and the community. However, according to the Times, "Loehmann is still trying to regain his job as a Cleveland police officer – he is currently appealing his firing in state court," and his lawyer, Henry Hilow, "said it was unfair for people to criticize Loehmann for being on the football team."

Education Department Orders Navient To Repay $22.3M To Government.

The New York Times (2/2, Cowley, 20.6M) reports that Acting Education Secretary Zais has ordered Navient, the federal loan servicing arm of Sallie Mae, to repay $22.3 million after a 2009 investigation by the department's inspector general found that the company overcharged the government for student loan subsidies. The overpayments "were brought to light when an Education Department whistle-blower raised alarms during President George W. Bush's administration about a tactic multiple student loan financiers had adopted to manipulate a subsidy program intended to incentivize lending." The Times says, "The unpaid debt has long been a sore point for progressive lawmakers like" Sen. Elizabeth Warren (D-MA), "who frequently have blasted the department for leaving the money uncollected."

Media Analyses: Biden's Immigration Orders Disappoint Migrant Advocates.

ABC World News Tonight (2/2, story 5, 0:50, Muir, 8.01M) reported that "President Biden [is] taking new executive action tonight. This time, rolling back Trump Administration immigration policies," including the "family separation policy." The President is "creating a task force to reunite migrant children with their parents." ABC's Mary Bruce added, "Some advocates are critical of the President, saying he's not doing enough here, but Biden says by creating this task force, he's just taking the first step to try and undo what he calls the, quote, 'moral and national shame' caused by the previous Administration."

On the CBS Evening News (2/2, story 6, 1:05, O'Donnell, 4.87M), Ed O'Keefe reported that President Biden "is trying to reverse some of the former President's most controversial decisions regarding immigration." New executive orders signed Tuesday "seek to reunite about 600 children separated from their parents under President Trump's zero-tolerance border crackdown," and "to reverse the Trump-era policy requiring thousands of asylum seekers to stay in Mexico as their cases are processed." However, O'Keefe added, "The White House said today the changes are not an invitation for migrants to start heading towards the US border." The majority "of the changes set in motion by the President today...will be overseen by" DHS Secretary Mayorkas, who "is the first immigrant to oversee the department responsible for most immigration policy."

The Washington Post (2/2, Miroff, Kim, Sacchetti, 10.52M) reports, "President Biden signed executive actions Tuesday ordering the review and potential reversal of the Trump administration's deterrent policies along the Mexico border and the barriers it created to legal immigration, calling his predecessor's actions 'very counterproductive to our security.'" Biden's orders "also create an interagency task force to reunite families separated by former president Donald Trump's 'zero tolerance' border crackdown." However, according to the Post, "senior administration officials...acknowledge that some of Trump's border control measures will remain in place for the time being in a sign of their concern about a new migration wave building in the middle of the pandemic."

The New York Post (2/2, Nelson, 7.45M) reports that President Biden said, "There's a lot of talk, with good reason, about the number of executive orders that I signed. I'm not making new law, I'm eliminating bad policy." The President said, "We're going to work to undo the moral and national shame of the previous administration that literally – not figuratively – ripped children from the arms of their families and mothers and fathers at the border, and with no plan, none whatsoever to reunify children."

Bloomberg (2/2, Fabian, Wingrove, 3.57M) reports that the remaining Trump policies are "a signal that the Biden administration is taking a cautious approach out of concern about inducing a surge in migration during the coronavirus pandemic." White House Press Secretary Jen Psaki said Tuesday, "This is not the time to come to the United States," as the Administration "needs some time" to set up a "humane" immigration system.

White House Communications Director Kate Bedingfield said on CNN (2/2, 3.06M), "The President today signed an executive order directing the...Secretary of the Department of Homeland Security to chair up this task force, to work to move quickly to begin...to undertake this daunting task of returning these children to their families. You know, there are approximately 600 to 700 children who need, desperately, need to be reunited with their families. We are moving as quickly as possible and we'll use every lever available to us to make this happen. This is all part of President Biden's commitment to restore humanity and humane values to our immigration policy."

Asked on MSNBC (2/2, 2.22M) about criticism that the orders fail to address families that have already been reunited outside the US, White House Deputy Communications Director Pili Tobar said, "We want to make sure that we address the harms that were done to these families, and this is why this task force is going to be working on looking at all of the options that are available and making recommendations to the President and to the Administration about what are the things that we can do. We expect them to give often their report back to the President in order for us to be able to make those determinations and to work across agencies and throughout the entire government to figure out what that will look like."

USA Today (2/2, Morin, 12.7M) reports that the task force created by the order will be led by Mayorkas and "will work to identify the children and parents or guardians who were separated at the border, facilitate and enable reunification of children with their families, and then provide a report to the president on recommendations to ensure that the federal government does not have policies in place that separate families, senior administration officials said." As of December, "there are still at least 628 parents who were separated from their children at the border that are still missing." The directives also "create a framework to address the underlying causes of migration" and reestablish "an Obama-era task force called the Task Force on New Americans to help integrate immigrants."

The New York Times (2/2, Shear, Kanno-Youngs, 20.6M) says the orders "help satisfy promises that Mr. Biden made on the campaign trail to reverse Mr. Trump's immigration agenda. But they also underscore the difficulty that the new president faces in unraveling scores of individual policies and regulations." The Times reports that, according to senior Administration officials, "most of Mr. Biden's directives...would not make immediate changes. Rather, they are intended to give officials at the Department of Homeland Security, the Justice Department and the State Department time to evaluate how best to undo the policies." The Times says that is "likely to disappoint advocates for migrants, who are eager for action that will help people immediately."

Reuters (2/2, Hesson, Holland) reports that Biden "mandated a review of the Migrant Protection Protocols (MPP), a Trump program that ordered 65,000 asylum seekers to wait in Mexico for their U.S. court hearings." According to Reuters, "The Biden administration has already stopped adding people to the program but has not yet outlined how it will process the claims of those already enrolled. 'I can't tell you exactly how long it will take to put in an alternative to that policy,' a senior administration official told reporters on Monday in response to a question about processing MPP enrollees."

The AP (2/2, Spagat) reports that the announcement brings "to nine the number of executive actions on immigration" the President has taken, though "details were thin" and the White House "warned that" an overhaul of previous policies "will take time, which may cause grumbling among some pro-immigration advocates." However, the AP goes on to report that the move demonstrates "that, just as Trump remade immigration policies from the White House, Biden can undo them with the stroke of a pen."

Likewise, Politico (2/2, Rodriguez, 6.73M) reports that "Administration officials' description of the task force falls short of what immigrant advocates and human rights groups have been urging the Biden administration to do." According to Politico, the ACLU "has called on the Biden administration to allow families to settle in the U.S., be given some type of legal status and offer funds for basic needs and medical care."

The New York Daily News (2/2, Sommerfeldt, 2.51M) reports that "while pleased that Biden took action to undo Trump's policies, lawyers who worked on family separation cases suggested he didn't go far enough." ACLU attorney Lee Gelernt said, "All 5,500-plus separated families need immediate action – they cannot wait 120 days for a task force to make recommendations. These families deserve citizenship, care and resources."

The Washington Post (2/2, Sieff, 10.52M) reports that the ACLU "says it's likely that at least 1,000...families remain separated – parents scattered mostly across Central America and children living with relatives in the United States." However, "because of poor government record keeping, it remains unclear how many parents were deported without their children and where they are currently living – a major challenge facing any reunion effort."

CNN (2/2, Alvarez, 89.21M) reports on its website, "The orders signed Tuesday largely direct reviews of policies and do not have an immediate impact, concerning immigration advocates and attorneys scrambling for answers on the future of migrants subject to Trump-era policies." FWD.us VP of Advocacy Alida Garcia said there is "frustration around the urgency that exists for service providers to have clarity in their ability to advise people in life or death situations," and added, "We hope to hear more hard logistics soon."

CNBC (2/2, Clark, 7.34M) reports on its website that a "senior Administration official" said, "President Trump was so focused on the wall he did nothing to address the root causes of why are people are coming to our southern border – it was a limited, wasteful and naive strategy, and it failed. People continue to migrate to the United States – even today – because of it. President Biden's approach is to deal with immigration comprehensively, fairly and humanely."

Fox News (2/2, Shaw, 23.99M) reports on its website that "the dramatic changes – on top of a slew of orders in Biden's first week...face stiff Republican opposition."

Tobar: Administration Is Committed To Ending Deportations. Asked on MSNBC (2/2, 2.22M) about criticism of ongoing deportations, Tobar said, "We made a commitment to stop deportations for the first 100 days. Obviously, we're seeing that this is still in motion and that...there's a pause on that at the time being, but our commitment is there. We are also trying to work with our champions in Congress. We sent a bill to Congress on day one, just like President Biden promised, and we're looking forward to working with Senate and the Congress to make sure that we can pass a bill that restores our immigration to a place of humanity, of decency, of justice, and also of order."

Fox News Report: Border Patrol Agents See Rise In Migrants At The Border. Fox News (2/2, Shaw, 23.99M) reports on its website that "the number of migrants along parts of the U.S.-Mexico border is increasing as they await what they hope are dramatic liberalizations in border security and immigration policy from President Biden – who has already taken significant action to reverse Trump-era policies." According to Fox, "Border Patrol agents from California to Texas told Fox News that they are seeing steady increases in apprehensions, especially among Central American families and unaccompanied children in their sectors – specifically the Rio Grande Valley and Tucson, Ariz., sectors." Fox adds, "One agent in Texas told Fox News that in three out of the last seven days, there were at least 800 arrests in their sector, up from about 450 a day just a few months ago."

Advocates May Propose Presidential Pardon For Undocumented Migrants. USA Today (2/2, Wagner, 12.7M) reports that as the President's "executive orders are not permanent, and the White House already has begun tamping down hopes for passage of an omnibus reform measure," some advocacy groups are "looking at an untested fallback plan: a mass presidential pardon for at least some of the estimated 11 million" undocumented people in the US. The League of United Latin American Citizens president Domingo Garcia said, "We believe this is a viable option if the Senate fails to act on comprehensive immigration reform." USA Today says, "It is unclear how Biden would respond" to such a proposal and, "moreover, not all immigrant-rights advocates want to pursue that controversial path while there is a chance Congress could act."

Cornyn Backs Texas Coalition To Grant Dreamers Legal Status. The Dallas Morning News (2/2, Benning, 772K) reports that the Texas Opportunity Coalition, a business group that launched Tuesday with backing from Sen. John Cornyn (R-TX), "is urging Congress to pass legislation that would provide permanent legal status to 'Dreamers.'" Cornyn said, "After years of being yanked around from court ruling to court ruling...these young men and women deserve certainty to be able to plan their future. The only way to do that is through legislation." The coalition is "hoping to capitalize on Joe Biden's ascent to the presidency and Democrats' control of the House and Senate. But their push is bipartisan, a nod to the tricky dynamics of getting immigration legislation passed," with a sole focus on DACA recipients.

San Francisco Chronicle Analysis: "Waiting Game" For Those Impacted By Muslim Travel Ban. The San Francisco Chronicle (2/2, Moench, 2.44M) reports that President Biden's "action on the first day of his presidency unraveled one of Trump's earliest and most contentious policies, which triggered chaos at airports and legal challenges all the way to the Supreme Court." The travel ban "from an evolving list of up to seven countries at a time" during the four years of Trump's presidency drew support from those who "argued that the ban protected the U.S. from terrorist attacks by foreign nationals, while its opponents argued it discriminated against Muslims and separated families trying to immigrate." While "those families are now rejoicing...lifting the ban is not a magic wand that opens borders, with an already arduous immigration system now backlogged with years of applications. For many, it's still a waiting game."

WPost: Biden Should Phase Out For-Profit Migrant Detention Centers. The Washington Post (2/2, 10.52M) editorializes that President Biden's announcement that "he would phase out federal contracts for privately run prisons" delivers "on half a campaign pledge but omit[s] the other, more difficult half – to also scrap privately operated migrant detention centers." The Post says the "administration's wavering has disappointed immigrant advocates, who have rightly called attention to substandard and occasionally appalling conditions" in such centers, and argues that "the president's instincts on the campaign trail were right and should remain the administration's goal: For-profit detention facilities, where pre-pandemic problems have burgeoned into humanitarian danger zones during the covid-19 era, should be phased out."

Bidens Pay Tribute To Sicknick At Capitol.

The AP (2/2) reports, "Slain Capitol Police Officer Brian Sicknick lay in honor Tuesday night in the U.S. Capitol, allowing his colleagues and the lawmakers he protected to pay their respects and to remember the violent attack on Congress that took his life." The President and First Lady "traveled to the Capitol to pay tribute to Sicknick shortly after the ceremony began Tuesday night, briefly placing his hand on the urn in the center of the Capitol Rotunda, saying a prayer and sadly shaking his head as he observed a memorial wreath nearby." Senate Majority Leader Schumer, House Speaker Pelosi, "and a handful of other congressional leaders also paid their respects."

The New York Times (2/2, Rogers, 20.6M) reports, "On Tuesday around 9:30 p.m., Mr. Sicknick's remains were delivered to a silent Capitol on a cold and windy evening. Officers from Mr. Sicknick's unit, some on mountain bikes, lined up near the steps outside." The memorial "was not open to the public, but police officers and lawmakers are scheduled to be given the opportunity to pay their respects before Mr. Sicknick is buried at Arlington National Cemetery." USA Today (2/2, Santucci, 12.7M) reports, "A viewing period for Capitol Police officers will last through the night. Members of Congress will be able to pay their respects beginning on Wednesday at 7 a.m., and congressional leaders will speak at a ceremony later Wednesday morning."

The Washington Post (2/2, Duggan, Flynn, 10.52M) reports Sicknick is "the fifth deceased person not a public official or military leader to lie in the Rotunda. Congress approved the honor for the Rev. Billy Graham in 2018; civil rights hero Rosa Parks in 2005; and two other members of the Capitol police force, officer Jacob Chestnut and detective John Gibson, who were killed in 1998 by a gunman in the building."

House Approves Fines For Lawmakers Who Refuse To Use Metal Detectors.

The New York Times (2/2, Edmondson, 20.6M) reports that the House of Representatives "voted on Tuesday night to begin fining lawmakers who refused to pass through metal detectors before walking onto the House floor, the latest move in a series of security measures taken after the deadly Jan. 6 riot at the Capitol." The proposal, "tucked in a procedural package of rules, will fine lawmakers who bypass the metal detectors installed outside the House floor $5,000 for a first offense and $10,000 for a second offense, with the amounts deducted directly from their salaries." The passage of the provision "infuriated many Republicans, who have argued that the measure is overly onerous and infantilizing for members of Congress to endure."

The Washington Post (2/2, Sonmez, 10.52M) reports, "The measure passed on a 216-to-210 vote, with all but three Democrats present voting in favor and all Republicans present voting 'no.'" House Rules Chairman Jim McGovern "defended the move in an impassioned floor speech in which he blasted the 'elitist mentality' of those who have ignored the screening procedures." McGovern said, "Some are acting as though by being elected to Congress, they have been anointed to some sort of special club – one that gets to pick and choose what rules to follow."

Capitol Riot Investigation Boosts Focus On Rioters Who Assaulted Police.

Citing interviews and court filings, the Wall Street Journal (2/2, Viswanatha, Ailworth, Subscription Publication, 8.41M) reports that investigators into the Capitol siege on January 6 are increasingly focused on identifying and charging rioters who assaulted or obstructed police officers using evidence from body camera footage, subpoenas, and search warrants. Authorities say at least 139 officers were assaulted during the riot, including 81 Capitol Police and 58 Metropolitan Police Department officers.

The Baltimore Sun (2/2, Fenton, 629K) reports that a search warrant for David Blair, who was "arrested at the U.S. Capitol on Jan. 6," reveals that "he swung a Confederate flag attached to a lacrosse stick at police officers." The FBI "says body camera footage shows Blair positioning himself between police and other protesters on the west lawn," and struck one "officer in the chest with his lacrosse stick." Police recovered Blair's bag, which "contained a knife" and tape. Blair said he carried the knife because he was "worried about Antifa and other people trying to jump me," and "said [the tape] was used to affix the flag to his lacrosse stick."

In an op-ed for the Washington Post (2/2, 10.52M), Richard B. Zabel, who oversaw terrorism prosecutions as deputy US attorney in the Southern District of New York from 2011 to 2015, writes that the US "faces a rising threat of violent extremism yet has no law targeting the problem." Currently, "a prosecutor cannot charge a defendant with domestic terrorism alone. Instead, prosecutors have to use other available statutes, such as firearms or assault statutes." Zabel adds that "the definition of domestic terrorism is too narrow, even if it were to carry criminal penalties." The definition "excludes common tools of terrorism such as criminal threats, non-life-threatening physical assaults, damage to property and other acts intended to intimidate or coerce," all of which "were on brazen display on Jan. 6" during the US Capitol riot. Congress, he argues, "needs to stand up."

NYTimes Analysis: Prosecutors Weigh Possibility Of Felony Murder Charges. The New York Times (2/2, Dewan, 20.6M) reports that since the attack on the Capitol on January 6, many "have been saying that the rioters have blood on their hands," leading to debate over felony murder charges. The limited provision, which "has raised a host of legal and moral questions about complicity and fairness," enables prosecutors to hold "a person who commits a crime responsible for any deaths that result." The Acting Attorney for the District of Columbia Michael Sherwin "has said that felony murder charges are among those under consideration in the sprawling federal investigation." However, the rule, which has been abolished in many other countries, "has been used in the United States in ways that have been widely decried," and any use in cases surrounding the riot "will be highly dependent on the facts that emerge and what prosecutors think a jury will accept."

Ginni Thomas Apologizes To SCOTUS Clerks After Riot. The Washington Post (2/2, Barnes, 10.52M) reports that "conservative political activist Virginia Thomas told her husband Justice Clarence Thomas's former law clerks that she was sorry for a rift that developed among them after her election advocacy of President Donald Trump and endorsement of the Jan. 6 rally in D.C. that resulted in violence and death at the Capitol." Thomas wrote to the Thomas Clerk World email list, "I owe you all an apology. I have likely imposed on you my lifetime passions." She continued, "Let's pledge to not let politics divide THIS family, and learn to speak more gently and knowingly across the divide." Multiple "former clerks, who spoke on the condition of anonymity because the listserv is private, verified the dispute in what is normally an affable setting."

The New York Times (2/2, Liptak, 20.6M) reports, "The former clerks, like many Republicans, were deeply split over whether Mr. Trump's efforts to overturn the election were legitimate." Thomas "has been an enthusiastic proponent of Mr. Trump and expressed support for the Jan. 6 rally in the days leading up to it," though "she has expressed no public views supporting Mr. Trump's false claims that the election was stolen." USA Today (2/2, Fritze, 12.7M) reports that Thomas' "apology comes at a time of reckoning for conservatives, who must decide whether to continue to embrace Trump or return to a more traditional Republican approach to politics," a debate that "is playing out visibly in the House of Representatives."

January 6 Rally Organizers Plan MAGA Tour Targeting Republican Lawmakers. ABC News (2/2, Steakin, 2.44M) reports on its website that organizers for "March for Trump," one of the groups behind "the Jan. 6 Trump rally that led to the deadly storming of the Capitol," are preparing "another series of events across the country, along with a recruiting effort to attract 2022 primary challengers against Republicans who they say 'betrayed' former President Donald Trump." March for Trump organizer Dustin Stockton "posted late last week" on the platform Substack "that he's launching a cross-country 'MAGA Sellout' tour" from February to May, especially "targeting Republicans who voted to impeach" Trump, including Reps. Liz Cheney (R-WY), Adam Kinzinger (R-IL), and Tom Rice (R-SC).

Judge Delays Guantánamo Arraignments Amid Pandemic.

The New York Times (2/2, Rosenberg, 20.6M) reports that on Tuesday, Col. Charles Pritchard, a military judge, "indefinitely postponed the arraignment of three prisoners at Guantánamo Bay who were scheduled to make their first court appearance in 17 years of detention, finding that the coronavirus pandemic made it too risky to travel to the Navy base." An "Indonesian prisoner known as Hambali, who has been held since 2003 as a former leader of a Southeast Asian extremist group, and two accused accomplices were scheduled to appear at the war court on Feb. 22." Pritchard is the latest military judge "to postpone a proceeding as too risky in nearly a year of cancellations over the coronavirus," and "suggested" in a seven-page order "that traveling to the base might not be safe until" fall.

Video Shows Greene Saying “Idiot” Parkland Survivor Is “Trained” Like “A Dog.”

NBC News (2/2, 4.91M) reports on its website that “a previously unreported video” shows Rep. Marjorie Taylor Greene (R-GA) “mock[ing] a Parkland shooting survivor as an ‘idiot’ who ‘only talks when he is scripted’ in a 2019 interview with a Georgia gun group.” In an April 2019 interview with Georgia Gun Owners, Inc. Greene said of David Hogg, “He is very trained. He’s like a dog. He’s completely trained.” Greene also “gleefully recounted her encounters with the teenage Hogg.” She said, “I confronted David Hogg twice and he ran away from me,” and she “bemoaned the ability of Hogg and other gun safety advocates to meet with lawmakers during a trip to the Capitol.”

Greene Liked Facebook Post Suggesting She Use Assault Rifle To “Clean House” In Congress. The New York Daily News (2/2, Sommerfeldt, 2.51M) reports Greene “indicated support on Facebook last year for using her assault rifle to ‘clean house’ on Capitol Hill.” On January 20, 2020, Greene posted a photo of herself “firing an MK18 assault rifle in a wooded area.” A Facebook user named Barry Wallace commented, “If she will do that in Washington, now that is how you clean house. If she does that their (sic) will be no pond to drain in Washington.” Greene “liked Wallace’s comment in response.” The Daily News says the post adds to “a tranche of disturbing social media posts for which the Georgia Republican is facing calls to be expelled from Congress.”

GOP Senators “Pile On” After McConnell Criticizes Greene. CNN (2/2, Zaslav, Raju, 89.21M) reports on its website that Republican senators “are losing patience” with Greene. After Senate Minority Leader McConnell “issued a rare and strong rebuke against the controversial Georgia lawmaker,” calling “looney lies and conspiracy theories” a “cancer” to the GOP, Republican senators “piled on.” Sen. Mitt Romney (R-UT) said, “I think our party has to make it very clear that she does not represent us in any way. ... Our big tent is not large enough to both accommodate conservatives and kooks.” Sen. Kevin Cramer (R-ND) “went as far to say Tuesday that he’d have a ‘hard time’ supporting Greene staying on the House Education and Labor Committee after she sided with the notion that the 2018 Parkland massacre was a “false flag” operation.” Cramer said, “Personally I’d have a hard time supporting, for example, her positions on the school shootings being staged and being on the Education Committee. ... Real authority has moral authority.” The Hill (2/2, Carney, 5.69M) also reports on Romney’s comments.

A Washington Post (2/2, 10.52M) editorial says McConnell’s statement “was reassuring: At least there is a battle over the soul of the Republican Party.” The Post adds that McConnell “is nothing if not shrewd, and presumably his statement also reflects a calculation that Ms. Greene and her type of politics are bad for the Republican Party. That provides some hope – however slim – that this once-proud party might return to its senses.”

Greene responded to the criticism in a tweet Tuesday. She wrote, “Too bad a few Republican Senators are obsessing over me, instead of preparing to defend President Trump from the rabid radical left. Focus on ending the witch hunt. Do your job!”

Republicans To Discuss Greene, Cheney In Private Meeting Wednesday. The New York Times (2/2, Edmondson, 20.6M) says Republicans “face a turning point on Wednesday as House leaders confront dueling calls to punish two members: one for spreading conspiracy theories and endorsing political violence, and the other for voting to impeach former President Donald J. Trump.” While Trump critics want to “strip [Greene] of her committee assignments for endorsing false claims, bigoted language and violent behavior, including calling for the execution of top Democrats,” Trump “loyalists want to strip” Rep. Liz Cheney (R-WY) of her leadership post “as payback for her vote to impeach.” The Times says their fates, “which are expected to be discussed at a private meeting among Republicans on Wednesday, are now a proxy battle for the party’s future, prompting a clash among its top leadership.”

The Washington Post (2/2, DeBonis, Kane, 10.52M) says House Republicans are “facing pressure to swiftly remove” Greene from two House committees. House Minority Leader McCarthy is “at the center of the pressure.” McCarthy, who “has maintained his position as the top House Republican leader by hewing closely to Trump and an evolving GOP electorate that eagerly embraced the former president’s hard-edge populism while casting aside much of the party’s conservative orthodoxy,” is “well-positioned to succeed [House Speaker] Pelosi...in the upcoming midterm elections, but he is now facing an intraparty crisis following the Capitol riot – one that some Republicans say has been exacerbated by McCarthy’s own vacillations in the four weeks since.”

A Wall Street Journal (2/2, Subscription Publication, 8.41M) editorial says if House Republicans choose to punish Cheney but remain silent about Greene, they deserve to remain in the minority.

DCCC Ads Tie Republicans To Greene And QAnon. The New York Times (2/2, Epstein, 20.6M) reports that “as Republicans splinter over how to deal with” Greene, “Democrats are seizing on the infighting to make her the avatar for an array of G.O.P. lawmakers.” On Tuesday, the DCCC “began a $500,000 advertising campaign on television and online tying eight House Republicans,” including McCarthy, “to Ms. Greene and QAnon, an effort to force them to make a public affirmation about Ms. Greene.” The Times adds, “Like the Republican ads that flooded the airwaves last year featuring grainy images” of Rep. Alexandria Ocasio-Cortez (D-NY), the Democratic ads feature Greene and Rep. Lauren Boebert (R-CO), “who has also expressed support for QAnon, as much as the candidates they are attacking.”

Ocasio-Cortez Says Capitol Riot Compounded Previous Trauma From Sexual Assault.

The New York Times (2/2, Glueck, 20.6M) reports Rep. Alexandria Ocasio-Cortez (D-NY) revealed Monday that “she was a sexual assault survivor, a disclosure she made during a strikingly personal and harrowing recounting of her experiences during the pro-Trump riot at the U.S. Capitol last month.” During an Instagram Live appearance, Ocasio-Cortez said, “I’m a survivor of sexual assault. ... And I haven’t told many people that in my life. But when we go through trauma, trauma compounds on each other.”

NBC Nightly News (2/2, story 7, 1:25, 6.35M) reported Ocasio-Cortez “shar[ed] a harrowing and emotional account of what happened to her during the Capitol riot. ... Afraid rioters were coming after her, she hid in a bathroom inside her private office.” Ocasio-Cortez: “And I’m like this. And the door hinge is right here. And I just hear, 'Where is she? Where is she?' I mean, I thought I was going to die."

USA Today (2/2, Dastagir, 12.7M) reports that following "her harrowing account of how she hid from a violent mob on Jan. 6, Ocasio-Cortez received an outpouring of support from colleagues and other survivors who saw themselves in her story. But some critics derided her and claimed she was weaponizing trauma for political gain." According to trauma experts, her "reaction is normal and expected, and her account aligns with what science shows happens to a mind and body under extreme forms of stress."

Robin Givhan writes in the Washington Post (2/2, 10.52M) that Ocasio-Cortez "had the tone of someone who had been told more than once that her concerns were an overreaction and that her fears about her safety were unfounded – which is to say that her voice rang with the exasperation that's familiar to so many women and people of color. She was the very definition of a rattled and shellshocked citizen, someone who had been through an acute trauma but one that had been brewing for a long time."

House Managers And Trump Defense Team File Briefs For Impeachment Trial.

All three broadcast networks covered the filing of briefs from both the House managers and the defense team in former President Donald Trump's impeachment trial, set to begin next Tuesday. On ABC World News Tonight (2/2, story 4, 2:45, 8.01M), David Muir said House Democrats "will argue the former president was, quote, 'singularly responsible for the deadly Capitol siege.'" ABC's Rachel Scott said Trump's lawyers say Trump "did nothing wrong, claiming when he told this to his supporters..." Trump: "We fight like hell. And if you don't fight like hell, you're not going to have a country anymore." Scott: "...that he was talking 'about the need to fight for election security in general.'" They say the First Amendment entitles Trump to 'express his belief that the election results were suspect,' claiming there is 'insufficient evidence' to prove him wrong. This is not true. There have been multiple audits and recounts, and judges rejected more than 60 lawsuits."

Kris Van Cleave said on the CBS Evening News (2/2, story 2, 2:25, O'Donnell, 4.87M) that Democrats call Trump "'singularly responsible' for inciting the assault on the Capitol January 6, while Mr. Trump's legal team argues his remarks that day are protected by the First Amendment. ... Trump's team also plans to argue his second impeachment trial is unconstitutional, since he's no longer president, a view not shared by most legal experts. His lawyers also plan to reference Mr. Trump's debunked claim of a stolen election, a move criticized even by Senate Republican jurors." Sen. Lindsey Graham (R-SC): "That's not a winning argument." Van Cleave: "Still, after 45 Republicans voted to dismiss the trial in a test vote last week, some Democrats see conviction as virtually impossible." NBC Nightly News (2/2, story 6, 1:55, Holt, 6.35M) similarly summarized the two sides' positions.

The AP (2/2, Tucker, Jalonick) says "the dueling filings offer the first public glimpse of the arguments that will be presented to the Senate beginning next week. The impeachment trial represents a remarkable reckoning with the violence in the Capitol last month, which the senators witnessed firsthand, and with Trump's presidency overall. Held in the very chamber where the insurrectionists stood on Jan. 6, it will pit Democratic demands for a final measure of accountability against the desire of many Republicans to turn the page and move on."

The New York Times (2/2, Fandos, Haberman, 20.6M) reports, "In an 80-page brief filed on Tuesday, the managers outlined the arguments they planned to make" next week," spinning a vivid narrative of a harrowing day when lawmakers were forced to flee as a violent pro-Trump mob breached the Capitol." In Trump's "own shorter filing, specked with typos and stripped of the former president's usual bombast, his lawyers flatly denied that he had incited the attack and repeatedly argued that the Senate 'lacks jurisdiction' to try a former president." USA Today (2/2, Jansen, 12.7M) reports, "Trump's team argues in the 14-page Tuesday filing that remarks Trump made about the election were protected by free speech and denied he played any part in inciting the deadly attack" at the Capitol.

The Washington Post (2/2, Gardner, Demirjian, 10.52M) reports, "The House's nine impeachment managers...argued that [Trump] is guilty of high crimes and misdemeanors, the threshold for conviction laid out in the Constitution, primarily because he used the powers of his office to advance his personal political interests at the expense of the nation." While Trump's attorneys "stopped short of embracing his baseless claims that the election was rigged, they defended his right to argue that massive fraud led to his defeat." The Wall Street Journal (2/2, Ballhaus, Hughes, Subscription Publication, 8.41M) reports that Senate Democrats "were watching to see whether the impeachment managers planned to focus solely on Mr. Trump's speech on the Ellipse the day of the attack or to argue that his remarks were part of a larger effort to stir up an angry mob."

Politico (2/2, Desiderio, 6.73M) reports that Trump's lawyers, Bruce Castor and David Schoen, "advanced the former president's false claims that the election results were 'suspect,' asserting that Trump has a First Amendment right to express that view. 'Insufficient evidence exists upon which a reasonable jurist could conclude that the 45th president's statements were accurate or not, and he therefore denies they were false,' Castor and Schoen wrote, adding that Trump 'denies' it is false to say he won the election 'in a landslide.'" The New York Daily News (2/2, Goldiner, 2.51M) notes that "Trump's legal team embarrassingly misspelled the word 'United' – you know, as in United States Senate – on the first page of their impeachment defense brief."

In an op-ed for the New York Times (2/2, 20.6M), Bob Bauer, who served as White House counsel to President Barack Obama, says the Republican argument "that a president can escape the consequences of egregious, impeachable conduct, and in particular disqualification from future office, so long as the Senate runs out of time to try the case before" a president's term ends "wholly misconstrues the text, history and structure of the Constitution's impeachment clause." Republican senators "are effectively seeking to establish a 'loophole' in the critical constitutional mechanism for holding presidents accountable for high crimes and misdemeanors."

Ruth Marcus writes in the Washington Post (2/2, 10.52M) that while Trump "will be acquitted because not enough Republicans will vote to make up the two-thirds majority needed for conviction," that "disappointing reality does not mean the trial will be a waste of time or even counterproductive. To the contrary...the magnitude of Trump's misconduct requires that the Senate proceed regardless of the outcome."

Marcus argues that “dropping the matter” would “represent an enormous collective shrug at Trump’s abuses.”

Jennifer Rubin writes in the Washington Post (2/2, 10.52M) that the impeachment trial “is necessary to remind the country of the Big Lie that Republicans embraced and the horrendous violence that ensued. It is necessary to force Republicans to make a choice: Support sedition, or support the Constitution.” Rubin argues, “The vast majority of Republicans will refuse to convict because it would mean acknowledging their own complicity in riling up the MAGA base.” Reuters (2/2), Bloomberg (2/2, Niquette, House, 3.57M), the Los Angeles Times (2/2, 3.37M), Axios (2/2, Perano, 1.26M), The Hill (2/2, Easley, 5.69M), and the CNN (2/2, Herb, Raju, 89.21M) website also have reports.

Kaine Drops Censure Effort, Citing Lack Of Support. USA Today (2/2, Elbeshbishi, 12.7M) reports, “After floating the idea last week of filing a motion to censure” Trump, Sen. Tim Kaine (D-VA) said Tuesday that he will not do so “due to the lack of support from his colleagues.” Kaine said, “We don’t have enough support on the Republican side because they don’t want to bar Trump from running from office and I don’t have enough support on the Democratic side because for most of my colleagues, it’s impeachment or nothing.” However, Fox News (2/2, Barrabi, 23.99M) reports on its website that Senate Majority Leader Schumer “left open the possibility Tuesday that Democrats could move to censure” Trump if he is not convicted. Schumer told reporters, “I think [Trump] should be tried. I hope he will vote to be convicted. Anything past that is something we can discuss, but he deserves conviction, nothing less.”

Wyoming Republicans Angry Over Cheney’s Impeachment Vote. The Washington Post (2/2, Samuels, 10.52M) reports that Rep. Liz Cheney (R-WY), “a star of the Republican Party widely seen as a potential future House speaker,” has “suddenly emerged as a vivid example of something completely different – a traditional Republican who may no longer have a home in a party dominated by Trump and the far right.” The Post adds, “No matter that she voted with [President] Trump more than 90 percent of the time,” her “reputation has boiled down to a simple question: whether she is for Trump or against Trump. And, as far as many people [in Wyoming] are concerned, with her Jan. 13 impeachment vote, Cheney staked her claim.”

Study: US Cities Undercounting Greenhouse Gas Emissions.

The New York Times (2/2, Schwartz, 20.6M) reports a study published Tuesday in the journal Nature Communications says US cities are undercounting the amount of greenhouse gasses they emit. The Times says the “average error is nearly 20 percent,” according to the study. The researchers “suggested that if that error was consistent across all American cities, the resulting annual missed emissions would be nearly one-quarter higher than those of the entire state of California.” The Times says since hundreds of US cities “have pledged to greatly reduce their greenhouse gas emissions, accurate measurement is an essential element of knowing where they stand and whether they are making progress toward meeting their goals,” but “there is not yet a consistent way for them to measure the amount of carbon dioxide or to gauge any reductions. The new research shows that voluntary efforts by cities to measure those emissions are inconsistent and flawed.”

MSNBC Leads Cable News Networks In Prime-Time, With Fox Third.

The AP (2/2, Bauder) reports, “Several programs on MSNBC and CNN had their most-watched months ever in January,” Nielsen said Monday. For the weekday prime-time schedule, “MSNBC averaged 3.31 million viewers, CNN had 3.12 million and Fox News Channel had 2.89 million. Fox has been the top-rated cable news network for 19 years, and this represented the first month it finished third to its rivals since 1999.”

WPost Analysis: Hannity “Working Through A Process.” The Washington Post (2/2, Ellison, Barr, 10.52M) has a feature on the role of Sean Hannity at Fox, writing that since President Donald Trump lost his reelection bid, Hannity “seems to have been working through a process, live and on camera. ... For a few weeks, it manifested as the denial shared by his fellow believers in the ex-president’s unsupported claims of election fraud.” After President Biden was sworn in, Hannity “pivoted to the next stage – anger. ... More recently, he has displayed something closer to depression, as he engages his viewers in a session of public mourning.”

Nevada Democrats Push For First-In-The-Nation Primary.

The AP (2/2) reports Nevada Democrats are making an effort to move their state to first in the presidential primary season “as early as 2024 – a timeline that reflects doubts that [President] Biden will seek a second term and early preparation for the possibility of a competitive nomination fight.” The “behind-the-scenes lobbying, led by former Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, seeks to capitalize on the party’s discontent with Iowa’s and New Hampshire’s performances last year.” The state is also considering switching from a caucus to a primary.

Progressive PAC Takes Aim At Manchin And Sinema, Up For Reelection In 2024.

Politico (2/2, Barron-Lopez, Otterbein, 6.73M) reports the “progressives” at the No Excuses PAC “are starting a search for candidates to challenge incumbent Democrats they say are standing in the way of ambitious action to end the coronavirus pandemic and revive the economy," primarily Sens. Joe Manchin (D-WV) and Kyrsten Sinema (D-AZ), "who aren't up for reelection until 2024." The New York Times (2/2, Medina, 20.6M) reports Arizona Democrats are expressing frustration with Sinema's moderate stance, as well as that of new Sen. Mark Kelly (D-AZ), and "are eager for their senators not just to embrace the middle, but also to adopt the policies the left is pressing for as well."

Under the headline "North Carolina Dems Brace For A Messy Senate Primary," Politico (2/2, Arkin, 6.73M) previews the open-seat 2022 race in that state, where state Sen. Jeff Jackson "entered the race last week with a splashy video promising a 100-county grassroots campaign and dismissing an agenda 'imported from D.C. or donors,' a not-so-subtle dig at the unsuccessful 2020 campaign." State Sen. Sydney Batch, former state Supreme Court Chief Justice Cheri Beasley, ex-DOT Secretary Anthony Foxx, Charlotte Mayor Vi Lyles, ex-state Sen. Erica Smith, and Attorney General Josh Stein are seen as other possible contenders.

Poll Shows Decline In Newsom's Popularity, But Skepticism About Recall Election.

The Los Angeles Times (2/2, Wilson, Luna, 3.37M) reports a UC Berkeley Institute of Governmental Studies shows California Gov. Gavin Newsom (D) has suffered a drop in popularity, "driven largely by dissatisfaction over the state's response to the COVID-19 pandemic and adding fuel to a Republican-led recall campaign." The poll "found that just 31% of those surveyed thought that Newsom and other state government leaders have done an excellent or good job handing the pandemic, while 23% said they have done a fair job, and 43% called it a poor job." However, the San Francisco Chronicle (2/2, Gardiner, 2.44M) reports the poll found that backers of the recall "still have an uphill climb. ... A total of 45% of registered voters who responded said they opposed a recall, versus 36% who would vote to remove the governor and 19% who were undecided." Fox News (2/2, McFall, 23.99M) reports on its website, "California Republicans say they have so far collected 1.3 million signatures, just shy of the 1.5 million needed by mid-March to prompt a mid-year election."

Schiff Reportedly Seeking Appointment As California AG.

Axios (2/2, Nichols, Goba, 1.26M) reports Rep. Adam Schiff (D-CA) "is quietly lobbying" California Gov. Gavin Newsom (D) "and his allies to appoint him California's next attorney general, according to people familiar with the matter." The job is being vacated by HHS Secretary-designate Becerra. Axios says if Newsom "selects Schiff, chair of the House Intelligence Committee and a confidant of Speaker Nancy Pelosi, House Democrats would lose a powerful party voice in the U.S. House and temporarily give up a seat in their slim 221-211 majority." But Pelosi "has given her approval to Schiff's bid, a clear sign she thinks she can manage without him, according to people familiar with the matter."

WPost Analysis: Dr. Biden Made Clear She Plans "To Make A Mark."

A Washington Post (2/2, McCarthy, Yuan, 10.52M) analysis says that within "two-and-a-half days on the job," the First Lady "made it clear that she intends to make a mark. And quickly." Dr. Biden has not only "long acted as her husband's conscience and confidant," playing an instrumental role in "his selection" of Vice President Harris, but has "indicated that she will also be proactive in her role as an avatar of the administration," as well as "her own priorities." Dr. Biden, who is also the "only first lady to hold a paying job outside the White House during her tenure," clearly defined "her main issues – military families, education and cancer resources" before arriving in the White House, "and in the early weeks of the administration, she's reinforced her interest in those issues with visible gestures."

IMF May Not Recoup $350M Emergency Aid Package Sent To Myanmar Days Before Coup.

Reuters (2/2, Lawder) reports the IMF last week "sent $350 million in cash to the Myanmar government, part of a no-strings-attached emergency aid package to help the country battle the coronavirus pandemic," days before "military leaders seized power and detained elected leader Aung San Suu Kyi and other elected officials, in what the U.S. State Department said on Tuesday constituted a coup." There seems to be "little the IMF can do to claw back the funds, part of rapid-disbursing COVID-19 financing programs with almost no conditions and approved by the IMF board on Jan. 13, sources familiar with the payments and international finance experts said." An IMF spokesperson said in an email, "We are following the unfolding developments closely. We are deeply concerned about the impact of events on the economy and on the people of Myanmar.”

Administration Says Burma Military Takeover Was A Coup, Will Review US Aid.

The Washington Post (2/2, Hudson, 10.52M) reports that the Biden Administration has concluded that the military takeover of Burma “constituted a military coup d'etat, triggering a review of U.S. assistance to the country, according to State Department officials.” The Post says the determination “represents the strongest move President Biden has taken since the military rolled through Myanmar's capital Monday.” On its website, CNN (2/2, Hansler, 89.21M) reports in a call with reporters, “a state Department officials” said, “After careful review of the facts and circumstances, we have assessed that Aung San Suu Kyi, the leader of Burma's ruling party, and Win Myint, the duly elected head of government, were deposed in a military coup on February 1. ... We continue to call on the Burmese military leadership to release them and all other detained civil society and political leaders immediately and unconditionally.”

Politico (2/2, Toosi, Seligman, 6.73M) says as a result of the designation, the US “will move to end the little direct financial aid it offers the country's government, State Department officials said. They added that U.S. assistance that goes directly to Myanmar's people, including civil society or persecuted Rohingya refugees, will continue, but that the U.S. will be undertaking a broader review of its aid to the country.”

The Wall Street Journal (2/2, Mandhana, Strobel, Solomon, Subscription Publication, 8.41M) reports that the transition from military rule to democracy in Burma was hailed as a strategic victory for the US, but Reuters (2/2, Pamuk, Lewis) calls the coup “a significant blow for the Biden administration and its effort to forge a robust Asia-Pacific policy to stand up to China.”

Reuters (2/2) reports that Suu Kyi's party, the National League for Democracy, “called on Tuesday for her immediate release.” Her “whereabouts remained unknown more than 24 hours after her arrest in a military takeover that derailed Myanmar's tentative progress towards full democracy.” The AP (2/2) reports that as of Tuesday, “hundreds of members of Myanmar's Parliament were under house arrest...confined to their government housing complex and guarded by soldiers.” A detained lawmaker “said he and about 400 others spent a sleepless night, worried they might be taken away, but were otherwise OK. ... He said Suu Kyi was not being held with them.”

A New York Times (2/2, Beech, 20.6M) analysis says Burma “presented a facade of democracy to the world,” but “the generals who had ruled the country for nearly half a century still dominated the economy and the halls of power.” By “reasserting their command, the generals have ripped apart a prized project: a carefully constructed political system decades in the making that allowed them to camouflage their fists behind a veneer of democracy.” The Washington Post (2/2, Mahtani, 10.52M) says the military leaders “appeared to have a plan for their coup. ... But a day after ousting the civilian government,” they “have not made clear what comes next.”

Biden Not Rushing To Engage With China.

Reuters (2/2, Brunnstrom, Lewis) reports the Biden Administration indicated Tuesday that “it is in no hurry to engage with China and would do so once it was in ‘lockstep’ with allies and partners.” During a briefing, White House Press Secretary Jen Psaki said “she could not say when a call might take place between Chinese President Xi Jinping and President Joe Biden, who has spoken to many world leaders since taking office on Jan. 20.” With the confirmation of Secretary of State Blinken, she added, “there are additional layers to engage with the Chinese.” Reuters adds Psaki “and State Department spokesman Ned Price said speaking to allies and partners came first.”

The New York Times (2/2, 20.6M) reports that “after learning that his wife had cancer, Yang Maodong, a prominent democracy activist in China, rushed to get a visa and air ticket to join her in the United States. But Mr. Yang never landed there.” According to the Times, “Border inspection officers at Pudong International Airport in Shanghai stopped him from joining a flight to San Francisco last week,” and “calls to his phone over recent days have not been answered.” The Times adds that Yang 's case “may become an early sign of how Beijing and the Biden administration handle contentious human rights issues.”

An hour later, the second bomb, in the northern part of the city, killed two people, including cleric Mohammad Atef, and wounded two others.” The AP says Atef “headed the central council of Jamiat-e-Eslah of Afghanistan, an Islamist nonprofit organization based."

AEI's Schieber: North Korea Stepping Up Efforts To Block Flow Of Outside Information.

In an op-ed for the Washington Post (2/2, 10.52M), Olivia Schieber of the American Enterprise Institute writes that as "life in North Korea looks likely to get even worse in the months ahead, the regime is doubling down on its efforts to prevent the flow of outside information into the country." Last year, North Korea "passed a slew of new laws to rein in what it calls 'reactionary ideology and culture.'" Schieber adds, "The regime has cause for concern. A 2019 study of 200 defectors showed that more than 90 percent had watched foreign or South Korean media before they defected." While the US and South Korea "are favored scapegoats for North Korea's woes," as North Korean leader Kim Jong-un's admission during last month's party congress that "his country is in crisis" and "the ruthless crackdown on information make clear, the power Kim fears most is his people's."

Navalny Sentenced To More Than 2 1/2 Years In Prison.

The AP (2/2, Litvinova, Isachenkov) reports a court in Moscow "ordered Russian opposition leader Alexei Navalny to prison for more than 2 1/2 years, finding that he violated the terms of his probation while recuperating in Germany from nerve-agent poisoning." The New York Times (2/2, Troianovski, 20.6M) says the decision is likely to send Navalny "for a lengthy term in a far-flung penal colony for the first time." While "the decision to send him to prison removes his direct voice from Russia's political landscape," it "could energize his supporters and further rally Russian opposition to [Russian President Vladimir] Putin around the figure of Mr. Navalny."

The Washington Post (2/2, Khurshudyan, Dixon, 10.52M) says Navalny "again accused Putin of ordering the nerve agent attack that nearly killed him in August and rejected the case against him – alleged probation violations – as political retribution less than three weeks after he returned to Russia." In "an emotional address to the court, Navalny said Putin would be remembered in history as a 'Vladimir the poisoner.'" Reuters (2/2, Tsvetkova, Osborn) reports Navalny supporters, "on hearing the ruling, encouraged people to gather in central Moscow though riot police had already taken up position. The Moscow metro shut down three central stations. Reuters reporters saw hundreds of protesters and the police detain some of them." Axios (2/2, Lawler, 1.26M) provides similar coverage.

The Wall Street Journal (2/2, Subscription Publication, 8.41M) reports Secretary of State Blinken said the US was "deeply concerned" by the sentence. Politico Europe (2/2, 15K) reports that "more than a dozen Western diplomats also attended Tuesday's hearing – which was open to the media but closed to film crews and photographers." Russia's Foreign Ministry "slammed their presence as an attempt at interfering with Russia's domestic affairs." ABC World News Tonight (2/2, story 7, 1:20, Muir, 8.01M) provided similar coverage.

A New York Times (2/2, 20.6M) editorial says while the ruling "would appear to be a clear victory for Mr. Putin," in "this David v. Goliath saga, the 44-year-old Mr. Navalny has succeeded through raw courage and perseverance in putting Mr. Putin on the defensive. The imprisonment was Mr. Navalny's move. Mr. Putin had tried for years to give him only brief sentences to avoid making him a martyr." By voluntarily returning to Russia, "and then releasing a devastating YouTube video showing the obscenely opulent palace Mr. Putin was building himself on the Black Sea, Mr. Navalny left the president little choice but to dispatch him to a labor camp, and thus transform him into a powerful symbol of resistance."

In an editorial, the Washington Post (2/2, 10.52M) calls on Western democracies to do "what they can to help this unprecedented challenge to Mr. Putin's autocracy survive and grow." While "the United States and many European capitals have been rhetorically supportive of Mr. Navalny," the "Biden administration and European Union should follow up with sanctions against the Russian officials involved in the latest repression – and they should heed the pleas of Mr. Navalny for action to expose and freeze the illicit assets held by Mr. Putin and his cronies outside Russia." Likewise, a Wall Street Journal (2/2, Subscription Publication, 8.41M) editorial calls for tougher Western sanctions. The Journal also warns Putin could launch an "external provocation" to draw attention away from Russia's domestic situation.

Reuters (2/2, Balmer, Amante) reports that it appears Italian President Sergio Mattarella will "ask former European Central Bank chief Mario Draghi to form a government of national unity to tackle the twin coronavirus and economic crises battering the country." Mattarella "summoned Draghi for talks on Wednesday...after hearing that efforts to salvage the collapsed coalition of Prime Minister Giuseppe Conte had failed." Mattarella told reporters, "I have a duty to appeal to all political forces [to support] a high-profile government." The New York Times (2/2, 20.6M) says "news of Mr. Draghi's entrance into the arena delighted some of Italy's most pro-European politicians and those critical of Mr. Conte's lack of experience." But the Wall Street Journal (2/2, Subscription Publication, 8.41M) says it is unclear if a majority in Italy's parliament would back Draghi as prime minister, even if he indicates an interest in the position.

Iran Agrees To Free Crew From Seized South Korean Vessel.

The New York Times (2/2, Choe, Fassihi, 20.6M) reports that the governments of Iran and South Korea on Tuesday announced that Iran agreed to free the 19 crew members of the Hankuk Chemi, a South Korea-flagged ship that the Islamic Revolutionary Guards Corps took into custody on January 4. The move "appeared to be the first significant gesture by the Iranians to de-escalate the problem," and "may also have been intended to send an indirect signal to the Biden administration, which has indicated it wants to avoid a further deterioration in relations with Iran after they worsened sharply under" former President Donald Trump. In exchange, South Korea "said it had pledged speedy action to address Iran's complaints about its inability to access $7 billion in Iranian money that has been frozen in South Korean banks because of American sanctions reimposed by Mr. Trump."

National Mortgage News (2/2, Sinnock) reports that the use of appraisal waivers has "soared in the current low-rate environment, according to the American Enterprise Institute's latest analysis of government-sponsored enterprise data." Almost 46% of loans now have one, according to Tobias Peter, director of research at AEI's housing center. He explained, "In the low interest-rate environment we have seen this hockey-stick phenomenon where waivers have become much more prevalent." NMN reports, "Over the past several months, the gap between waiver use rates at Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac has narrowed, said Peter, who noted that Fannie originally had a lead because it has a first mover advantage. In November, however, Freddie's share was 48% and Fannie's was 46%."

HousingWire (2/2, 7K) provides additional coverage.

Analysis: Biden Administration Faces An Uphill Battle To Close Racial Homeownership Gaps.

In a paywalled analysis, American Banker (2/2, Berry, Subscription Publication, 27K) says, "Decades after redlining and housing discrimination were outlawed, nonwhite Americans still own their homes at far lower rates than white Americans." American Banker says "most homebuyers don't understand" the differences between FHA loans, VA loans, and GSE conventional loans, or their relative costs, and the "policies that end up steering minority borrowers away from conventional loans and toward costlier loans were largely a byproduct of the housing bubble and policies put in place by the Obama administration in its wake." According to the piece, "If the Biden administration wants to make the American Dream as real for nonwhite Americans as it has been for white Americans, it has its work cut out for it. But a significant part of closing that disparity of experience means finding sustainable ways to make homeownership more available and more profitable for nonwhite borrowers – and banks."

Two people briefed on the case "said FBI investigators recently found that the National Finance Center, a federal payroll agency inside the US Department of Agriculture, was among the affected organizations, raising fears that data on thousands of government employees may have been compromised." Reuters was not able "to establish how many organizations were compromised by the suspected Chinese operation." Bloomberg (2/2, 3.57M) reports suspected Chinese hackers "broke into US government computers last year by exploiting a flaw in software made by SolarWinds Corp." The suspected Chinese hackers "exploited a different flaw in SolarWinds's software than alleged Russian hackers used in a sprawling cyber-attack against the US government and private companies that was revealed in December." The Hill (2/2, Castronuovo, 5.69M) reports a USDA spokesman initially "told Reuters that it had 'notified all customers (including individuals and organizations) whose data has been affected by the SolarWinds Orion Code Compromise.'" An intelligence official for a NATO member state, "It's a mix of non-state actors – hackers trying to install ransomware on critical supply chains and maybe some of the more sophisticated terror groups probing for weaknesses – and state-backed intelligence services gobbling up all the information that can be found." The source said, "The state actions are directed very clearly at vaccine supply chain information — some of which is open source, some not — and it's basically everyone spying on each other."

C4ISR & Networks (2/2, Pomerleau) reports that, "while largely agreeing with the Defense Department's more proactive approach to cyberspace in the last few years, President Joe Biden's nominee for the No. 2 spot at the Pentagon has key questions about the defend forward concept." Kathleen Hicks at her deputy defense secretary confirmation hearing February 2 before the Senate Armed Services Committee, said, "I am supportive of the approach. I think, if confirmed, what I would like to understand better is exactly how the authorities are being executed, what kind of oversight is involved, how we are consulting with allies and partners, whose systems we might operate on." The DOD's 2018 cybersecurity strategy "charges US Cyber Command to defend forward in cyberspace by getting as close to adversaries as possible to see what they're planning, so the department can take action or inform others to prepare." Hicks "recognized that the US has been forced to become more forward leaning in its posture."

Opinion: The Government Needs To Improve Oversight Of Internet-Of-Things.

In a commentary in the Washington Post (2/2, 10.52M), Bruce Schneier writes, "large and small appliances, cars, medical devices, toys and...exercise machines are all computers at their core, and they're all...vulnerable." Every one of those devices "is a potential security risk, and all of those people are potential national security targets." He argues, "Regulations that force manufacturers to provide better security for all of us are the only way to do that. We need minimum security standards for computers of all kinds." He concludes, "I am much more worried about the political activists, journalists, human rights workers and oppressed minorities around the world who don't have the money or expertise to secure their technology, or the information that would give them the ability to make informed choices on which technologies to choose.”

Legislators Seek Information On NSA Actions To Prevent Supply Chain Attacks.

Gov Info Security (2/2) reports that, “in light of the recent SolarWinds supply chain hack on government agencies and others, 10 Democratic lawmakers are asking the NSA to explain why it apparently did not take action after the 2012 Juniper Networks supply chain hack to help prevent similar attacks.” In a recent letter to NSA, the lawmakers state, “The American people have a right to know why NSA did not act after the Juniper hack to protect the government from the serious threat posed by supply chain hacks. A similar supply chain hack was used in the recent SolarWinds breach, in which several government agencies were compromised with malware snuck into the company’s software updates.”

TFI/Sanctions

Biden’s Options Limited In Responding To Myanmar Takeover.

Reuters (2/2, Lewis, Pamuk, Psaledakis) reports President Biden, “facing his first major international crisis after Myanmar’s military seized power, could impose a new program of sanctions, cut aid or target generals and the companies they run to pressure for a return to democracy.” How the Administration responds “will be an early test of Biden’s dual pledges to re-center human rights in U.S. foreign policy and work more closely with allies.” Biden “could establish a fresh sanctions program against Myanmar with an executive order that would declare a national emergency regarding developments in the country,” but experts say the US “has limited leverage over the generals that seized power, who have ties to powerful local companies but few overseas interests that could be impacted by financial sanctions.”

Commentary: US Must Ramp Up Sanctions Of Kremlin Elite’s “Entire Upper Ranks.”

In an op-ed for The Hill (2/2, 5.69M), Stephen Nix and Joshua Solomon say the Russian people “have embarked on one of the largest battles against kleptocracy, or the rule of thieves. They want their government to stop plundering their wealth and using it to hold onto power by any means.” The writers argue that while the Treasury Department “has a sanctions program that has frozen the assets of several dozen Kremlin officials and prevented them from traveling to the United States,” and Congress “has banned anonymous shell companies,” these measures “are insufficient in this fight.” The authors say the US “must dramatically increase its targeted sanctions program to include the entire upper ranks for the Kremlin elite, including top government officials, the heads of major corporations, and the leaders of the numerous Russian regions. Sanctions must also include the families and primary business associates of these individuals, in whose names the illicit wealth from such corruption are often registered.”

Federal Reserve

Fed Makes Headway With FedNow Payments Service; Aims For 2023 Release.

American Banker (2/2, Lang, Subscription Publication, 27K) reports the Fed has made substantial headway with its real-time payments system FedNow. The Fed has also narrowed its launch timetable to 2023. Kenneth Montgomery, first vice president and chief operating officer at the Federal Reserve Bank of Boston, said, “In the 15 months we’ve been at this, we have made considerable progress and achievements in terms of getting the product to market, and all during a pandemic.”

NYTimes Analysis: Fed Has Poor Record Of Building A Diverse Workforce.

The New York Times (2/2, Smialek, 20.6M) reports in an analysis that while the Federal Reserve “dedicates research and attention to racial economic outcomes and publicly champions inclusion, it has had a poor record of building a work force that looks like the population it is meant to serve. ... When it comes to employing Black economists in particular, the central bank still falls short.” While officials have argued that “Ph.D. economists are heavily white and Asian,” a Times “analysis suggests the issue goes even beyond that. Black people are less represented within the Fed than in the field as a whole. Only two of the 417 economists, or 0.5 percent, on staff at the Fed’s board in Washington were Black, as of data the Fed provided last month. Black people make up 13 percent of America’s population and 3 to 4 percent of the U.S. citizens and permanent residents who graduate as Ph.D. economists each year.”

Kashkari Says COVID-19 Vaccination Key To Reviving MN Economy.

The AP (2/2, Karnowski) reports Minneapolis Fed President Neel Kashkari “said Tuesday that getting Minnesotans vaccinated against the coronavirus will be key to reviving the state’s economy.” Kashkari “told a legislative hearing that the country and state have made progress toward putting people back to work amid the pandemic.” Kashkari said, “We just need as many Americans and as many Minnesotans as possible to be vaccinated so that we can have confidence and we can restore much of the economy back to the way it was. ... But it’s really critical right now that the virus is in charge of the economy, and the sooner we can get the vast majority of Minnesotans and the vast majority of Americans vaccinated, the sooner we’ll be able to get back to normal.”

Kaplan Says No Systemic Concerns Amid GameStop Frenzy.

Reuters (2/2, Saphir) reports Dallas Fed President Robert Kaplan "said Tuesday that while the Fed's massive bond-buying program is creating plenty of liquidity in financial markets, there are no signs of broad market instability at present." Kaplan said during a CNBC interview, "I don't see anything right now systemic," though he "did not comment on GameStop directly, and instead addressed the broader question of how Fed policy affects financial markets." Kaplan said, "Some of the current situation you are seeing – one of the factors – is there is a lot of liquidity, and some of that relates to Fed purchases of $80 billion of Treasuries and $40 billion of mortgage-backed securities every month: I think it's wise for us to acknowledge that."

CNBC (2/2, Cox, 7.34M) and New York Magazine (2/2, Dugan, 1.3M) also report.

Office of the Comptroller of the Currency

President Still Expected To Nominate Barr To OCC.

CoinDesk (2/2, De, 49K) reports, "We're still waiting on confirmation hearings and votes for most of President Biden's nominees for financial regulatory positions." The President "has yet to officially confirm that Chris Brummer will be nominated to lead the Commodity Futures Trading Commission or that Michael Barr will be nominated to lead the Office of the Comptroller of the Currency."

Olen Advocates For Biden To Name Baradaran To Helm OCC. In her Washington Post (2/2, 10.52M) column, Helaine Olen says the US "faces an overdue reckoning with how we've treated non-White Americans, such as the fact that for every dollar a White family with children possesses, a Black family with children has just 1 cent, while Hispanic families with children have 8 cents." Olen adds the Office of the Comptroller of the Currency "is well positioned to help change this reality, as it implements and enforces laws on everything from fair housing to credit access in low- and moderate-income neighborhoods. And there is a perfect candidate to lead the agency: Mehrsa Baradaran." A law professor at the University of California at Irvine, Baradaran "has spent her career explaining how financial injustice happens, why it persists and how to fix it. She understands that financial inclusion is central to the story of how people get ahead in America – and how financial exclusion keeps all too many down."

Banks Rush Into Crypto-Custody Space After OCC Guidance.

Forbes (2/2, 10.33M) reports the OCC last July "published a letter stating that banks would now be permitted to provide custody services for crypto assets. It's no surprise that financial institutions, preparing for a day when digital asset ownership is common, are rushing into the crypto-custody business."

Separately, Forbes (2/2, Bambrough, 10.33M) reports, "The stablecoin market was set alight" by the OCC "when it said it would allow the use of stablecoins for bank payments." CoinDesk (2/2, 49K) similarly reports that the growth in the stablecoin space "has corresponded with increased attention from regulators." CoinDesk adds, "We can expect continued regulatory interest and activity in this area from around the world."

Citi's Fraser Creates New Operating Team To Address Concerns Raised By Regulators.

Bloomberg (2/2, Surane, 3.57M) reports Citigroup incoming CEO Jane Fraser "created a new global operating team aimed at improving accountability among its top executives, as the firm continues to address a litany of concerns raised by regulators last year." The bank "was dinged last year by both the Federal Reserve and the Office of the Comptroller of the Currency for failings with its technology infrastructure and internal controls." Citi "has vowed to rectify the problems regulators laid out, with Fraser leading much of the remediation effort."

Reuters (2/2) provides similar coverage.

US Mint Struggles To Meet Demand For Silver, Gold Coins.

Reuters (2/2, Kumar) reports the US Mint "said on Tuesday it was unable to meet surging demand for its gold and silver bullion coins in 2020 and through January, due partly to pandemic-driven demand and plant capacity issues." The Mint "had limited distribution of its silver coins to suppliers as it is currently changing the designs for its American Eagle Gold and Silver Bullion Coins." The Mint in 2021 "has a limited window to produce its current gold and silver coins, with redesigned coins expected to debut in the summer. It is limiting distribution of its gold, silver and platinum coins to specific dealers because of heavy demand, and a limited number of suppliers of metals, it said in a statement."

Bloomberg (2/2, Li, 3.57M) also reports.

Editorial Wrap-Up

New York Times.

"Aleksandr Navalny Is Resisting Putin, And Winning." The New York Times (2/2, 20.6M) says while the ruling by a court in Moscow putting Russian opposition leader Alexei Navalny in prison for more than 2 1/2 years "would appear to be a clear victory" for Russian President Vladimir Putin, in "this David v. Goliath saga, the 44-year-old Mr. Navalny has succeeded through raw courage and perseverance in putting Mr. Putin on the defensive. The imprisonment was Mr. Navalny's move. Mr. Putin had tried for years to give him only brief sentences to avoid making him a martyr." By voluntarily returning to Russia, "and then releasing a devastating YouTube video showing the obscenely opulent palace Mr. Putin was building himself on the Black Sea, Mr. Navalny left the president little choice but to dispatch him to a labor camp, and thus transform him into a powerful symbol of resistance.”

Washington Post.

“The GOP Is Having A Reckoning, And McConnell Seems To Be On The Right Side.” The Washington Post (2/2, 10.52M) says Senate Minority Leader McConnell’s statement of rebuke against Rep. Marjorie Taylor Greene (R-GA) “was reassuring: At least there is a battle over the soul of the Republican Party.” The Post adds that McConnell “is nothing if not shrewd, and presumably his statement also reflects a calculation that Ms. Greene and her type of politics are bad for the Republican Party. That provides some hope – however slim – that this once-proud party might return to its senses.”

“Navalny’s Fiery Indictment Of The ‘Small Man In A Bunker’ Could Rattle Putin’s Autocracy.” The Washington Post (2/2, 10.52M) calls on Western democracies to do “what they can to help” Alexei Navalny’s “unprecedented challenge” to Russian President Vladimir Putin’s “autocracy survive and grow.” While “the United States and many European capitals have been rhetorically supportive of Mr. Navalny,” the “Biden administration and European Union should follow up with sanctions against the Russian officials involved in the latest repression – and they should heed the pleas of Mr. Navalny for action to expose and freeze the illicit assets held by Mr. Putin and his cronies outside Russia.”

“It’s Good Biden Is Ending For-Profit Federal Prisons. Detained Immigrants Deserve No Less.” The Washington Post (2/2, 10.52M) editorializes that President Biden’s announcement that “he would phase out federal contracts for privately run prisons” delivers “on half a campaign pledge but omit[s] the other, more difficult half – to also scrap privately operated migrant detention centers.” The Post says the “administration’s wavering has disappointed immigrant advocates, who have rightly called attention to substandard and occasionally appalling conditions” in such centers, and argues that “the president’s instincts on the campaign trail were right and should remain the administration’s goal: For-profit detention facilities, where pre-pandemic problems have burgeoned into humanitarian danger zones during the covid-19 era, should be phased out.”

“Some Michigan Restaurateurs Are Ignoring Pandemic Restrictions. They’re Putting Everyone At Risk.” The Washington Post (2/2, 10.52M) says more than 60 restaurants in Michigan are openly ignoring pandemic restrictions. The restaurants “formed Stand Up Michigan, a group that held rallies against pandemic restrictions.” The Post says Stand Up Michigan “has taken the defense of rights too far. Personal freedom does not mean the right to endanger others. ... It is absolute madness to encourage the kind of behavior – indoor dining at restaurants – that will spread the disease and lead to sickness and death.”

Wall Street Journal.

“House Republican Reckoning.” The Wall Street Journal (2/2, Subscription Publication, 8.41M) says if House Republicans choose to punish Rep. Liz Cheney (R-WY), but remain silent about Rep. Marjorie Taylor Greene (R-GA), they deserve to remain in the minority.

“Where’s Biden On Opening Schools?” The Wall Street Journal (2/2, Subscription Publication, 8.41M) editorializes that the Biden Administration’s pledge to follow the science is being undermined in regard to schools reopening, arguing that the President is absent in supporting local government officials battling teachers unions that have resisted calls to return to in-person learning despite data that suggests it is safe to do so.

“Alexei Navalny’s Cause.” The Wall Street Journal (2/2, Subscription Publication, 8.41M) calls for tougher Western sanctions against Russia for imprisoning opposition leader Alexei Navalny. The Journal also warns Russian President Vladimir Putin could launch an “external provocation” to draw attention away from Russia’s domestic situation.

Last Laughs

Late Night Political Humor.

Trevor Noah: “Until the pandemic is actually over, Americans will need more help getting through it. And the big question of what that help will look like is dominating Washington, DC right now. ... I get why Democrats and Republicans are having trouble agreeing. This is a difference of $1.3 trillion. How do you compromise when you’re that far apart? It’s like deciding what’s for dinner. You want something nice, but your date wants to eat out of a gas station trash can. You can’t compromise and eat out of a nice trash can.”

Trevor Noah: “Let’s move to the second most talked about Instagram video from last night...the post by Representative Alexandria Ocasio-Cortez, who gave a harrowing account of her personal experience during the Capitol attack. ... I mean, AOC and other members of Congress literally thought that they were going to die. On a Wednesday afternoon, no less. Nobody should die in the middle of the week. That means you went to work on Monday and Tuesday for nothing.”

Trevor Noah: “To everyone who was saying how scared could [Ocasio-Cortez] really have been, think about how terrified you get when someone knocks on the bathroom door when there isn’t even a riot. ‘Someone’s in here! Oh, God, now they’re going to know that I pooped.’”

Jimmy Kimmel: “I don’t get Groundhog Day. Last year’s festivities shattered records, crowd-wise. Forty thousand people showed up, double the number from the year before, which I don’t understand at all. If I wanted to see a fat rodent hiding in a hole, I’d go to Mar-a-Lago.”

Jimmy Kimmel: "House Democrats are saying that if Republicans don't strip [Rep. Marjorie Taylor] Greene of her committee assignments, they will. ... Greene is, of course, now trying to make money off her terribleness. She tweeted, 'Democrats are trying to expel me from Congress. Help me raise $50,000 today and send a message.' What message? 'I am crazy and careless with money?'"

Jimmy Kimmel: "Greene says she has spoken to Donald Trump on the phone and has his full support. They are even planning to get together soon. Oh-oh, look out, Melania, she's coming for your guy."

Jimmy Kimmel: "Donald Trump's new lawyers today released their response to the impeachment charges they will defend him against in the Senate next week. And this is great. On the very first page of their first legal filing, they wrote, 'To the honorable members of the United States Senate.' They misspelled 'United States.' And we're off!"

Jimmy Kimmel: "You know how much Ivanka and Jared made last year? Jared and Ivanka reported a combined income for 2020 of between $23 million and $121 million. Which raises a number of important questions, like, for what?"

Jimmy Kimmel: "You know Trump doesn't like this, right? You know, the only thing more embarrassing than losing the election is having his son-in-law make more money than he does."

Stephen Colbert: "There's big news today from the business world and the regular world, too, because Amazon announced that their CEO, Jeff Bezos, will be stepping down. Before leaving office, he will be cocooned in bubble wrap and put in a box eight times his size. ... I'm just impressed that the company that delivers my dog food and Nespresso pods had a more peaceful transfer of power than the United States government."

Stephen Colbert: "Speaking of [the US government], I've seen my shadow, and I predict we're going to have two more weeks of impeachment."

Stephen Colbert: "The disgraced former President's team argued that 'he cannot be convicted by the Senate because he is no longer in office.' So, okay, once you leave a job, you're immune from prosecution? 'Cannibalism? Nice try, your honor, but I don't even work at White Castle anymore.'"

Stephen Colbert: "House managers, like Eric Swalwell, have said that they're going to use news footage of the riot to prove their case. [Trump's lawyer David] Schoen believes that's a bad idea – for America. ... Yes, healing comes from not providing any evidence. As it says in the Hippocratic oath, 'First, snitches get stitches.'"

Stephen Colbert: "Schoen's not the only one who wants an evidence-free trial. So does South Carolina Senator...Lindsey Graham. ... You can always tell who the good guys are. 'Make sure there are no witnesses.'"

Stephen Colbert: "There's this little fringe group in the [GOP] who believes it's wrong to attack the Capitol building. And they're focusing their anger on Georgia Representative...Marjorie Taylor Greene. Greene's a public backer of QAnon. She's claimed that mass shootings, including school shootings, were staged, and she has supported the execution of Democratic leaders. So, a moderate Republican."

Stephen Colbert: "Yesterday, Greene's views inspired a strong reaction from Senate Minority Leader...Mitch McConnell. McConnell released a statement saying that the baseless conspiracy theories Greene supports 'are cancer for the Republican party and our country.' Yes, it's cancer, but I will point out that five years ago, the GOP found a suspicious lump and then nominated the tumor for President."

Stephen Colbert: "There is so much division in the Republican party, they really need a man of true integrity to unite them. Unfortunately, all they've got is House Minority Leader...Kevin McCarthy. McCarthy has resisted calls from Democrats to kick Greene off her House committees. Instead, he's promising to have a 'conversation' with her about the mounting controversies sometime this week. Well, that should be productive. As McCarthy proved with his recent trip to Mar-a-Lago, he knows how to put his foot down. And his knee down, then his other knee down, so he can smooch some crazy butt."

Stephen Colbert: "McConnell's not the only one upset with the conspiracy wing of the GOP. Yesterday, we found out that roughly 60 to 70 former Bush officials have decided to leave the party, and as one put it, 'The Republican party as I knew it no longer exists.' Yes, it's unrecognizable. We just had a Republican President who told over 30,000 lies about serious subjects like election fraud and a global pandemic. The previous Republican President only told lies about small stuff like weapons of mass destruction and government-sanctioned torture."

Stephen Colbert: "Now, we've all been doing this job for a while now, and we've seen a lot of evidence that this kind of behavior from Republicans was coming. Take former Bush adviser...Karl Rove. Back when Rove was in the White House, he sarcastically referred to his critics as 'the reality-based community,' and claimed that people like him 'create our own reality.' ... Now, when Rove said that, we all saw where this was headed. Because if that Republican administration could get away with creating their own little space-time continuum with the magic of make-believe, it just goes to figure that it was only a matter time before everybody else did it. ... So when it comes to crazy conspiracy theories, you can't put the genie back in the bottle, and not just because those same Republicans 13 years ago were fine with rumors that the genie is a secret Muslim. Remember 'secret Muslim'? That was 2007, along with 'Obama was born in Kenya' and the 'terrorist fist bump,' now known as the only way we're allowed to touch each other."

Stephen Colbert: "So, if crazy conspiracy theories are, in fact, a cancer on the Republican party, people like Mitch McConnell and Karl Rove have spent the last 20 years selling cigarettes to their base."

Jimmy Fallon: "Well, guys, it must be Groundhog Day because we are living through Trump's impeachment again. That's right, today House Democrats filed a brief saying Trump's singularly responsible for the Capitol riots."

Jimmy Fallon: "Some good news today. The Biden Administration made a big announcement regarding vaccine distribution. ... After Trump, Biden looks like a genius for being like, 'I have an idea! All the places that give flu shots, they should give vaccine shots!' Thanks, professor! Wow! Amazing. Yeah, it sounds like a smart idea, although CVS already shelved the vaccine to make room for the Halloween decorations."

Seth Meyers: "After meeting with President Biden for almost two hours about the coronavirus relief package, Republican Senator Shelley Moore Capito told reporters that Biden, quote, 'seemed really happy to be in the game of negotiating. Also, it was kind of weird for a President to hold a two-hour meeting and not once mention the electoral map.'"

Seth Meyers: "Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell said yesterday that freshman Representative Marjorie Taylor Greene's looney lies are a, quote, 'cancer to the GOP.' The key is to make the lies believable, like 'you can live for eight months on $600.'"

Seth Meyers: "Congresswoman Marjorie Taylor Greene responded yesterday to Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell criticizing her views as cancer and said, quote, 'The real cancer for the Republican party is weak Republicans who only know how to lose gracefully.' Well, at least they can agree that whatever the cancer is, no one should be able to afford the treatment."

James Corden: "Today was the deadline for Trump to file. Trump is no longer President, and lawyers will be arguing that the trial is unconstitutional. I'm going to use this the next time a cop pulls me over. I'm gonna be like, 'Well, I'm no longer speeding. I was, but I'm not now. Therefore, this ticket is unconstitutional.'"

James Corden: "This all comes after Trump's previous legal team quit over the weekend. And according to new reports, it was more than just a difference in approach. Trump and his lawyers also had disagreements over how much he was going to pay them. That does not sound like the Donald Trump I know. There was a disagreement over money. The lawyers wanted $3 million, whereas Trump wanted to pay them nothing and then make fun of them on cable news."

James Corden: "President Biden is now looking into revoking Trump's access to intelligence briefings, a courtesy traditionally given to ex-presidents. Revoking Donald Trump's access to intelligence briefings. That's like revoking a dolphin's access to an Xbox."

James Corden: "By the way, Trump famously skipped intelligence briefings when he was President of the United States. So this would be like if I got fired from this job and people were like, 'Sorry, James, you can no longer go into Stu's office.' And I would be like, 'Right. Who's Stu?'"

Treasury in the News

Yellen: Biden Rescue Plan Will Be A Success If Jobless Rate Returns To Pre-Pandemic Level.

Reuters (2/22, Lawder) reports that says that during a New York Times Dealbook online event on Monday, Treasury Secretary Janet Yellen "said...she will judge the success of President Joe Biden's coronavirus stimulus plan by how quickly it returns the economy to pre-pandemic levels of unemployment." Yellen said, "Success to me would be if we could get back to pre-pandemic levels of unemployment and see the re-employment of those who have lost jobs in the service sector, particularly – I would also consider them a measure of success." The unemployment rate "is 6.3%, compared with 3.5% before the pandemic – a level widely viewed as effectively full employment. But Yellen said that because 4 million people have dropped out of the labor force...the effective unemployment rate is close to 10%." Reuters says Yellen "also played down the increased debt levels that would be incurred."

The New York Times (2/22, Karaian, 20.6M) quotes Yellen as saying, "Of course, a key job for a Treasury secretary is to make sure our country is on a sound fiscal course. If you don't spend what is necessary to get the economy quickly back on track, that has a fiscal cost as well. ... I think we have more fiscal space than we used to because of the interest rate environment, and I think we should consider using it."

Bloomberg (2/22, Miller, 3.57M) reports Yellen and Fed Chairman Powell "appear wary of signs of froth in financial markets, even as they press ahead with economic stimulus measures that are elevating the euphoria." Last week, Yellen told CNBC there "may be sectors where we should be very careful," when she was "asked about possible speculative sizzle." Her comments "came a day after publication of minutes of the Fed's Jan. 26-27 policy meeting at which staff characterized the risks to financial stability as notable – an assessment Powell shares, according to a central bank official familiar with the matter." But, "Yellen spoke out in favor of President Joe Biden's $1.9 trillion fiscal aid package again on Monday," and Powell "is expected to reaffirm his commitment to an ultra-easy monetary policy when he testifies to the Senate Banking Committee on Tuesday."

The Hill (2/22, Jagoda, 5.69M), Newsweek (2/22, Villarreal, 2.67M), and CNN (2/22, Tappe, Hoffman, 89.21M) also report.

Top Economic Officials Cite An Unemployment Rate That Is Higher Than The Official Figure. The New York Times (2/22, Smialek, 20.6M) reports while the official unemployment rate "has declined sharply after rocketing up last year...top government economic officials are increasingly citing a different figure – one that puts the jobless rate at nearly 10 percent, well above its official 6.3 percent reading and roughly matching its 2009 peak." The "emphasis on an alternative statistic, espoused by leaders including" Yellen and Powell, "underlines both the very unusual nature of the coronavirus shock and a long-running shift in the way that economists think about weakness in the labor market." The Times says, "Top economic officials are adding labor force dropouts and workers who are misclassified to the share of people who are actively searching for work."

Yellen Warns Bitcoin Is Inefficient & Speculative, Signals Support For Digital Dollar Research.

CNBC (2/22, Cox, 7.34M) reports that in an interview at the New York Times' DealBook conference, Treasury Secretary Janet Yellen said, "I don't think that bitcoin...is widely used as a transaction mechanism. To the extent it is used I fear it's often for illicit finance. It's an extremely inefficient way of conducting transactions, and the amount of energy that's consumed in processing those transactions is staggering." Yellen added the cryptocurrency is a "highly speculative asset and you know I think people should be aware it can be extremely volatile and I do worry about potential losses that investors can suffer."

However, Bloomberg (2/22, Condon, 3.57M) reports Yellen, during the conference, also "signaled the Biden administration supports research into the viability of a digital dollar, a shift from the lack of enthusiasm shown for the concept under her predecessor, Steven Mnuchin." Yellen said it "makes sense for central banks to be looking at" issuing sovereign digital currencies. Yellen "said a digital version of the dollar could help address hurdles to financial inclusion in the U.S. among low-income households," adding, "Too many Americans don't have access to easy payments systems and banking accounts, and I think this is something that a digital dollar, a central bank digital currency, could help with. It could result in faster, safer and cheaper payments, which I think are important goals.”

Yellen: Treasury Could Facilitate Climate Stress Tests For Banks And Insurers.

The Wall Street Journal (2/22, Davidson, Subscription Publication, 8.41M) reports Treasury Secretary Janet Yellen told the New York Times DealBook conference Monday that it may be possible for the Treasury to facilitate climate stress tests for banks and insurers, “though the tests likely wouldn’t impose capital requirements or limit dividend payouts as existing stress tests do.” Yellen “said the tests would be carried out by the Federal Reserve and other financial regulators and not the Treasury. But she said the Treasury, which helps shape regulatory policy toward U.S. financial firms, may be able to facilitate the tests.” Yellen said, “I think it’s not envisioned that this would have the same status in terms of limiting payouts and capital requirements. ... But I think they would be very revealing both to regulators and to the firms themselves in terms of managing their own risks.”

Yellen Says Biden Supports 28% Corporate Tax, Open To Capital Gains Tax Increase.

Bloomberg (2/22, Mohsin, Condon, 3.57M) reports Treasury Secretary Janet Yellen “said President Joe Biden favors boosting taxes on companies, and signaled openness to considering raising rates on capital gains, while steering clear of a wealth levy.” Yellen said during a New York Times conference, “A wealth tax has been discussed but is not something President Biden” supports, adding that implementing such a tax would have significant problems and that the Administration plans to push for an increase in the corporate tax to 28%. Yellen “also said that a hike in the capital-gains tax might be something ‘worth considering.’ Asked about a financial-transactions tax, she said, ‘One would have to examine closely what effect it would have’ on ordinary investors.”

Yellen Says Market For 100-Year T-Bill Would Be “Very Tiny.”

Bloomberg (2/22, Mohsin, 3.57M) reports Treasury Secretary Janet Yellen “said that the market appetite for 100-year U.S. government bonds would likely be tiny, while stopping short of ruling out consideration of such a security.” Yellen said during a New York Times event Monday, “Issuing longer-term securities certainly seems to make some sense,” but it’s something Treasury “could look at again.” However, Yellen added, “the market for that is very tiny,” referring to the 100-year bill.

Biden Touts Changes To PPP Intended To Benefit Small Business, And Minority-Owned Businesses.

The Washington Post (2/22, Gregg, 10.52M) reports that on Monday, the Treasury Department “announced...that it will make targeted changes to its Paycheck Protection Program pandemic relief loans in an attempt to direct more funding toward the smallest of small businesses.” The Post says that “among other changes to the loan program, businesses with more than 20 employees will be shut out of the PPP for a two-week period starting Wednesday.” On Monday, President Biden “criticized the PPP’s early rollout for privileging those with banking connections at the expense of the smallest borrowers.” Biden said the new rules are meant to ensure the program “looks out for mom-and-pop businesses even more than it already has.” The Post adds that Biden “did not say whether his administration would seek additional funding for the PPP.”

Politico (2/22, Warmbrodt, 6.73M) quotes Biden as saying, “One of the things I’ve heard again and again from small business owners...is that knowing about support is one thing, getting it is another.” Politico says Monday’s announcement “marks Biden’s first major move to put his stamp on the program and reflects his pledge to make economic equity a top priority.”

Reuters (2/22) reports Administration officials have “said there are still many minority and very small firms in low-income areas that have not been able to receive aid,” so “the program will...set aside $1 billion for businesses without employees in low- and moderate-income areas, which are 70% owned by women and people of color.” According to Reuters, “The changes aim to make it easier for firms with no employees – sole proprietors, independent contractors, and self-employed people such as house cleaners and personal care providers – that could not qualify previously because of business cost deductions.”

However, the New York Times (2/22, Cowley, Tankersley, 20.6M) says “the changes risk throwing an already turbulent program into chaos as banks and other lenders try to accommodate the last-minute shifts. With just five weeks to go before March 31, when the latest iteration of the program is scheduled to end, lenders were left scrambling to adapt to new rules that won’t even be fully explained to them until later this month.” The Hill (2/22, Chalfant, 5.69M) provides similar coverage.

Treasury’s IG Warns Law Enforcement Agencies May Need Warrants To Use GPS Data Pulled From Mobile Apps.

The Wall Street Journal (2/22, Tau, Subscription Publication, 8.41M) reports a new Treasury Department IG report warns that law-enforcement agencies may need to obtain a warrant before tapping cellphone GPS data pulled from mobile apps. The Treasury IG for Tax Administration indicated a landmark 2018 Supreme Court case might complicate that ability to track suspects through location data without a warrant. The report recommended stricter controls on data usage.

The Hill (2/22, Rodrigo, 5.69M) reports that, according to a new Treasury Department watchdog report, law enforcement agencies “may be on shaky legal ground when purchasing cell phone location data without a warrant." The agency's inspector general "said in the report reviewing the Internal Revenue Service's use of a commercial platform, Venntel, to track devices that a 2018 Supreme Court case may block warrantless tracking using data from apps." The Carpenter v. United States case "holds that warrants must be obtained by law enforcement to get data from wireless carriers, and many government lawyers have argued that it does not apply to GPS data taken from apps." The watchdog's report, "which came at the request of Sens. Ron Wyden (D-OR) and Elizabeth Warren (D-MA), suggests that that interpretation is flawed."

Adeyemo Says Treasury Should Work With Congress And Allies Against Economic Rivals.

Reuters (2/22, Shalal, Alper) reports Deputy Treasury Secretary-designate Wally Adeyemo, in testimony prepared for his confirmation hearing before the Senate Finance Committee, says the department "should work with Congress and use its tools to respond to authoritarian governments and combat unfair economic practices in China and elsewhere," and also calls on the US "to work closely with allies to 'confront those that threaten our economic and national security.'"

The New York Times (2/22, Rappeport, 20.6M) also reports.

COVID-19 News

FDA Outlines Fast Path For New Vaccines, Booster Shots To Cover New Virus Variants.

Bloomberg (2/22, Langreth, Cortez, 3.57M) reports, "Drugmakers won't have to perform massive trials for new vaccines or booster shots developed to combat worrisome new variants of the coronavirus," the FDA said in documents released on Monday. The agency "said immunizations that protect against the variants could receive clearance based on so-called immunogenicity studies, where researchers vaccinate people and then conduct laboratory tests to measure the strength of their immune response."

The New York Times (2/22, Landler, Castle, 20.6M) says the recommendations, "which call for small trials more like what's required for annual flu vaccines, would greatly accelerate the review process at a time when scientists are increasingly anxious about how the variants might slow or reverse progress made against the virus." Reuters (2/22, Erman), the Washington Post (2/22, Cunningham, Schemm, Shammass, Thebault, 10.52M), and the Wall Street Journal (2/22, Burton, Subscription Publication, 8.41M) also have reports.

J&J Says It Should Have Enough Doses For More Than 20M By End Of March.

The Hill (2/22, Sullivan, 5.69M) reports Johnson & Johnson said Monday that it "plans to have enough doses of its vaccine for more than 20 million Americans by the end of March" if its vaccine is authorized by the FDA. The Hill says an FDA advisory committee "is meeting Friday to consider the application, and emergency authorization could come soon after." Politico (2/22, Oweremohle, 6.73M) also reports.

Pfizer Expects To Deliver More Than 13M Doses Per Week By Mid-March.

Reuters (2/22, O'Donnell) reports Pfizer "expects to deliver more than 13 million doses of its COVID-19 vaccine per week to the United States by the middle of March, more than doubling its shipments from early February," Chief Business Officer John Young "said in prepared testimony ahead of a Tuesday congressional hearing." Young "added that Pfizer is...prepared to provide a total of 300 million shots to the United States by the end of July and has raised global production expectations for 2021 to at least 2 billion doses."

Politico Analysis: Effort To Get More Minorities Vaccinated Off To Slow Start.

Politico (2/22, Kenen, Ehley, 6.73M) says "the race to vaccinate as many people as possible while more contagious coronavirus variants march across America is colliding with lagging efforts to steer shots to people of color and underserved communities bearing the brunt of the pandemic." Though the Administration "has prioritized equitable vaccine distribution, putting that goal into practice is difficult," and "so far, the efforts aren't necessarily translating into huge numbers of vaccinations in hard-to-reach populations that, by definition, are hard to reach." The share of first doses "going to white Americans has increased slightly since the first month of inoculations, from 60.4 percent to 63.7 percent," but "the share of doses to Black Americans has also risen slightly, from 5.4 percent to 6.3 percent." However, "it fell for Latinos from 11.5 percent to 8.8 percent."

Health Workers Frustrated That Vaccine Half-Doses Must Be Thrown Away.

Lester Holt said on NBC Nightly News (2/22, story 9, 2:30, 6.17M) that "as Americans struggle to get the COVID vaccine, health workers are frustrated by thousands of potential doses thrown away." NBC's Catie Beck: "Shots go into arms 4,000 times a day at the INOVA vaccine clinic in Fairfax, Virginia. ... But while the clinic's pharmacy team hustles to keep up with demand, they are flagging a flaw in the process. ... Residual vaccine left in vials and forced to be thrown out." While "a single vial of Pfizer vaccine used here yields six full doses...pharmacists say there is often a half-dose left, which under FDA rules cannot be used." INOVA Health System Chief Pharmacy Officer Melanie Massiah-White: "It is huge for such a scarce resource. It is significant. Currently, we are just throwing those out at the end of the day."

Most Governors Have Chosen To Not Yet Get Vaccinated.

Bloomberg (2/22, 3.57M) reports that while "nine Republican and nine Democratic governors have received at least one" COVID vaccine dose, according to a Bloomberg count, "at least 28 governors have held off, saying they plan to wait to avoid the appearance of using the power of their office to cut the line." Some of those who have chosen to get vaccinated "said they were trying to encourage others to follow in a bid to combat high hesitancy rates."

"Politicized Fights" Over COVID Rage At State Level.

The New York Times (2/22, A1, Gabriel, 20.6M) reports, "In state Capitols, the politicized fights" over COVID "are boiling over. State lawmakers across the country, most of them Republicans, are moving aggressively to strip the powers of governors, often Democrats, who have taken on extraordinary authority to limit the spread of the virus for nearly a year." Legislatures "in more than 30 states are trying to restrict the power of governors to act unilaterally." In response, governors say "a pandemic cannot be fought by committee. They say that the same Republicans who politicized the science of the pandemic last year...should not be trusted with public health."

Vaccine Produced In Baltimore Mostly Going Out Of State.

The Washington Post (2/22, Jamison, 10.52M) reports that in Baltimore, Emergent BioSolutions "is manufacturing almost all of the yet-to-be approved Johnson & Johnson and AstraZeneca coronavirus vaccines for the U.S. population – an anticipated hundreds of millions of doses in the coming months." But "in a sign of the complexities in a global supply chain that is struggling beneath the weight of demand, most of those doses will not go to residents of this city, or even the state of Maryland."

Chicago Teachers And School Staff May Be Required To Report Vaccination Status.

The Chicago Sun-Times (2/22, 970K) reports, "Current and newly hired Chicago Public Schools teachers and staff could be required to let the district know if they've received a COVID-19 vaccination under a new policy proposed by officials Monday." The new rule "also would allow officials to mandate COVID-19 vaccination as a condition of employment. But CPS said it wouldn't immediately use that authority if the policy is approved."

Los Angeles School District To Resume Some Services Next Week.

The Los Angeles Times (2/22, Blume, 3.37M) reports Los Angeles Unified School District Superintendent Austin Beutner announced Monday that Los Angeles schools "will resume some services next week for a small percentage of students with special needs." Beutner said, "In anticipation of a more complete reopening of schools in April, we will begin next week to offer child care, one-on-one and small group instruction, services for students with special needs and a return to athletic conditioning."

Cuomo Says NYC Movie Theaters Will Be Allowed To Reopen On March 5.

The New York Times (2/22, Gold, 20.6M) reports New York Gov. Andrew Cuomo (D) said Monday that New York City movie theaters in "will be permitted to open for the first time in nearly a year on March 5. ... The theaters will only be permitted to operate at 25 percent of their maximum capacity, with no more than 50 people per screening." In addition, the New York Daily News (2/22, Slattery, 2.51M) reports, "moviegoers will have to wear masks, socially distance and sit in assigned seats, and the venues must meet the state's air filtration standards, the same rules that apply to theaters upstate that reopened in the fall."

Some Women Concerned COVID Vaccines Can Cause Miscarriage Or Infertility Due To Online Rumors.

The Washington Post (2/22, A1, Cha, 10.52M) reports many women are concerned about the safety of the coronavirus vaccines because of online rumors that the vaccines can cause miscarriage or infertility. For example, Niharika Sathe, a 34-year-old internal medicine physician in New Jersey, heard about the rumor from a friend while she was early in her pregnancy, but after "scrutinizing information from the American College of Obstetricians and Gynecologists" and others, she concluded "the rumor had no basis in fact, and both she and her friend wound up getting the vaccine."

Howard University Surgeon: Many Skipping Preventive Care Appointments During Pandemic.

In an op-ed for the New York Times (2/22, 20.6M), Wayne A.I. Frederick, President of Howard University and a professor of surgery at Howard University School of Medicine, that according to a study published in the Journal of the National Medical Association in December, 43% of Americans "have missed preventive care appointments during the pandemic." Frederick adds that "we are already seeing the measurable effects of skipped appointments: This week the [CDC] reported that in the first six months of 2020, life expectancy in the United States fell on average by one year."

WHO's Tedros Urges Rich Nations Not To Hoard Vaccine Doses.

The AP (2/22, Moulson, Keaten) reports World Health Organization Director-General Tedros Adhanom Ghebreyesus on Monday "pleaded with rich countries...to check before ordering additional COVID-19 vaccine shots for themselves whether that undermines efforts to get vaccine shots to poorer nations." Tedros "thanked the G-7 countries for their 'significant' pledges," but after speaking with German President

Frank-Walter Steinmeier on Monday, he “said some rich countries’ approaches to manufacturers to secure more vaccines are ‘affecting the deals with COVAX, and even the amount that was allocated for COVAX was reduced because of this.’”

New COVID Cases Down In Worst Hotspots Worldwide.

The New York Times (2/22, McCann, Leatherby, Holder, 20.6M) reports that a month after “the pandemic looked bleak,” there has been “a surprisingly fast, if partial, turnaround. New cases have declined to half their peak globally, driven largely by steady improvements in some of the same places that weathered devastating outbreaks this winter.” The Times concedes cases “are an imperfect measure, and uneven records and testing mask the scope of outbreaks, especially in parts of Africa, Latin America and South Asia,” but “fewer patients are showing up at hospitals in many countries with the highest rates of infection, giving experts confidence that the decline is real.” However, the Times adds, “The positive signs come with a number of caveats and risks,” including the appearance of “more contagious variants” and that the declines come from “just six countries with enormous epidemics.”

UK Studies Show Vaccines Have Contributed To Sharp Drop In Hospitalizations; Government Reveals Plan To Reopen.

The AP (2/22, Kirka) reports, “Two U.K. studies released Monday showed that COVID-19 vaccination programs are contributing to a sharp drop in hospitalizations.” The AP says preliminary results of a study in Scotland “found that the Pfizer-BioNTech vaccine reduced hospital admissions by up to 85% four weeks after the first dose, while the Oxford-AstraZeneca shot cut admissions by up to 94%,” and preliminary data from a study of healthcare workers in England “showed that the Pfizer vaccine reduced the risk of catching COVID-19 by 70% after one dose, a figure that rose to 85% after the second.” UK Health Secretary Matt Hancock said that the new studies show “that the jab protects you, and protects those around you.”

Bloomberg (2/22, Paton, 3.57M) says the studies “highlight the significant impact the inoculations are already having in countries with the most advanced campaigns to protect their populations.” Bloomberg adds the vaccine “also shows high levels of protection against the variant, called B.1.1.7, first identified in southeast England, officials said.”

Meanwhile, the New York Times (2/22, Mueller, 20.6M) reports the findings “reinforced and went beyond studies out of Israel, which has also reported that the vaccine developed by Pfizer and BioNTech offered significant protection from the virus in real-world settings, and not only in the clinical trials held last year.” In addition, Politico Europe (2/22, Collis, 15K) says the findings come as the UK “plans to lift lockdown restrictions – in place since before Christmas – including letting all children return to school on March 8, and allowing groups of up to six people meet outdoors starting on March 29.”

The Washington Post (2/22, Booth, Adam, 10.52M) reports Prime Minister Boris Johnson on Monday “outlined detailed plans in Parliament, telling lawmakers that there would be four stages, with a minimum of five weeks between each stage.” The AP (2/22, Lawless, Kirka) reports Johnson “said the government’s plan would move the country ‘cautiously but irreversibly’ out of lockdown,” with June 21 scheduled to kick off “the final stage of the plan, in which all legal limits on social contact are removed and nightclubs can reopen after 15 months of closure.” The New York Times (2/22, Landler, Castle, 20.6M) reports that by pursuing the “phased approach,” Johnson is seeking to “avoid the mistakes of last year, when he often imposed restrictions too late and lifted them too early. In the process he tested the public’s patience with abrupt reversals, mixed messages and serial lockdowns – none of which spared Britain from the highest death toll in Europe.” The Wall Street Journal (2/22, A1, Colchester, Douglas, Subscription Publication, 8.41M) provides similar coverage.

Many Elementary Schools In Germany Return To In-Person Learning.

The AP (2/22, Jordans) reports, “Elementary students in more than half of Germany’s 16 states returned to school Monday after more than two months at home, the first major relaxation of the country’s pandemic measures since before Christmas.” Additionally, kindergartens “reopened their doors for pre-school children, giving much-anticipated relief to stressed parents trying to juggle working from home and childcare during the lockdown.” This latest “move was agreed at a meeting between German Chancellor Angela Merkel and state governors two weeks ago.”

France’s Contracts With Consulting Firms For Vaccine Strategy Raise Questions.

The New York Times (2/22, Alderman, 20.6M) reports, “As France raced to complete a complex blueprint in December for vaccinating its population against the coronavirus, the government quietly issued millions of euros in contracts to the consulting giant McKinsey & Company.” These deals, “which were not initially disclosed to the public, were intended to help ensure that millions of tiny vaccine vials would make their way quickly to distribution points for nursing homes, health care providers and the elderly.” Despite this spending, “within weeks, France’s vaccination campaign was being derided for being far too slow,” and “McKinsey has become a magnet for controversy in a country where an elite civil service is expected to manage public affairs, and private sector involvement is viewed with wariness.”

Bulgaria Confronts Long Lines After Announcing Open Vaccine Availability.

The New York Times (2/22, Dzhambazova, 20.6M) reports that while Bulgaria initially had a low vaccination rate, Prime Minister Boiko Borisov subsequently “called for ‘green corridors’ allowing anyone who wanted a vaccination to get one, regardless of whether they were in a priority group under the country's vaccination plan." According to the Times, while the Bulgarian government hoped the program would "administer around 10,000 shots per day, he said," the reaction "appears to be better than expected: The lines evoked the period of communist rule, when people would spend hours waiting to get basic supplies like oil or meat." The Times adds, "Since Friday, 30,000 people received their first vaccination, according to data provided by the health ministry. In comparison, around 120,000 total doses have been administered since vaccination campaign began in December."

Gaza Strip Starts Vaccination Drive.

The AP (2/22, Akram) reports, "The Hamas-ruled Gaza Strip began its coronavirus vaccination drive on Monday following the arrival of the first vaccines to the blockaded coastal area." Initially, "former health ministers and several medical workers were inoculated with Russia's Sputnik V jabs in front of dozens of cameras." Next, "medical workers and patients with chronic diseases are to start receiving injections on Tuesday." The Gaza Strip "has received just 22,000 doses of vaccines, a tiny fraction of what is needed to immunize the strip's 2 million people, including some 1.4 million people over age 18."

WPost: US Should Declassify Intelligence On Pre-Pandemic Wuhan Illnesses.

In an editorial, the Washington Post (2/22, 10.52M) writes that the US "possesses classified intelligence information about illnesses in the autumn of 2019, before the global pandemic, at the Wuhan Institute of Virology...which was carrying out research on bat coronaviruses very similar in genetic makeup to the pandemic virus." The Post says, "The intelligence should be declassified, and soon." The Post concludes, "Full transparency is needed from China, but also from the United States. ... The truth matters, and the United States should not hide any relevant evidence."

Leading National News

Biden, Marking 500K COVID Deaths, Says "We Will Get Through This."

Norah O'Donnell opened the CBS Evening News (2/22, lead story, 4:05, 4.77M) with "the kind of news few ever thought possible – news which somehow, no matter how many times we say it, is still so hard to comprehend. ... More than half a million Americans have now been killed by the coronavirus, 500,000 Americans taken by a virus we didn't even know existed a little over a year ago. Tonight, President Biden led the nation in a candlelight vigil, paying tribute to those who are gone. Above him at the White House, the flag now flies at half-staff for a country which has endured great loss on the battlefield during natural disasters and to violence, tonight still feels different, the weight to have the grief felt by Americans of all walks of life is crushing."

On ABC World News Tonight (2/22, lead story, 4:40, 8.08M), David Muir said, "We all mark that painful and sobering number, 500,000 American lives now lost to the coronavirus. President Biden just moments ago saying we must remember each person and the life they lived, noting more Americans have died in a single year in this pandemic than in World War I, World War II, and the Vietnam War combined. Tonight, a nation mourns, bells tolling at the Washington National Cathedral. ... That's the equivalent of nearly the entire city of Atlanta gone – more lives lost than those who live in Kansas City or Oakland or Miami or Minneapolis."

Miguel Almaguer said on NBC Nightly News (2/22, lead story, 2:35, Holt, 6.18M), "The President, with the enormity of the death toll on his shoulders, paused to remember the half million Americans who have lost their lives to the virus. Grandparents and mothers and fathers and even children, more fatalities from the yearlong pandemic than the number of Americans who died on the battlefield in World War I, World War II, and Vietnam combined." President Biden: "The people we lost were extraordinary. They spanned generations. Just like that, so many of them took their final breath alone in America."

The AP (2/22) reports, "With sunset remarks and a national moment of silence," the President "confronted head-on the country's once-unimaginable loss – half a million Americans in the COVID-19 pandemic – as he tried to strike a balance between mourning and hope. Addressing the 'grim, heartbreaking milestone' directly and publicly, Biden stepped to a lectern in the White House Cross Hall, unhooked his face mask and delivered an emotion-filled eulogy for more than 500,000 Americans he said he felt he knew. ... A president whose own life has been marked by family tragedy, Biden spoke in deeply personal terms, referencing his own losses as he tried to comfort the huge number of Americans whose lives have been forever changed by the pandemic." CNN (2/22, Vazquez, 89.21M) reports on its website that the President "also expressed optimism, telling Americans: 'We will get through this, I promise you.'"

The New York Times (2/22, Sanger, Stolberg, 20.6M) reports the President "urged the nation on Monday night to 'resist becoming numb to the sorrow' that the novel coronavirus had inflicted, marking the staggering milestone of more than a half-million Americans dead from the pandemic in a solemn ceremony at the White House. The country passed the grim toll around 5 p.m., and bells began tolling at the National Cathedral, resounding across a capital with flags lowered to half-staff. About an hour later, Mr. Biden appeared in the Cross Hall of the White House and pulled a card from his jacket pocket that he said was updated each day with the number of those infected – and those who died – from Covid-19."

USA Today (2/22, Morin, 12.7M) reports Vice President Harris, Dr. Biden, and Doug Emhoff "were also present during the remarks and moment of silence." The Washington Post (2/22, Cunningham, Schemm, 10.52M) says the event "recalled scenes from almost exactly a month ago, on the eve of Biden's inauguration, when he and Harris convened a vigil for coronavirus victims at the Lincoln Memorial." Reuters (2/22, Mason), Bloomberg (2/22, 3.57M), Axios (2/22, Chen, 1.26M), Politico (2/22, Din, 6.73M), The Hill (2/22, Chalfant, 5.69M), and the Fox

News (2/22, Lea, 23.99M) website are among the other outlets covering the ceremony.

The Wall Street Journal (2/22, Lucey, Restuccia, Subscription Publication, 8.41M) reports that "while the daily tally of new cases is down sharply from peak levels reached earlier this year, it is still elevated compared with totals in the late summer and early autumn." The AP (2/22, Deslatte, Webber) reports that "despite the rollout of vaccines since mid-December, a closely watched model from the University of Washington projects more than 589,000 dead by June 1." The New York Times (2/22, Tompkins, Bosman, Pietsch, 20.6M) reports that the US "accounts for about 20 percent of the world's known Covid deaths, but makes up just 4.25 percent of the global population."

The Los Angeles Times (2/22, King, Lee, Kaleem, 3.37M) says "the toll is hard to fathom. ... Last month, based on average 24-hour fatality counts, it was as if the terror attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, had happened every single day. Recorded U.S. deaths from COVID-19 are about one-fifth of the world's nearly 2.5 million known fatalities, twice as many as in Brazil, the next-hardest-hit country. California alone accounts for almost 50,000 deaths, about 10% of the country's total."

The San Francisco Chronicle (2/22, Vaziri, 2.44M) reports, "From the first confirmed fatality in Santa Clara County on Feb. 6, and the early days of the emergence of coronavirus infections, it took until the end of May before the country recorded its first 100,000 deaths. The pandemic has since swept across the world and the U.S., stressing the nation's health care system, rattling its economy and rewriting the rules of everyday society. The death toll reached 400,000 on Jan. 19, meaning the last 100,000 deaths occurred in just over a month." The New York Daily News (2/22, Wilkinson, Matthews, 2.51M) reports, "The deadliest single day was Jan. 12, when 4,401 Americans died, according to the data. Approximately 1 in every 656 people in the U.S. has now died from the disease." USA Today (2/22, Ortiz, Miller, Aspegren, 12.7M) and the Atlanta Journal-Constitution (2/22, 1.46M) are among the other newspapers marking the milestone.

Gallup Poll: 67% Approve Of Biden's Handling Of Pandemic. A Gallup poll (2/3-2/18) finds that 67% of Americans approve of Biden's handling of the pandemic. Eugene Robinson writes in the Washington Post (2/22, 10.52M) that even as we reach the "unspeakable milestone" of 500,000 deaths from COVID, "there is unambiguous good news in the fight against the virus. It is possible, finally, to imagine a day when this devastating pandemic is brought to an end." Robinson adds that "we now have serious, competent leadership that believes in science, not conspiracy theories."

Deese: Long-Term Damage To Labor Market A Greater Threat Than Inflation.

Bloomberg (2/22, Dmitrieva, Ferro, 3.57M) reports NEC Director Deese said in an interview with Bloomberg TV Monday that while inflation is a risk, the greater danger is long-term damage to the labor market. Deese said, "We take very seriously the economic risks that are out there, we spend a lot of time thinking about them, a lot of time worrying about them." Deese said inflation is "a risk that we're keeping our eye on and it's something to consider. ... As we assess and balance these risks, we believe that the risks of further scarring in the labor market – the risks of further extending this economic pain – outweigh the risks of doing too much" with relief spending. Bloomberg TV will air the full interview Tuesday morning.

House Budget Committee Approves Biden's Rescue Plan.

The New York Times (2/22, Benner, Savage, 20.6M) reports that on Monday, Democrats on the House Budget Committee approved President Biden's $1.9 trillion American Rescue Plan "on a nearly party-line vote, bringing the pandemic aid plan closer to passage later this week." Rep. Lloyd Doggett (D-TX) "joined Republicans on Monday in voting against advancing it," but "a spokeswoman later said that Mr. Doggett, who joined the session remotely right after his plane landed in Washington, misunderstood the vote and supports the legislation." USA Today (2/22, Wu, Hayes, 12.7M) says the measure "now heads to the House Rules Committee for consideration later in the week where it is also expected to win approval before heading to the full floor for consideration." House Majority Leader Hoyer "has told lawmakers to expect the House to vote on it later in the week."

Reuters (2/22) reports Senate Majority Leader Schumer "said later that efforts in the House and Senate have kept the bill on track to be approved by both chambers and sent to Biden for his signature before federal unemployment benefits expire on March 14." Bloomberg (2/22, 3.57M) reports that "this will be the first real test for Democrats' full control of government since former President Donald Trump's impeachment trial, with implications for the rest of Biden's agenda and the pandemic-battered economy."

The Wall Street Journal (2/22, Peterson, Duehren, Subscription Publication, 8.41M) says the bill "has already started a messy fight in the Senate, where Democrats are divided over whether to include a provision that would gradually raise the minimum wage to $15 an hour over four years," but to the AP (2/22, Fram), Democratic leaders "have a potent dynamic on their side as Congress preps for its first votes on the party's $1.9 trillion COVID-19 relief bill: Would any Democrat dare cast the vote that scuttles...Biden's leadoff initiative?" While "internal Democratic disputes remain over issues like raising the minimum wage, how much aid to funnel to struggling state and local governments and whether to extend emergency unemployment benefits for an extra month," Democrats "across the party's spectrum show little indication they're willing to embarrass Biden with a high-profile defeat a month into his presidency." NBC Nightly News (2/22, story 2, 1:00, Holt, 6.18M), and the CNN (2/22, Grayer, 89.21M) and Fox Business (2/22, Lea, 3.06M) websites, provide similar coverage.

In an editorial, the Washington Post (2/22, 10.52M) says that amid growing concerns about the bill's cost, Biden "has challenged his critics," asking, "What would they have me cut?" The Post says, "The first trim should be to Mr. Biden's proposed $1,400 direct payments, the current House version of which would cost $422 billion. ... That's a lot of money to shower on the non-poor." The Post adds that it is "increasingly clear that the pandemic reduced states and local governments' revenue far less than initially feared, especially considering federal aid they have already received. ... Yet the House bill contemplates $510 billion in new aid." The Post argues that given the "investments he hopes to begin making later this year in infrastructure, climate research and other high-priority needs," when Biden asks, "What would they have me cut?" he "should listen with an open mind to good-faith answers to that question."

California Lawmakers Approve $7.6B COVID Relief Package. Under "a $7.6-billion COVID-19 economic relief package approved" by the California legislature Monday, the Los Angeles Times (2/22, McGreevy, 3.37M) reports, "Californians who qualify for a $600 state stimulus payment could see the money arrive as soon as a month after filing their tax returns." The plan also includes "more than $2.1 billion in grants and fee waivers for small businesses. Those companies can soon apply for the grants, followed by an approval process that state officials estimate would take 45 days."

Democrats Discuss Alternative Means To Secure Minimum Wage Increase.

Politico (2/22, Emma, Lorenzo, 6.73M) reports that Democrats are "scrambling to piece together a backup plan that could save their minimum wage hike from getting tossed out of President Joe Biden's $1.9 trillion relief package and win over moderates wary of the proposal." Politico says the proposed increase is "running into strong headwinds from two influential Senate Democratic centrists," Sens. Joe Manchin (D-WV) and Kyrsten Sinema (D-AZ), so Democrats are "discussing the possibility of capping the increase at less than $15 an hour, to possibly $11 or $12," although "progressives aren't yet ready to ditch the $15 figure." Politico says progressives are "pushing the possibility of a small business tax relief plan that could be paired with the minimum wage increase in order to alleviate any burdens on businesses required to increase their pay."

US Factories Have Not Kept Pace With Rebound in Consumer Demand.

The Wall Street Journal (2/22, Tita, Hufford, Subscription Publication, 8.41M) reports while US manufacturers "aced the shutdown of their factories and warehouses last spring in response to Covid-19," they were "unprepared for the sharp rebound in consumer demand that began just weeks later and never let up." According to federal data, "consumer spending on long-lasting goods in the U.S. rose 6.4% last year but domestic production of those goods fell 8.4%." The result, the Journal adds, was "shortages and higher prices."

Black Americans Lag Behind Whites In Financial Preparedness For Retirement.

The Wall Street Journal (2/22, Tergesen, Gillers, Subscription Publication, 8.41M) reports that many Black Americans are further behind than whites on preparing financially for retirement. According to data from academic and government sources, the economic turmoil caused by the pandemic further widened the retirement preparedness gap between Blacks and white. In particular, the data show that many Black Americans are hindered in saving for retirement by several factors, including lower levels of intergenerational wealth, higher student debt burdens, and lower rates of homeownership rates compared to white Americans.

Some Nations Considering Wealth Tax To Cover Pandemic-Caused Recession

The Washington Post (2/22, Laje, Faiola, 10.52M) reports that some are now arguing countries should tax its wealthiest citizens to pay for the economic costs of the pandemic. So far, Argentina, "saddled with crippling debt exacerbated by the pandemic, adopted a one-time special levy on the rich in December, demanding up to 3.5 percent of the total net worth of citizens who hold at least $3.4 million of assets." Similarly "in December, struggling Bolivia passed a longer-term wealth tax hitting anyone with more than $4.3 million." Meanwhile, in Britain, which is "confronting its largest budget deficit on record, an independent Wealth Tax Commission has recommended a one-time levy that could affect people with as little as 250,000 pounds – $346,000."

WSJournal Sees Increasing "Ideological Censorship" By Tech Firms.

A Wall Street Journal (2/22, Subscription Publication, 8.41M) editorial decries what it sees as growing "ideological censorship" by tech firms. As an example, the Journal cites Amazon's removal of a book by conservative scholar Ryan Anderson. The Journal adds that Reps. Anna Eshoo (D-CA) and Jerry McNerney (D-CA) wrote to the CEOs of Amazon, Apple, Google and cable television companies to "demand...more ideological censorship." To the Journal, "Corporate media censorship...is accelerating. And government is right alongside, pushing for censorship with increasing force."

Biden WTO Delegation Backs Trump's Stance On Hong Kong And China.

Bloomberg (2/22, 3.57M) reports that the Biden Administration has "dashed hopes for a softer approach to the World Trade Organization by pursuing a pair of his predecessor's strategies that critics say risk undermining the international trading system." According to Bloomberg, "The U.S. delegation to the WTO, in a statement...backed the Trump administration's decision to label Hong Kong exports as 'Made in China' and said the WTO had no right to mediate the matter because the organization's rules permit countries to take any action to protect their 'essential security interests.'" Bloomberg says that "prior to 2016, WTO members generally steered clear of defending their trade actions on the basis of national security because doing so could encourage other nations to pursue protectionist policies that have little or nothing to do with hostile threats."

Garland Tells Senators He Will Not Be "The President's Lawyer," Vows Focus On Capitol Riot.

All three broadcast networks covered the Senate Judiciary Committee confirmation hearing for Attorney General-designate Garland. David Muir said on ABC World News Tonight (2/22, story 6, 1:00, 8.08M) that Garland "said, 'I am not the President's lawyer, I'm the United States' lawyer.' And if confirmed, he revealed his top priority will be to investigate the Capitol riots." ABC's Rachel Scott: "He called that attack on Capitol Hill heinous, saying that he would prosecute the white supremacists and others who stormed the Capitol on January 6."

Norah O'Donnell said on the CBS Evening News (2/22, story 6, 2:00, 4.77M) that Garland "appears to be on his way to Senate confirmation." CBS' Kris Van Cleave: "Nearly five years after being nominated to the US Supreme Court, Merrick Garland finally got his Senate confirmation hearing today for attorney general. ... He'd take over a department beset by low morale and under fire by Democrats for decisions made during the Trump Administration, and from Republicans for its investigation of the Trump Administration." Sen. Ted Cruz (R-TX): "You do not view your role as attorney general as being Joe Biden's wingman." Garland: "I'm not the President's lawyer. I am the United States' lawyer." Van Cleave: "After a summer of social unrest following the killing of George Floyd by a white police officer, Garland said civil rights enforcement will be a priority." Garland: "There's no question that there is disparate treatment in our justice system."

Pete Williams said on NBC Nightly News (2/22, story 5, 1:25, Holt, 6.17M), "Garland says the siege at the Capitol shows that violent extremism is more of a threat now than it was 26 years ago when the Oklahoma City federal building was bombed, and Garland led that federal prosecution. He says the Capitol investigation will range beyond the actual rioters. ... Garland pledged to make sure the White House and politics don't interfere with investigations, including the special council's inquiry into the FBI's investigation of the Trump campaign and the tax investigation of the President's son, Hunter." Garland: "I would not have taken this job if I thought that politics would have any influence over prosecutions and investigations."

The AP (2/22, Balsamo, Tucker, Jalonick) says Garland, "among Biden's most widely supported nominees," sought to "assure lawmakers that the Justice Department would remain politically independent on his watch." The New York Times (2/22, Benner, Savage, 20.6M) reports Garland "vowed to uphold the independence of a Justice Department that had suffered deep politicization under the Trump administration." USA Today (2/22, Behrmann, Santucci, 12.7M) reports, "Garland was often pressed by Republican senators over the political independence of the Justice Department, and was pressed, to which he agreed, to commit to not prosecute Biden's political foes. Very few GOP lawmakers mentioned Trump's Justice Department, and the accusations Attorney General Bill Barr faced for using the power of the agency to help President Donald Trump politically."

The Washington Post (2/22, Barrett, 10.52M) reports Garland "drew parallels to the domestic terrorism threat the Justice Department faced in confronting the Ku Klux Klan, as well as the prosecution he led of Timothy McVeigh in the bombing of a federal building in Oklahoma City in 1995. 'We are facing a more dangerous period than we faced in Oklahoma City at that time,' Garland asserted, promising a broad investigation into not just the rioters, but those who aided them."

The New York Daily News (2/22, Sommerfeldt, 2.51M) reports that Garland will "become the third Jewish attorney general in American history if confirmed by the Senate." He told the committee, "I come from a family where my grandparents fled antisemitism and persecution. The country took us in, and protected us. I feel an obligation to the country to pay back and this is the highest, best use of my own set of skills to pay back."

The Wall Street Journal (2/22, Gurman, Viswanatha, Subscription Publication, 8.41M) reports under the headline "Garland Makes Case For New Era At Justice Department" that the nominee "received a mostly warm reception during his daylong confirmation hearing." The Los Angeles Times (2/22, 3.37M) reports Senate Judiciary Chairman Richard Durbin "told reporters he expected his panel would vote on the nomination early next week, with a floor vote coming a few days later."

Jennifer Rubin writes in the Washington Post (2/22, 10.52M) that Garland "was the model of judicial deportment, precision and character." Garland, she adds, "reiterated his commitment to keep the department free of political interference." Dana Milbank writes in the Washington Post (2/22, 10.52M) that Garland sent "a clear message to the violent white supremacists and other domestic terrorists who thrived during the Trump years, most visibly in their attack on the Capitol last month: There's a new sheriff in town."

Reuters (2/22, Chiacu), the New York Post (2/22, Nelson, 7.45M), Axios (2/22, Allassan, 1.26M), Politico (2/22, LeVine, Gerstein, 6.73M), The Hill (2/22, Carney, Beitsch, 5.69M), Roll Call (2/22, Ruger, 130K), and the CNN (2/22, Rogers, Herb, 89.21M) and Fox News (2/22, Raasch, 23.99M) websites are among other sources covering the hearing.

White House Continues To Back Tanden For OMB Despite Mounting Senate Opposition.

The AP (2/22, Hazell) reports the nomination of OMB Director-designate Tanden was "thrown further into doubt on Monday as moderate Republican Sens. Susan Collins of Maine and Mitt Romney of Utah said they would vote against confirming her." The AP notes that on Friday, Sen. Joe Manchin (D-WV) "became the first Democratic lawmaker to oppose the confirmation of Tanden." However, according to Reuters, even "with doubts growing about Tanden's chances for confirmation, the White House called her 'an accomplished policy expert.'" and President Biden "said he was sticking with her."

Bloomberg (2/22, Hunter, Fabian, Cook, 3.57M) reports that the three senators "criticized Tanden's temperament, saying her past habit of attacking Republicans on Twitter – including Collins, whom she once called 'the worst' – left her unsuited for the budget job." Bloomberg adds that Collins "also criticized Tanden for deleting more than 1,000 tweets ahead of her nomination, saying it suggested she wouldn't be transparent in office." But Bloomberg adds that "even with the new GOP opposition, the White House said it would stand behind Tanden's nomination to lead the Office of Management and Budget." On Monday, White House Press Secretary Jen Psaki said, "Neera Tanden is an accomplished policy expert who would be an excellent Budget Director and we look forward to the committee votes this week and to continuing to work toward her confirmation through engagement with both parties." The New York Post (2/22, Jacobs, 7.45M) also reports Psaki "called it 'an overstatement' to say that there was not a new tone of unity in Washington simply because of her nomination."

In addition, the Wall Street Journal (2/22, Restuccia, Collins, Subscription Publication, 8.41M) reports Psaki "said White House officials spoke to senators of both parties about the nomination over the weekend and are taking no one for granted," but The Hill (2/22, Samuels, Chalfant, 5.69M) reports Sen. Rob Portman (R-OH), the ranking member of the Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee, on Monday "said just before announcing his opposition to Tanden that nobody from the White House has reached out to try to convince him to vote for her."

Meanwhile, Roll Call (2/22, Shutt, 130K) describes Sen. Lisa Murkowski (R-AK) "is another closely-watched Republican vote," and reports Sen. John Cornyn (R-TX) "said the wave of Republican opposition combined with Manchin's 'no' vote would likely end Tanden's confirmation process." Politico (2/22, LeVine, Everett, 6.73M) says that without Romney or Collins "supporting her nomination, it's increasingly unlikely that Tanden will be confirmed." Politico points out that Tanden is "scheduled to receive a vote" in the committee this week, and Sen. Kyrsten Sinema (D-AZ), "who is often aligned with Manchin, sits on that committee but has not declared her position on Tanden."

Reuters (2/22, Zengerle) says the fight over her nomination "underscored the influence a small group of moderates will have as Biden seeks to achieve his policy goals in the narrowly divided Congress," USA Today (2/22, Wu, 12.7M) also reports that Senate Budget Chairman Bernie Sanders "has been noncommittal on her nomination, grilling Tanden, the former head of the liberal Center for American Progress, on her past statements and her former organization's corporate donations."

The New York Times (2/22, Cochrane, Rappoport, 20.6M) highlights that if she is not confirmed, Tanden "would be the first casualty for Mr. Biden, who has so far been able to win Senate support for several other cabinet picks, though many nominees have yet to face full Senate votes." Per the Washington Post (2/22, Kim, Linskey, Stein, 10.52M), "The pending defeat also is a blow to Biden's ability to advance his agenda in a chamber he served for decades, with his knowledge of the institution a key selling point as he campaigned for the presidency." The Post adds the fight over her nomination "comes at a critical moment for the White House budget office as the administration tries to leverage trillions of dollars in relief funds to help a battered American economy recover from the pandemic."

However, Politico (2/22, Barron-Lopez, Cadelago, 6.73M) says women's rights activists "and allied Democrats are growing increasingly vocal about what they call the unfair targeting of women and people of color nominated by Joe Biden to top posts in his administration." Politico adds White House officials observed "that many of the lawmakers objecting to Tanden's social media missives – including Manchin – voted to confirm Richard Grenell, the acid-tongued Trump booster, to the post of U.S. ambassador to Germany," while "Democrats on and off the Hill likewise argued that Tanden, who is of South Asian descent, was one of several nominees of color being treated differently than Trump-era nominees who lobbed personal attacks or expressed bigoted views." The AP (2/22, Hazell) reports Tanden "would be the first woman of color to lead the agency" if confirmed.

In an editorial, the Washington Post (2/22, 10.52M) says that while Tanden "has been undiplomatic," the case "against her confirmation is weak – especially when you compare her with many of the people Republican senators have endorsed in the past." The Post adds, "It is not fair to hold Mr. Biden's nominees to a far higher standard because the president has called for unity while his predecessor denigrated it." The Post concludes, "For the most part, Republican senators thus far have been supporting Mr. Biden's nominations with admirable bipartisanship. They will only look silly if they allow some hurt feelings to get in the way now."

House Democratic Leaders Want Biden To Replace Tanden With Young, Sources Say. "House Democratic leaders are quietly mounting a campaign for Shalanda Young, a longtime congressional aide, to replace Neera Tanden as nominee...people familiar with the matter tell" Axios (2/22, Nichols, Goba, 1.26M), although it also reports Young, a former staff director for the House Appropriations Committee who is "currently waiting for a confirmation hearing in the Senate to be deputy OMB director, may still face competition from Gene Sperling, who has the distinction of twice leading the National Economic Council."

Haaland Commits To "Strike The Right Balance" On Oil, Natural Gas.

The AP (2/22, Daly) reports that in testimony prepared for her confirmation hearing on Tuesday, Interior Secretary-designate Haaland "said she is committed to 'strike the right balance' [on oil and natural gas drilling] as the agency manages energy development and seeks to restore and protect the nation's sprawling federal lands." According to the AP, "Haaland's remarks are intended to rebut criticism from some Republicans who have complained that her opposition to drilling on federal lands will cost thousands of jobs and harm economies throughout the West."

However, the New York Times (2/22, Davenport, 20.6M) reports that while Haaland's nomination "was hailed as historic" because she is "the first Native American ever nominated to serve in cabinet – in this case to head a department that, for much of the nation's history, has mistreated and neglected Indigenous Americans," none of Biden's other nominees so far have "divided the political parties as sharply." The Times adds that for her supporters, she "embodies the hope of the Biden era, an activist second-term representative from New Mexico who would break ground like no other member of the cabinet, ethnically and politically," but her "detractors have zeroed in on her activism, especially her forthright denunciations of any and all oil and gas exploration on public land and her fierce opposition to the natural gas extraction method known as hydraulic fracturing, or fracking." Bloomberg (2/22, Dlouhy, 3.57M) says Haaland's "opposition to fracking, early endorsement of the Green New Deal and participation in protests against an oil pipeline in South Dakota have made her one of President Joe Biden's most controversial cabinet nominees." Bloomberg adds that while some Republicans, including Sen. Steve Daines (R-MT) are "already warning she's unlikely to get their support," the Senate "ultimately is still expected to confirm Haaland."

In addition, Politico (2/22, Adragna, Lefebvre, 6.73M) reports her supporters "say they see a familiar pattern in the Republicans' rhetoric and their unusual move to voice their opposition even before her nomination hearing was scheduled." According to Politico, they "say she's facing a level of criticism above and beyond the normal fiery Washington political rhetoric," and also "said the reflexive GOP opposition is impossible to separate from the federal government's actions over many generations that marginalized and isolated tribal communities." The Hill (2/22, Frazin, 5.69M) provides similar coverage.

Conservatives Target Democratic Senators In Anti-Becerra Push.

Politico (2/22, Ollstein, 6.73M) says that even though "conservatives know they likely don't have the votes to block" HHS Secretary-designate Becerra from being confirmed, they are "launching new ad blitzes and pressure campaigns targeting Senate Democrats up for reelection and others they believe can be swayed, aiming to make a vote to confirm him a political liability." Among the targets are Sens. Maggie Hassan (D-NH) and Raphael Warnock (D-GA).

Virginia Lawmakers Vote To Abolish Death Penalty.

The Washington Post (2/22, Vozzella, Schneider, 10.52M) reports the Virginia General Assembly on Monday approved two bills to abolish the death penalty in the state, "and were headed to Gov. Ralph Northam (D), who is expected to sign them." According to the Post, Virginia "would then become the first in the South to abandon the ultimate punishment." The AP (2/22, Lavoie, Rankin) calls the vote "a dramatic turnaround for a state that has executed more people in its long history than any other." The Richmond \(VA\) Times-Dispatch (2/22, Green, 401K) reports Virginia "has executed 113 people in modern times, second only to Texas, since the U.S. Supreme Court allowed the death penalty to resume in 1976."

Pritzker Signs Criminal Justice Reform Bill.

The Chicago Sun-Times (2/22, Hinton, 970K) reports Illinois Gov. J.B. Pritzker (D) "signed a sweeping criminal justice bill into law Monday, moving Illinois closer to ending cash bail and requiring police officers to wear body cameras – arguing the package will lead to 'true safety, true fairness and true justice,'" but Republicans "disagreed, calling the new law 'an insult to our first responders, law enforcement and the law-abiding citizens.'" The Chicago Tribune (2/22, Petrella, 2.03M) says the legislation was "praised by reform advocates and panned by many in law enforcement."

Investigation Faults Police For Treatment Of Elijah McClain.

The AP (2/22, Nieberg, Slevin) reports that an investigation conducted on behalf of the city of Aurora, Colorado, of the fatal arrest of Elijah McClain released Monday "criticizes how police handled the entire incident, faulting officers for their quick, aggressive treatment of the 23-year-old Black man and the department for having a weak accountability system that failed to press for the truth about what happened." The AP adds the probe "found 'two contrasting stories' of what happened to McClain in August 2019 after someone reported him as suspicious. One, based on officers' statements to investigators, where police describe a violent, relentless struggle. And another based on body camera footage in which McClain can be heard crying out in pain, apologizing, explaining himself, and pleading with the officers as they restrained him, applied 'pain compliance' techniques, and sat or knelt on him."

The Denver Post (2/22, Schmelzer, 660K) says the investigation found Aurora police and paramedics "made substantial errors at nearly every stage of their interaction with Elijah McClain and the detectives tasked with investigating the incident that led to the 23-year-old's death stretched the truth to exonerate the officers involved." On ABC World News Tonight (2/22, story 8, 0:20, 8.08M), David Muir said that the "scathing independent investigation" found police "had no legal basis to stop him while walking home or for using a choke hold."

On the CBS Evening News (2/22, story 7, 1:40, O'Donnell, 4.6M), Omar Villafranca reported the investigation "says Aurora, Colorado did not have the right to stop, frisk, or violently restrain Elijah McClain in August 2019," and "according to report, EMS 'administered a ketamine dosage based on a grossly inaccurate and inflated estimate of Mr. McClain's size,' adding that 'higher doses can carry a higher risk of sedation complications for which this team was not clearly prepared.' McClain suffered cardiac arrest and later died in the hospital." On NBC Nightly News (2/22, story 7, 1:40, Holt, 6.17M), Gabe Gutierrez said the investigation "also found that 'the post-event investigation was flawed' because the department 'failed to ask basic, critical questions about the justification for the use of force.'"

CNN (2/22, Jimenez, Vera, Levenson, 89.21M) reports on its website that Sheneen McClain "cried [while] reading" the report about the death of her son. She told CNN, "It was overwhelming knowing my son was innocent the entire time and just waiting on the facts and proof of it." She added, "My son's name is cleared now. He's no longer labeled a suspect. He is actually a victim."

Arbery's Mother Discusses Racial Injustice.

For the NBC Nightly News (2/22, story 8, 2:20, Holt, 6.17M) "State Of The Struggle" series, Blayne Alexander interviewed Wanda Cooper-Jones, mother of Ahmaud Arbery, about how the country "is grappling with racial injustice." Alexander also reported that after Arbery's death, Georgia "passed a hate crime law, previously one of just four states that did not have one. But Cooper-Jones says she thinks the Biden Administration will help heal America's racial divide." Alexander added President Biden last month "signed an executive order declaring racial equity a government priority." Biden: "I firmly believe the nation is ready to change."

Police Arrest Wife Of "El Chapo" On Drug Charges.

The AP (2/22, Balsamo) reports Emma Coronel Aispuro, the 31-year-old wife of "Mexican drug kingpin" Joaquin "El Chapo" Guzman was arrested on Monday at Dulles International Airport in Virginia "and accused of helping her husband run his multibillion-dollar cartel and plot his audacious escape from a Mexican prison in 2015." The AP describes her arrest as "the latest twist in the bloody, multinational saga involving Guzman, the longtime head of the Sinaloa drug cartel," while Reuters (2/22, Stempel, Daniel) highlights that her arrest "is the highest profile U.S. capture of a Mexican on drug charges since former Mexican Defense Minister Salvador Cienfuegos was detained in October, and experts said it indicated a deterioration in bilateral security relations."

The New York Times (2/22, Feuer, Goldman, 20.6M) reports court documents "filed in Ms. Coronel's case said she relayed messages for Mr. Guzmán that helped him make drug shipments from 2012 to 2014 and evade capture by the legions of American and Mexican authorities who had been pursuing him for years." The Times adds evidence "emerged at Mr. Guzmán's trial that Ms. Coronel was also a chief conspirator in a sophisticated plot to break him out of the Altiplano prison in Mexico by digging a nearly mile-long tunnel into the shower of his cell."

Meanwhile, the Washington Post (2/22, Hsu, Sheridan, 10.52M) reports she "grew up in Sinaloa state, the traditional heart of Mexico's illegal drug industry, but was born in California, making her a U.S. citizen." The Post adds that she "slipped over the border in 2011 to give birth to the couple's twin daughters, Maria Joaquina and Emali, in a Los Angeles County hospital." The Wall Street Journal (2/22, de Cordoba, Subscription Publication, 8.41M) and USA Today (2/22, McCoy, 12.7M) provide similar coverage.

Families Of Victims Of Pensacola Navy Base Mass Shooting Sue Saudi Arabia.

The Washington Post (2/22, Hsu, 10.52M) reports the families of three US service members killed in the "mass shooting at Naval Air Station Pensacola in 2019" and 13 others injured in the attack "alleged Monday that the government of Saudi Arabia facilitated the attack, which U.S. authorities concluded was an act of international terrorism." According to the Post, "A 152-page complaint in federal court in Pensacola, Fla., makes new allegations that the shooter, Royal Saudi Air Force 2nd Lt. Ahmed Mohammed al-Shamrani, executed the attack with the support of 'accomplices,'" including "fellow Saudi air force trainees." The AP (2/22, Tucker) reports the lawsuit "also says Saudi trainees were aware that he had purchased and stored firearms and ammunition in his barracks, and that they had failed to report his posting of and sharing extremist and anti-American material on social media."

Murphy Signs Legislation Legalizing Marijuana In New Jersey.

The New York Times (2/22, Closson, 20.6M) reports New Jersey Gov. Philip Murphy (D) on Monday "signed into law three bills that effectively permit and regulate the use of recreational marijuana in New Jersey, making it the most populous state in the Northeast to fully legalize the drug." According to the Times, "New Jersey is now one of 14 states to legalize the recreational use of cannabis for adults 21 and older, while also easing several penalties for underage possession and allowing for the creation of a regulated market that could provide a welcomed boost to the state's economy as it recovers from the pandemic." However, the Times adds that legal sales "likely remain months away at the earliest, as the state takes on its next task of creating a heavily regulated industry large enough to support public demand, with licenses still to be doled out to dispensaries."

Education Department Says Schools Must Administer Annual Exams.

The Washington Post (2/22, Meckler, 10.52M) reports the Education Department informed states on Monday that they "are still required to administer annual exams to students, part of the national schools accountability program," but they "may seek permission to move assessments to the fall, administer tests remotely and/or shorten the exam." The Post says the Biden Administration "rejected calls to allow states to skip the tests altogether, which they were allowed to do last year." Many school chiefs "had hoped that the administration would waive the testing requirements altogether. More than 70 local, state and national organizations signed a letter urging the administration to let states use alternative assessments instead."

College Enrollment Declined Last Year.

Bloomberg (2/22, Tanzi, 3.57M) reports research published Monday by the Federal Reserve Bank of St. Louis shows that US college enrollment "of first-time undergraduates declined at the fastest pace in decades last year." The bank "said freshman enrollment plunged 13.1% in the fall of 2020 and that college enrollment overall was down almost 3%."

Academic: Administration Should Not Buy Into Ideological Debate On Charter Schools.

In an op-ed for the New York Times (2/22, 20.6M), Eve L. Ewing, a sociologist of education, writes that "the discourse about charter schools has become more of an ideological debate, split neatly into opposing factions, than it is a policy discussion informed by facts. As long as Democrats play by those rules, they miss an important chance to reframe the debate altogether." Rather than seeing the debate as "pro-charter" or "anti-charter," the Biden Administration "should take a simpler, more transformative stance: demanding high-quality, well-financed schools for all children.” Ewing adds, “By succumbing to a binary view of charter schools, Democrats miss the bigger picture. Many parents choose charter schools because they want their child to get a great education. ... We need to replace the fight over charter schools with the assertion that every child deserves a great school. And we need the political courage and imagination to make that happen.”

Biden Administration Opens First Migrant Facility For Children.

The Washington Post (2/22, Foster-Frau, 10.52M) reports that “dozens of migrant teens” traveled on Monday to Carrizo Springs, Texas, to “the first migrant child facility opened under the Biden administration.” The Post adds the “emergency facility – a vestige of the Trump administration that was open for only a month in summer 2019 – is being reactivated to hold up to 700 children ages 13 to 17,” and officials “say the camp is needed because facilities for migrant children have had to cut capacity by nearly half because of the coronavirus pandemic.” Meanwhile, the Post says the number of unaccompanied children to cross the border “has been inching up, with January reporting the highest total – more than 5,700 apprehensions – for that month in recent years.” A Wall Street Journal (2/22, Hackman, Subscription Publication, 8.41M) article headlined “Rise In Migrant Children Tests Biden Border Strategy” provides similar coverage.

Two Senate Committees To Hold Hearings On Capitol Riot.

The New York Times (2/22, Broadwater, 20.6M) reports that as the House “haggle[s] over the formation of a 9/11-style commission to investigate the Jan. 6 attack on the Capitol,” the Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee and the Senate Rules and Administration Committee are “pressing ahead with a series of investigative hearings to scrutinize the security breakdowns that failed to prevent the deadly pro-Trump rampage.” The Times says lawmakers on Tuesday will “question the officials who were in charge of securing the Capitol during the attack, when Capitol Police officers and members of the District of Columbia’s police force called in as reinforcements were overrun as the vice president and members of the House and the Senate were gathered inside.”

However, the Washington Post (2/22, DeBonis, Demirjian, 10.52M) warns that the hearing “could also become a battleground for competing narratives over what prompted the riot and who was responsible for it – a question that has become even more pointed following former president Donald Trump’s acquittal on impeachment charges earlier this month.”

House Leaders Divided Over Composition Of 1/6 Commission. Politico (2/22, Caygle, Cheney, 6.73M) reports House Speaker Pelosi “and her Republican counterparts” are “battling over the contours of a panel inspired by the 9/11 Commission to investigate the deadly Capitol insurrection on Jan. 6, with Republicans demanding equal representation.” Politico says they “have already traded one offer each but still remain at odds over several issues including membership on the proposed commission, according to multiple sources familiar with the talks.” Politico adds that while Pelosi “proposed tilting the panel in favor of Democrats, with her party getting to pick seven of the members while Republican leaders choose four additional appointees,” Republicans “are insisting on an equal split – each party gets to appoint five members – in their counteroffer, sources told Politico,” and they “are pressing Democrats to avoid specifically prescribing avenues of inquiry that might steer the panel in certain directions, as opposed to allowing panelists to determine their own course.” The Hill (2/22, Marcos, 5.69M) provides similar coverage.

Capitol Police Officer Discusses Attack On Capitol. In an exclusive, the ABC News (2/22, Thomas, Ordonez, Larramendia, 2.44M) reports on its website that Capitol Police officer Harry Dunn “said the rotunda no longer resembled the room he once knew on Jan. 6, the day of the siege on the Capitol,” and he “recalls gasping for air through the pepper spray and bear mace, blood on his knuckles and the relentless noises from the rioters.” In an interview on Monday, Dunn became the first US Capitol Police officer “to speak publicly about the events of Jan. 6.” ABC World News Tonight (2/22, story 7, 1:50, Muir, 7.55M) also aired a segment of the interview. According to ABC’s Pierre Thomas, Dunn “said the mob hurled the N-word at him, a Black officer, that weapon of a word.” Dunn: “What the hell just happened? I got called a [bleep] couple dozen times today protecting this building. Is this America?” Thomas added Dunn “wanted to make it clear he’s speaking for himself and not his department. A force that’s still trying to cope with that nightmarish day. But he’s so proud of the men and women who fought beside him in that fight for democracy.”

Oath Keeper Alters Claim That She Met With Secret Service Before Attack On Capitol. Reuters (2/22, Ax) reports Jessica Watkins, “a leader of the far-right group Oath Keepers who is charged with participating in the Jan. 6 riot at the U.S. Capitol,” on Monday “reversed her story...about having met with Secret Service agents in Washington on the day of the insurrection,” and in a new court filing her attorney instead “said she had merely spoken with some agents while passing through a security checkpoint.” According to Reuters, “Watkins is asking the court to release her to home confinement while she awaits trial, citing in part the risk of maltreatment she faces in jail as a transgender woman.”

Klain Is In Frequent Contact With Progressives.

The Daily Beast (2/22, 933K) reports that the “lines of communication...between the progressive left and President Joe Biden” are open. Chief of Staff Klain “speaks to Sens. Bernie Sanders (I-VT) and Elizabeth Warren (D-MA) ‘quite often,’ recently talked to freshman Rep. Jamaal Bowman (D-NY), a newly minted Squad member, and has conversations with many ‘less famous’ individuals in the Democratic Party’s left wing on a regular basis, he told The Daily Beast in an interview.” Klain said, “Progressives are a big part of our party and making sure their voices are heard here at the White House is a big part of my job.” His “frequent communication with top leaders on the left is part of a critical, emerging infrastructure within the White House. The goal, described by three White House officials, including the chief of staff, is not only to elevate their ideas and concerns, but to make them a permanent part of the policy making process.”

Bob Dole Discusses His Conversation With Biden.

The Wall Street Journal (2/22, Seib, Subscription Publication, 8.41M) reports ex-Sen. Bob Dole (R-KS) said that when President Biden visited him on Saturday, "It was just Bob and Joe, not Mr. President." Dole and Biden discussed "why the Senate they both love – and really, all of Washington – doesn't work better right now." Dole said, "We did talk about how we were able to work together in the Senate when we both were there, one a Democrat, one a Republican. ... We worked across the aisle and we compromised. We couldn't solve everything, but most everything we could work out."

AP Analysis: Moderate Democrats Creating Headaches For Biden.

The AP (2/22, Jaffe) reports that with the Senate split 50-50, moderates like Sens. Joe Manchin (D-WV), Kyrsten Sinema (D-AZ), and Jon Tester (D-MT) "hold significant political clout in Biden's Washington, making for a muscular counterweight to the progressives who make up the party's base." Biden "spent much of the 2020 Democratic primary and general election campaigns being hounded by progressives for not embracing far-left positions," but now "it's the moderates who are creating headaches for the Democratic president." A "handful of centrist Democrats who have expressed skepticism about Biden's $1.9 trillion COVID-19 bill, threatening to derail the president's top priority if they don't win concessions." The AP adds that moderates "are certain to influence the Biden administration's next big legislative push as well, a major infrastructure and jobs bill that will include climate planks."

Biden Raised $22.1M For Transition.

Bloomberg (2/22, Korte, 3.57M) reports data released Monday by the GSA show that President Biden "raised $22.1 million to pay for the costs of his transition, far exceeding the $6.5 million his predecessor raised four years ago. ... Biden's transition was also costlier. He spent $24.4 million through mid-February, while Trump spent $4.7 million through the same period in 2017." Bloomberg adds that Trump's "refusal to accept the results of the election led to a delay in releasing $6 million in public money designated for presidential transitions. The GSA waited almost three weeks after the Nov. 3 election to ascertain Biden as the apparent winner." Biden's transition team "raised $7.3 million between the election and the GSA releasing funds."

White House Aides Say Ignoring Trump Is Easier Now That Biden Is President.

The Washington Post (2/22, Parker, Viser, 10.52M) reports that while White House Communications Director Kate Bedingfield says the White House's "focus is entirely on President Biden's agenda, and Donald Trump doesn't factor in that for us," the "reality may prove more difficult." During a CNN town hall in Milwaukee, the President "emphasized his eagerness to move past his predecessor," but "kept talking about the very guy he said he wants to ignore." But, "senior Biden officials argue that ignoring Trump is easier now that Biden is president. The major crises facing Biden, including the deadly coronavirus pandemic and the stalled economy, are the top concerns of a majority of Americans, these officials said." Chief of Staff Klain said, "In some ways, it's much easier to ignore Trump now that we're in the White House, because we're not running against him."

NYTimes' Rogers: Washington Weekends Have Returned To Normal Under Biden.

Katie Rogers of the New York Times (2/22, 20.6M) writes, "President Biden did not do anything this weekend. Well, let's rephrase: President Biden did not do anything alarming this weekend." Rogers continues, "There were exactly eight tweets, each one rooted in what can best be described as reality. There was a visit to spend time with an ailing friend, Bob Dole, the former Republican senator. And there was a stop at church with the grandchildren." According to Rogers, "Since Mr. Biden assumed office, the weekends have been portraits of domesticity," and Biden's "demonstrable uninterest in generating audacious headlines only emphasizes how much the Trump-size hole in Washington has created a sense of free time in all realms of the capital."

EPA Reverses Course, Backs Ethanol Industry In Lawsuit Headed To SCOTUS.

The AP (2/22) reports that the EPA announced Monday "that it will support the ethanol industry in a lawsuit over biofuel waivers granted to oil refineries under President Donald Trump's administration." The agency "said it is reversing course and will support a January 2020 decision" by the 10th Circuit Court of Appeals "in a lawsuit filed by the Renewable Fuels Association and farm groups. The lawsuit is headed to arguments before the U.S. Supreme Court this spring."

Texas Winter Storm Sparks Two Federal Inquiries.

NBC Nightly News (2/22, story 4, 2:15, 6.21M) reported federal investigators have announced "two new inquiries triggered by" the "massive winter storm" in Texas. One is "examining the natural gas and power market for potential wrongdoing. The second, an all out examination of the US electric grid, searching for vulnerabilities relating to extreme weather or climate change."

Texas AG Traveled To Utah During Power Outages. The Houston Chronicle (2/22, 982K) reports that as "millions of Texans languished in their homes last week without heat, many of them racking up astronomical electricity bills," Texas Attorney General Ken Paxton (R), who is "in charge of consumer protection left to take an out-of-state trip." According to a campaign spokesman Paxton "left the state during the middle of the power outage crisis to meet with a fellow attorney general in Utah" for a "previously planned meeting." His wife, state

Sen. Angela Paxton (R), joined him on the trip. The Chronicle says this “marks the third instance of a Texas public official leaving the state during the disaster that affected nearly every one of the state’s 254 counties.” The Dallas Morning News (2/22, 772K) provides similar coverage.

Patrick: Energy Officials Said They Were Prepared Ahead Of Winter Storm. The Dallas Morning News (2/22, 772K) reports that Texas Lt. Gov. Dan Patrick (R) “said of the Electric Reliability Council of Texas and other players in Texas’ energy system,” “We were told they were prepared. ... They weren’t prepared as they told us they were. And you were cold at night. And your water went out and some people died in the storm. ... We’re going to get to the bottom of it.” Patrick “said the Legislature would convene hearings this week on the matter, adding that the heads of energy companies and other stakeholders would be issued subpoenas, if necessary, to compel testimony.”

Meanwhile, in what the CBS Evening News (2/22, story 4, 2:00, O’Donnell, 4.6M) described as “a new crisis,” some Texans are “stuck with sky high electric bills” after the storm. Marcus Moore of ABC World News Tonight (2/22, story 4, 1:15, Muir, 8.08M) reported, “Texas allows power companies to charge variable pricing, which keeps the prices low when demand is low. But prices can spike astronomically when demand goes up.” NBC Nightly News (2/22, story 4, 2:15, 6.21M) reported state leaders are promising “solutions for sky high energy bills. The governor restricting companies from cutting power if customers can’t pay.”

The New York Times (2/22, A1, Healy, 20.6M) says while power has been restored across much of Texas and warmer weather is forecast “for much of this week, millions of Texans whose health and finances were already battered by a year of Covid-19 now face a grinding recovery from a storm estimated to cost upward of $20 billion, the costliest in state history, according to the Insurance Council of Texas.” The Times adds, “For many lower-income families whose ceilings collapsed and kitchens flooded after frozen pipes burst, the disaster did not melt with the snow.”

Rampell: Texas’ Deregulation Resulted In “Humanitarian And Economic Disaster.” Catherine Rampell writes in the Washington Post (2/22, 10.52M) that Republicans have long “worshiped at the altar of deregulation. ... In particular, they touted the Texas energy market as a sort of paragon of their deregulatory fantasy, an invisible-hand success story that should be expanded nationwide.” During “the usually balmy Texas winter, this deregulated system has functioned fine. But severe weather can bring it crashing down.” Rampell adds that while “Texas’s widespread power failures will create some new employment opportunities for plumbers and electricians,” for “everyone else, the state’s failure to ensure minimum quality standards has been a humanitarian and economic disaster.”

SCOTUS To Take Up Cases Related To Abortion And Immigration.

The AP (2/22) reports the Supreme Court “will take up challenges to controversial Trump administration policies affecting family-planning clinics and immigrants, even though the Biden administration has announced it is reviewing them.” USA Today (2/22, Fritze, 12.7M) reports the Court will consider “a hotly contested effort to cut funding to medical centers that refer patients for abortions” that has been “described by critics as a ‘gag rule.’” The New York Times (2/22, Liptak, 20.6M) reports the Court will also take up a case involving “the so-called public charge rule, which seeks to discourage some immigrants from using public services.” The Washington Post (2/22, Barnes, 10.52M) also reports.

Supreme Court Denies Trump Effort To Block Release Of Tax Returns To Manhattan DA.

The New York Times (2/22, A1, Liptak, Rashbaum, Proffess, Weiser, 20.6M) reports the Supreme Court on Monday “rejected a last-ditch attempt by former President Donald J. Trump to shield his financial records, issuing a brief, unsigned order that ended Mr. Trump’s bitter 18-month battle to stop prosecutors in Manhattan from poring over his tax returns as they investigate possible financial crimes.” The Times calls it “a decisive defeat for Mr. Trump, who had gone to extraordinary lengths to keep his tax returns and related documents secret, taking his case to the Supreme Court twice. There were no dissents noted.” The CBS Evening News (2/22, story 5, 0:25, O’Donnell, 4.77M) said Trump “suffered a major Supreme Court defeat,” and NBC Nightly News (2/22, story 6, 0:15, Holt, 6.17M) said the Court “gave Donald Trump a big loss.”

Cecilia Vega reported on ABC World News Tonight (2/22, story 5, 0:40, Muir, 8.08M) that Manhattan District Attorney Cyrus Vance Jr. “could see these documents in a matter of days. We’re talking about eight years’ worth of personal and business tax returns – I’m told potentially millions of pages. ... These documents are protected by grand jury secrecy rules, [meaning] the public may never see them.” The AP (2/22, Gresko) reports, “The Supreme Court waited months to act in the case” and “offered no explanation for the delay, and the legal issue before the justices did not involve whether Trump was due any special deference because he was president.”

The Los Angeles Times (2/22, 3.37M) reports Trump “faces possible criminal and civil charges on several fronts, but the New York investigation of his business dealings has moved further than any of the other probes.” Vance “has not revealed what the grand jury is investigating, but in court filings his office said it was looking into potential ‘protracted criminal conduct at the Trump Organization.’ Shortly after the court issued its order, Vance tweeted: ‘The work continues.’”

USA Today (2/22, Phillips, Fritze, 12.7M) reports, “In a lengthy statement after the Supreme Court’s decision Monday, Trump described the investigation as a ‘witch hunt’ and ‘fascism.’ He reiterated the false claim that he won the election, not President Joe Biden, and criticized the Supreme Court, to which he appointed three justices during his four years in office.”

The New York Times (2/22, A1, McIntire, 20.6M) writes that “when New York prosecutors finally get to examine” Trump’s federal tax returns, “they will discover a veritable how-to guide for getting rich while losing millions of dollars and paying little to no income taxes. Whether they find evidence of crimes, however, will also depend on other information not found in the actual returns.”

Among the many other outlets covering the story are Reuters (2/22, Hurley), Bloomberg (2/22, 3.57M), the Wall Street Journal (2/22, Bravin, Paul, Subscription Publication, 8.41M), Axios (2/22, Basu, 1.26M), Politico (2/22, Gerstein, Cheney, 6.73M), The Hill (2/22, Samuels, 5.69M), and the CNN (2/22, 89.21M), Fox News (2/22, Singman, 23.99M), and CNBC (2/22, Higgins, 7.34M) websites. In related news, USA Today (2/22, Fritze, 12.7M) reports the Supreme Court “declined Monday to hear an appeal from the adult movie [performer] Stormy Daniels who sued [Trump] for defamation.”

Supreme Court Rejects Election Challenges.

The AP (2/22, Gresko) reports, “The Supreme Court on Monday rejected a handful of cases related to the 2020 election, including disputes from Pennsylvania that had deeply divided the justices just before the election.” The Washington Post (2/22, Barnes, 10.52M) reports the Court “turned away Republican challenges to the presidential election results in Pennsylvania, refusing to take up a months-long dispute over extending the deadline in that state for receiving mail-in ballots.” Justices Samuel Alito, Neil Gorsuch, and Clarence Thomas “said it deserved the court’s attention, even though the number of votes at issue would not call into question Biden’s victory.” The Philadelphia Inquirer (2/22, Lai) reports, “The decision not to hear the legal challenges brought by top Republican state lawmakers and the state GOP ends litigation that prevented Pennsylvania from counting 10,000 mail ballots that arrived in the three days after Election Day and had remained in legal limbo.”

USA Today (2/22, Fritze, 12.7M) reports that “a blistering dissent” by Thomas “prompted blowback Monday from Democrats. ... In an 11-page dissent from the court’s decision not to take up a challenge to the expanded use of mail ballots in Pennsylvania, Thomas acknowledged that the outcome of the election was not changed by the way votes were cast in the battleground state. But he raised questions about the reliability of mail-in voting that echoed many of the same arguments Trump raised in the weeks before and after the election.” CNN (2/22, 89.21M) headlines an online analysis “Justice Clarence Thomas Reveals Some Sympathy For Trump’s Baseless Fraud Claims.” The Wall Street Journal (2/22, Subscription Publication, 8.41M) says in an editorial that the Supreme Court was wrong not to seize the opportunity to examine “last year’s judicial rewrite of Pennsylvania election law...to prevent future mischief.”

Dominion Voting Systems Sues Lindell For $1.3B.

The AP (2/22, Karnowski, Bauder) reports Dominion Voting Systems has “filed a $1.3 billion defamation lawsuit Monday against the founder and CEO of Minnesota-based MyPillow, saying that Mike Lindell falsely accused the company of rigging the 2020 presidential election.” The New York Times (2/22, Maheshwari, Hirsch, 20.6M) reports that the complaint “filed in the United States District Court for the District of Columbia alleged that Mr. Lindell ‘exploited’ false claims about election fraud to support his company’s sales.”

The Minneapolis Star Tribune (2/22, 855K) says Lindell “has openly invited a lawsuit from Dominion for more than a month, insisting that proof of election fraud would come out in the legal discovery process.” USA Today (2/22, Brown, 12.7M), the Washington Post (2/22, Brown, 10.52M), and the Wall Street Journal (2/22, Corse, Subscription Publication, 8.41M) also report on the lawsuit.

Under the headline “Anti-Trumpers Are Done With The GOP. Where Do They Go Now?” Politico (2/22, Siders, 6.73M) looks at the difficulties confronting traditional conservatives who oppose the movement behind former President Donald Trump but who would not be comfortable joining an increasingly liberal Democratic Party. Politico says some have become independents and “other former party officials are discussing forming a third party,” but “the sobering reality confronting them...is that there’s really no place to go.” Michael Gerson writes in the Washington Post (2/22, 10.52M), “Given the entrenchment of the two-party system, the best option seems to be remaining in the GOP as long as conscience allows.”

WPost Analysis: North Carolina Senate Race Will Be Test Of Post-Trump GOP.

In a feature headlined “North Carolina Tests How Republicans See Themselves After Trump,” the Washington Post (2/22, Scherer, Gardner, Dawsey, 10.52M) says the looming GOP primary race for the state’s open Senate seat – held by retiring Sen. Richard Burr (R-NC), who voted to convict former President Donald Trump in his second impeachment trial – will give a sense of the state of the party. Many pro-Trump state Republicans have already endorsed ex-Rep. Mark Walker (R-NC), but the former president's daughter-in-law Lara Trump is considering a run, as are more establishment figures like ex-Gov. Pat McCrory (R).

The Washington Post (2/22, Schneider, Vozzella, 10.52M) has a 2,700-word front-page feature on this year's Virginia gubernatorial race, writing that the election will help show how solid the state's shift toward the Democrats really is, and what the impact of former President Donald Trump will be on the GOP now that he is out of office. Both parties have wide-open races featuring "a spectrum of potential nominees that's bigger and more diverse than any slate of major-party candidates for governor Virginia has ever seen. So far, six Republicans and five Democrats have filed papers to run." There are also "X-factors this year, such as whether the absence of Trump in the White House will dampen voter turnout, which hit historic highs in Virginia in 2020."

IMF Head Says Policymakers Must Blunt Pandemic's Impact Worldwide.

Reuters (2/22, Strupczewski) reports IMF Managing Director Kristalina Georgieva said in a speech to the European Parliament on Monday that wealth gaps are likely widening under the pandemic in Europe unless policymakers work to end the global health crisis and support economies struggling to bear the impact of the virus. Georgieva, in her speech, "praised EU governments for putting more than 3 trillion euros in fiscal support for firms and households, including job-retention schemes that helped more than 54 million workers." However, Georgieva said, "the path to recovery is...uneven...because of the difference in starting positions, economic structure and capacity to respond, causing inequalities to grow both across and within countries." Georgieva added, "Gradual withdrawal has to follow, not precede, a durable exit from the health crisis. It matters internally, and also in terms of spillovers – a premature tightening of policy when worse-hit economies are still deeply fragile could exacerbate divergence between countries."

World Bank Head Flags Vaccine Capacity Problems, Says All Countries Must Be Immunized To Beat Pandemic.

The Guardian (UK) (2/22, Elliott, 5.53M) reports World Bank President David Malpass sees serious constraints on vaccination program capacity as the biggest obstacle to making the Covid-19 vaccine available to all 7 billion-plus people on Earth. In an interview with The Guardian, Malpass "said delivery systems in poor countries and the fact that so many vaccines were going to rich countries were more important factors than money in ensuring success." Malpass also "said beating the pandemic required all countries to be immunized and that the global community should already be preparing for the next crisis," adding, "One goal the world should have is to prepare for future disasters, other pandemics that will require vaccine systems, and both manufacturing and delivery capacity. I do not expect this to be the only crisis of global proportions."

Lagarde Says ECB "Closely Monitoring" Government Bond Yields.

Reuters (2/22, Koranyi) reports ECB President Christine Lagarde said Monday the ECB is "closely monitoring" nominal yields on government bonds. Lagarde said in a speech, "Within the broad-based set of indicators that we monitor to assess whether financing conditions are still favourable, risk-free overnight indexed swap rates and sovereign yields are particularly important. Accordingly, the ECB is closely monitoring the evolution of longer-term nominal bond yields."

Bloomberg (2/22, Weber, 3.57M) also reports.

Bloomberg (2/22, Mutua, 3.57M) reports the World Bank's International Finance Corporation "is on track to sell a record amount of environmental and social bonds as part of its global response to the pandemic." The Bank's private-sector arm "expects its sustainable bond sales this year will likely surpass the previous high of $2.3 billion it set in 2017, according to John Gandolfo, vice president and treasurer at IFC. Issuance will come in different currencies, and proceeds will go to clients globally, including small businesses, low-income households and poor and fragile nations, he said." Gandolfo said in an interview, "IFC is certainly focused on, first and foremost, its response to the pandemic and saving jobs, lives, livelihoods and also building a path to a resilient recovery."

Boot: Trump Officials Trying To Undermine Biden's Foreign Policy.

Max Boot writes in the Washington Post (2/22, 10.52M) that former President Donald Trump's appointees "served in the worst administration in history" and "now would be a good opportunity for Trump's aides and enablers to favor us with their silence as President Biden tries to clean up the messes he inherited. Instead, many of Trump's supporters are trying to undermine the new president from the start." Boot adds, "Last week, the right-wing attack machine accused Biden of being an apologist for China's horrific abuse of the Uighurs," which is "a gross distortion of Biden's remarks during a CNN town hall." Their criticism "is just as egregious when it comes to Biden's approach to Iran." Boot argues that while there is "no guarantee that the Biden approach will work," we "know the Trump policies failed. Biden deserves a chance to chart a different course without being sniped at by Trump's followers."

Foreign Minister Wang Yi "told the U.N. Human Rights Council that it was taking counter-terrorism measures in accordance with the law and that Xinjiang enjoyed 'social stability and sound development' after four years without any 'terrorist case.'" According to Reuters, Wang "invited U.N. scrutiny but gave no timetable." Reuters says the Biden Administration has "endorsed a last-minute determination by the Trump administration that China has committed genocide in Xinjiang and has said the United States must be prepared to impose costs on China."

Canada's House Of Commons Approves Motion Calling China's Treatment Of Uighurs Genocide. The AP (2/22, Gillies) reports Canada's House of Commons passed a non-binding motion Monday "to declare that China is committing genocide against more than 1 million Uighurs in the western Xinjiang region but Prime Minister Justin Trudeau and his Cabinet abstained from the vote." The motion "passed 266-0 as virtually all but Trudeau and his Cabinet voted for the measure that also called on the International Olympic Committee to move the 2022 Winter Olympics from Beijing." The AP cites "a senior government official" who "said declaring something in Parliament is not going to adequately get results in China and that work with international allies and partners is needed." Reuters (2/22, Scherer) says Trudeau "has been reluctant to use the word genocide, suggesting that seeking broad consensus among Western allies on Chinese human rights issues would be the best approach."

The seats "would be given to some of the more than 200 Hong Kong-resident members of China's top political advisory body, the Chinese People's Political Consultative Conference, the people said."

The agreement, which "came after France, Germany, Poland and the Baltic states urged the 27-member bloc to send a message to Putin that debate and protest must be allowed in Russia." Reuters reports that an unnamed EU diplomat "said the proposed new travel bans and asset freezes would target, among others, Alexander Bastrykin, whose Investigative Committee handles investigations into major crimes and reports directly to Putin." The Washington Post (2/22, Birnbaum, 10.52M) says the sanctions "will go into effect in about a week."

Politico Europe (2/22, 15K) reports Navalny and some of his "top aides" have "called loudly and publicly for the EU to sanction oligarchs close to Putin, especially those who maintain a large portion of their wealth in Europe – a demand that poses a thicket of legal obstacles."

Politico Analysis: Middle East Is Not A Top Priority For Biden.

According to Politico (2/22, Bertrand, Seligman, 6.73M), President Biden is "tired of dealing with the Middle East," and his "signals" to that effect are "not meant to be subtle, his advisers say." Biden "has made only one call to a head of state in the Middle East – Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu on Wednesday – which itself was delayed by more than three weeks." A "former senior national security official and close Biden adviser" tells Politico, "If you are going to list the regions Biden sees as a priority, the Middle East is not in the top three. It's Asia-Pacific, then Europe, and then the Western Hemisphere. And that reflects a bipartisan consensus. ... They are just being extremely purposeful to not get dragged into the Middle East."

In Third Attack In A Week, Three Rockets Land Near US Embassy In Baghdad.

Politico (2/22, Seligman, 6.73M) reports three Katyusha rockets landed near the US Embassy in Baghdad Monday, "the third such attack in Iraq in the span of one week." Politico adds, "The attack comes after at least four rockets struck Balad Air Base on Saturday night, wounding one person," and "a dozen rockets targeted coalition forces outside Erbil International Airport, killing one non-U.S. contractor and wounding nine more people, including five Americans" last week.

The Hill (2/22, Kheel, 5.69M) reports State Department spokesman Ned Price said Monday, "We are outraged by the recent attacks. ... When it comes to our response, we will respond in a way that is calculated, within our own timetable, and using a mix of tools at a time and place of our choosing, as you've heard me say before. ... What will not do is lash out and risk an escalation that plays into the hands of Iran and contributes to their attempts to further destabilize Iraq."

WPost Analysis: IAEA Deal "Momentarily" Eases US-Iran Tension.

The Washington Post (2/22, Fahim, 10.52M) says an agreement announced Sunday that would allow the IAEA "to continue some monitoring of Iran's atomic program momentarily eased a standoff between Tehran and Western nations and may provide a narrow opening for diplomacy as the Biden administration attempts to restart negotiations with Iran." However, "a vote by Iran's parliament Monday condemning the agreement served as a reminder of domestic head winds, in Tehran and Washington, that could hinder a speedy return to the nuclear deal between Iran and global powers." The Post adds, "Under vague terms of the deal announced Sunday, Iran would still end implementation of what is known as the Additional Protocol, which enforces monitoring by the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA), but would continue to allow what Rafael Grossi, the agency's head, called 'necessary monitoring and verification' of Iran's nuclear program."

CNBC (2/22, Turak, 7.34M) reports on its website that Iran's Parliament "previously voted to suspend its so-called Additional Protocol with the IAEA if U.S. oil and banking sanctions were not lifted by this week, meaning much of the rigorous inspection carried out by the U.N. agency as part of the 2015 Iranian nuclear deal will end." But CNBC says "the fact that some access will still be allowed for inspectors prevents a much worse escalation that would've left the international community entirely in the dark on Iran's nuclear activities."

Emirati And Qatari Delegations Meet For The First Time In Years.

Reuters adds that "since the agreement, air and travel links have resumed between Qatar and the four states."

Attanasio "was hit in the abdomen and died several hours later at the U.N. hospital in the regional capital Goma, Congo's interior ministry said." Bamporiki "was shot in Cape Town sometime after 4 p.m. while making a delivery, his political party, the Rwanda National Congress, said in a statement." Bamporiki, a Rwandan exile, "arrived in Nyanga township to hand over a bed from his store to a client when two men approached his truck and one of them shot him, the party said." The Rwanda National Congress "said the killing was reminiscent of past cases" in which critics of Rwandan President Paul Kagame were "lured [to] a compromising and insecure environment" and murdered.

GSE Cash-Window Cap Expected To Be A Thorny Issue For Some Time.

Behind a paywall, Inside Mortgage Finance (2/22, Hollier, Subscription Publication) reports, "Last month, when the Treasury Department and the Federal Housing Finance Agency amended the preferred stock purchase agreement, they included an obscure provision that could reduce the ability of many lenders to sell loans to Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac. The new PSPA caps the amount of loans the GSEs can purchase for cash at $1.5 billion per seller over any period of four consecutive quarters." An IMF analysis of UMBS issued by the GSEs over the past couple of years "suggests the new limits will undercut loan sales at scores of lenders." IMF adds, "Of course, it will also impact the GSEs. Fannie said it's still assessing the potential damage. However, Freddie in its recently released annual report hinted at the possible deleterious prospects."

In December, the bureau "issued two final rules for QMs: one replacing the 43% debt-to-income ratio with a pricing threshold and the other creating a seasoned QM category." Alston & Bird partner and former CFPB deputy director Brian Johnson, in an interview, "said nothing stops a Senate-confirmed director from addressing the QM rule under the Administrative Procedure Act."

Ginnie Mae's share, which include loans backed by the Federal Housing Administration, fell 2 basis points to 7.32%, while the share for portfolio loans and private-label securities (PLS) dropped a full 20 basis points from the prior week, at 8.94%." MBA Chief Economist Mike

Fratantoni commented, "The share of loans in forbearance has declined for three weeks in a row, with portfolio and PLS loans decreasing the most this week. This decline was due to a sharp increase in borrower exits, particularly for IMB servicers."

National Mortgage News (2/22) reports Fratantoni said, "Policymakers and the mortgage industry have helped enable this [strong housing market] during the pandemic by providing millions of homeowners support in the form of forbearance. The decision to extend the allowable duration of forbearance plans should provide for a smoother transition this year as the job market continues to recover." Mortgage Orb (2/22, Bates) provides additional coverage.

Carbon Reduction Techniques Serve As Useful Shortcut For Investors.

The Wall Street Journal (2/22, Toplensky, Subscription Publication, 8.41M) reports that investors seek to distinguish the leaders from those lagging behind when it comes to pollution and financial risk. However, the lack of standards for disclosing carbon usage and uncertainty over how markets will evolve in the coming years have investors struggling to understand companies' plans and risks. Ideal reporting would see detailed, comparable carbon exposure data published alongside financial information. Until that happens, the article notes that a useful indicator for investors is how much a company's plan focuses on carbon reduction techniques or offsets.

Behind a paywall, Inside Mortgage Finance (2/22, Bancroft, Subscription Publication) reports, "Banks reported another hefty round of income from mortgage banking operations during the fourth quarter of 2020, capping the industry's most profitable year since 2013." According to IMF, "Commercial banks and savings institutions reported $6.39 billion in income from mortgage banking during the final three months of 2020, a 19.2% drop from the blockbuster third quarter. The final lap brought year-to-date earnings to $22.52 billion, a 66.3% gain from 2019. Last year was the industry's most profitable since mortgage banking churned out $25.75 billion back in 2013." IMF says, "Most of the largest banks reported fourth-quarter declines along with increases on a year-to-date basis."

Rocket Mortgage May Be Real Estate's "Sleeping Giant."

In a mostly paywalled HW+ analysis for HousingWire (2/22, 7K), reporter Matthew Blake says Rocket Homes could be real estate's "sleeping giant," as Rocket Mortgage is seeking to "steer customers to Rocket-approved agents." According to HousingWire, Rocket "rocketed to being the highest volume mortgage lender in the country by late 2017. They surpassed Wells Fargo through persistent marketing (ginning up interest in the Rocket app), robust customer service and benefited from industry-wide retreat from the depository banks. Rocket has since ridden the wave of famously low interest-rates, which juiced the mortgage refinancing market. The company created by Dan Gilbert went public last year, and it reported a cushy $6.6 billion in profits through the first nine months of 2020." Even on the heels of this success, the company – both "ambitious and these days heavily reliant on the refi revenue stream" – is still "looking for ways to get more purchase business, and one of them is real estate."

Reuters (2/23, Westbrook) reports that the dollar "nursed losses near a six-week low on Tuesday...as investors' focus shifted to how U.S. Federal Reserve chief Jerome Powell might respond to resurgent inflation expectations." The dollar index dropped to 89.941. The euro "made a small gain to $1.2167." The yen held steady at 105.02 per dollar.

yields, while concerns over rising inflation further boosted bullion's appeal." US gold futures were up 0.1% to $1,810.20.

Oil Jumps.

Reuters (2/23, Jaganathan) reports that oil prices "jumped by more than $1 on Tuesday, underpinning optimism over COVID-19 vaccine rollouts and lower output as U.S. supplies were slow to return after a deep freeze in Texas shut in crude production last week." Brent crude increased by $1.08, or 1.7%, to reach $66.32 per barrel. West Texas Intermediate was up 92 cents, or 1.5%, to reach $62.62 per barrel.

Congress To Hold Hearings On SolarWinds Hack.

Politico (2/22, Matishak, 6.73M) reports in its weekly cybersecurity newsletter that the Senate Intelligence Committee on Tuesday "will hold the first public congressional hearing on the SolarWinds hack." The panel previously received "a closed-door briefing about the incident from the NSA, the FBI, CISA and ODNI, and held an informal session with FireEye CEO Kevin Mandia, whose company discovered the compromise." Mandia will appear "before the committee again tomorrow, along with Sudhakar Ramakrishna, the president and CEO of SolarWinds; Brad Smith, the president of Microsoft; and George Kurtz, the president and CEO of CrowdStrike, which the U.S. Treasury Department reportedly hired to investigate the breach of dozens of email accounts of top agency officials."

Business Insider (2/22, Elder, Holmes, 2.74M) reports tech CEOs on Tuesday "will sit opposite senators in hearings on the sprawling SolarWinds cyberattacks, in the type of proceedings that have become familiar in recent years." Experts "say these will be dramatically different because the government badly needs the cybersecurity industry's help." In the past, senators "lambasted tech CEOs, demanding answers about social media and aggressive business tactics." But the Senate Intelligence Committee hearings with Microsoft, FireEye, CrowdStrike, and SolarWinds "will provide a glimpse into how a powerful cybersecurity industry and the federal government will work together to fight off nation-state attacks."

CNET News (2/22, Reichert, 3.77M) reports two House committees are holding "a hearing on the SolarWinds attack." The US House committees on homeland security and on oversight and reform "will host a hearing on the SolarWinds hack this week." The hearing on February 26 "will see SolarWinds CEO Sudhakar Ramakrishna, former SolarWinds CEO Kevin Thompson, Microsoft president Brad Smith and FireEye CEO Kevin Mandia testify." The hearing will "look into the role of private companies in preventing, investigating and remediating cyberattacks that affect the government and cause damage to our national security."

Legislators To Review Proposed Cyber Diplomacy Act.

Politico (2/22, Matishak, 6.73M) reports in its weekly cybersecurity newsletter that on Thursday the House Foreign Affairs Committee "will mark up the revived Cyber Diplomacy Act." The legislation would create "a high-level Office of Cyber Issues at the State Department, headed by an official with the rank of ambassador." The House "approved the measure by voice vote in the last Congress, but the Senate never took it up, so it expired." Democratic lawmakers were "wary of the State Department creating a new cyber diplomacy bureau in the final days of the Trump Administration." The Government Accountability Office and some former officials "have raised concerns about the plan, arguing it fails to coordinate the full spectrum of digital issues."

Georgia Launches Cyber Fraud Task Force.

Yahoo! News (2/22, 10.87M) reports the US Attorney's Office for the Northern District of Georgia has "joined forces with Metro-Atlanta District Attorneys, the Office of the Attorney General, the FBI Atlanta Field Office, US Secret Service, state, and local law enforcement to combat the criminal movement of cyber fraud proceeds through banks in the Atlanta area by employing Business Email Compromise (BEC) fraud schemes."

New Study Says Most Cyberattacks In 2020 Originated From Criminal Groups.

Politico (2/22, Matishak, 6.73M) reports in its weekly cybersecurity newsletter that CrowdStrike said in a report that about "80 percent of cyberattacks in 2020 came from criminal groups, compared to roughly 20 percent that came from more sophisticated state-sponsored actors." That compares to a "slightly less lopsided split in 2019, when 69 percent of attacks came from criminals and 31 percent came from nation-states." At the same time, CrowdStrike said, "the overall numbers of both targeted and [criminal] intrusions are significantly larger [in 2020] than in 2019."

DOD's New Cybersecurity Regulations May Fuel Contract Disputes.

Law360 (2/22, Subscription Publication, 9K) reports DOD published an interim rule last year "to establish new methods for assessing contractor implementation of cybersecurity requirements." The interim rule will require "thousands of defense contractors to conduct at least a basic assessment of their compliance with the 110 security requirements specified by the National Institute of Standards and Technology Special Publication 800-171." The interim rule "will prompt potential contract disputes, as could involve terminations for default, payment reductions for noncompliance, challenges to DOD cybersecurity assessments and monetary claims."

Ukraine Blames Russia For New Cyber Attacks.

Reuters (2/22) reports Ukraine on Monday "accused unnamed Russian internet networks of massive attacks on Ukrainian security and defense websites, but gave no details of any damage done or say who it believed was behind the assault." Kyiv has previously "accused Moscow of orchestrating large cyber attacks as part of a 'hybrid war' against Ukraine, which Russia denies." A statement from Ukraine's National Security and Defence Council "did not disclose who it believed organized the attacks or give any details about the effect the intrusions may have had on Ukrainian cyber security." The council said the attacks "attempted to infect vulnerable government web servers with a virus that covertly made them part of a botnet used for so-called distributed-denial-of-service (DDoS) attacks on other resources."

DHS Approves Viasat To Receive Cyber Threat Intelligence.

ExecutiveGov (2/22) reports Viasat has been approved to "receive cyber threat intelligence through the DHS Enhanced Cybersecurity Services (ECS) program." Ken Peterman, president, Government Systems, Viasat, said, "The added DHS ECS intelligence coupled with the advanced capabilities inherent in the Viasat cyber offering, enables us to better fortify our customers' cyber posture and maintain a vigilant and watchful defense against the world's most advanced adversaries." As an accredited ECS provider, Viasat "will receive DHS-provided sensitive and classified cybersecurity threat indicators and information to defend US-based public and private computer networks."

Study Finds Cybercrime Rose As More Workers Went Virtual In 2020.

The Washington Post (2/22, Riley, 10.52M) reports in its Cybersecurity 202 column that a new study from CrowdStrike found that "intrusions threatening organizations' cybersecurity across the globe grew 400 percent in 2019 and 2020 combined." Nearly four out of five of those compromises in 2020 "stemmed from cybercriminals." Overall, hacking efforts by both cybercriminals and state-sponsored groups "grew in 2020 and are unlikely to let up in 2021." Adam Meyers, senior vice president of intelligence at CrowdStrike, "said that a sudden shift to remote work was a major factor in the increase." He said, "The rapid impact that covid had back in March on the threat and attack surface of enterprise was pretty profound." The report comes as "hackers are already evolving their techniques for 2021." Meyers said, "Threat actors are not going to rest on their laurels. They're going to continue to kind of adapt their operations to this new normal. It's getting to be a crowded space."

Legislators Press DOD To Prioritize Navy, Air Force And Cyber In Budget.

Defense News (2/22, Gould, Larer, 73K) reports legislators say the US Navy, US Air Force and cyberwarfare "must start taking a larger share of the defense budget if the US is going to compete with China." Speaking at a recent Hudson Institute virtual event, House Seapower and Projection Forces Subcommittee Chairman Joe Courtney (D-CT) "said the Pentagon is at an 'inflection point' over whether the Navy, Air Force and cyber 'are going to take a larger portion of the pie chart' when the fiscal 2022 budget is released this spring." The comments "align with a growing consensus inside the Pentagon that to meet the challenge from China's rapidly expanding blue water fleet, paired with investments in long-range anti-ship missiles and bombers, the Navy must grow substantially."

DOD Focuses On 5G Applications For Space.

NextGov (2/22) reports the US military "moved to explore next-generation networking capabilities and tools that could advance how it moves vast volumes of data on and beyond planet Earth." According to a request for information published by the latter Thursday, Space Force officials and others in the Air Force office responsible for enterprise data transport "intend to tap 'rapidly emerging 5G technologies to support space data transport terrestrially, in space, and in the space-ground links.'" The document noted, "Any aspect of 5G applied to any aspect of space systems is of potential interest." The Pentagon players "involved in this RFI confirmed that they're concentrating on adapting 5G radio access networks to space-ground communications in contested environments – and on applying 5G network slicing and orchestration 'to realize a federation of existing and emerging space data transport networks that include the legacy space control networks, ground data transport infrastructure, commercial augmentation services networks, partner networks, and potentially commercial 5G networks.'"

TFI/Sanctions

US Sanctions Two More Of Burma's Military Leaders.

The Wall Street Journal (2/22, Mandhana, Subscription Publication, 8.41M) reports the Treasury Department on Monday added two more of Burma's "top military officers to its blacklist of leaders sanctioned earlier in February after the coup toppled the democratically elected government. The two sanctioned men, Lt. Gen. Moe Myint Tun and Gen. Maung Maung Kyaw, are members of the ruling State Administration Council." The move comes in the wake of warnings from Biden Administration officials "that more sanctions would be forthcoming if the coup leaders didn't hand power back to the legitimate government and stop violence against political opponents."

Federal Reserve

Bowman Says US Economy Has "Recovered Substantially" But Progress Is Highly Uneven.

Reuters (2/22, Saphir) reports Fed Governor Michelle Bowman said Monday the US economy has "recovered substantially" from the pandemic's effects, though she said low-income families and communities of color, along with working women, continue to be hit hard.

Bowman said, during a Dallas Fed event, "It is concerning to see signs that the improvements have been uneven, with some households continuing to struggle with unemployment and facing financial difficulty."

Kaplan Projects US Economy To Grow At Least 5% This Year.

Reuters (2/22, Saphir) reports Dallas Federal Reserve President Robert Kaplan on Monday "said his forecast for 5% U.S. GDP growth this year could be an underestimate, given the likelihood of further fiscal support and the rollout of vaccines." Kaplan said Americans will "gradually" become more engaged in the economy between now and June as COVID-19 vaccines are distributed and predicted "substantial improvements in mobility and engagement in the third quarter and fourth quarter."

WSJournal: Lawmakers Should Ask Powell About Bond Yields, Asset Prices, Inflation.

A Wall Street Journal (2/22, Subscription Publication, 8.41M) editorial says when Federal Reserve Chairman Powell appears before Congress this week, lawmakers should ask him about rising bond yields and asset prices. In addition, Powell should be asked what "makes him so sure inflation isn't a danger? Is he recalibrating his inflation expectations in light of the unprecedented runup in household savings over the past year, a fiscal blowout of world-historical proportions, and much faster growth in monetary aggregates than occurred after 2009? If not, why not?" The Journal adds that Powell "promises to 'look through' periods of higher consumer-price inflation to compensate for previous periods of below-target inflation. How much looking-through does Mr. Powell plan to do if inflation does re-emerge?"

Financial Regulatory Agencies

CFPB Joins Attorneys General In Lawsuit Against Libre.

American Banker (2/22, Subscription Publication, 27K) reports that the CFPB joined attorneys general in Massachusetts, New York, and Virginia in a lawsuit that alleges Libre by Nexus "deceived immigrants detained by U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement." CFPB acting Director Dave Ueijo said that Libre by Nexis would claim to be a middleman to help detainees post bonds. However, "after detainees were released, according to the lawsuit, the company tricked them into paying a fee of $420 a month." While Libre said the fee was required until the resolution of an immigrant's ICE proceeding, the authorities said the fee was just a scam. The CFPB alleges that the immigrants did not understand the terms of the financial contracts and what they were paying for. According to American Banker, "The Dodd-Frank Wall Street Reform and Consumer Protection Act prohibits deceptive and abusive acts and practices."

Reuters (2/22) reports that in a statement, Ueijo "described Libre as a 'wolf in sheep's clothing,' saying the Bureau is prioritizing the case to send a signal that financial scams targeting communities of color will not be tolerated." He added, "This case is a prime example of how people of color are targeted in financial scams and the latent inequity that is too often found in the market for financial products and services," adding, "The Bureau won't stand for it." The firm has engaged in controversial practices in the past and reached settlements with other regulators before. The lawsuit "seeks to halt the practices and obtain relief for victims."

MarketWatch (2/22, Matthews, 2.64M) reports that in a Monday announcement, the Senate Committee on Banking, Housing and Urban Affairs said it will be holding nomination hearings for President Biden's selections to run the SEC and CFPB on March 2. Biden has "nominated former Commodity Futures Trading Commission Chairman Gary Gensler to lead the SEC and current Federal Trade Commissioner Rohit Chopra to lead the CFPB." If he were to be confirmed, Chopra would depart from the FTC.

Office of the Comptroller of the Currency

OCC, Federal Reserve, FDIC, Others Issue Joint Statement Recognizing Impact Of Winter Storms In Texas.

CU Today (2/22) reports that in a joint statement, the OCC, NCUA, Federal Reserve System, FDIC, and state regulators said they are cognizant of the impact the winter storms have had on Texas and will "provide appropriate regulatory assistance to affected institutions subject to their supervision." The regulators also "said they are encouraging institutions operating in the affected areas to meet the financial services needs of their communities." The statement covered a number of operational areas, including lending, temporary facilities, publishing requirements, and regulatory reporting requirements. The agencies "said they do not expect to assess penalties or take other supervisory action against the institutions that take reasonable and prudent steps to comply with the agencies' regulatory reporting requirements."

BancFirst To Acquire First Nation Bank And Trust.

American Banker (2/22, Subscription Publication, 27K) reports, "BancFirst in Oklahoma City has agreed to buy First National Bank and Trust in Vinita, Okla." In a press release, BancFirst "said...it will gain two branches, $209 million of loans and $235 million in deposits as part of its purchase-and-assumption agreement with the Ratcliff family," which has been First National's owner since the 1980s. The deal is expected to be completed in the second quarter. Since January 15, First National has been "operating under a prompt corrective action directive" from the OCC that "required the bank to hire a forensic auditor and provide the OCC with 'prompt and unrestricted access' to documents and records, among other things."

CBS Consumer Investigation Looks At How Bank Of America Investigates California Fraud Claims.

In a consumer investigation, WCBS-TV (2/22, 2.57M) reported that some Californians are questioning whether Bank of America has been investigating claims of alleged unemployment fraud that is leaving people without money "when they need it most." In some cases, the bank said it would investigate alleged fraud claims, but would close the investigation and reject any claims the same day, or only a few days after, the investigation was first opened. After looking into the matter, CBS found a "pattern" that the bank was "clearly" not investigating fraud victim claims. In a hearing last month in front of California legislators, Bank of America claims said it reviews all claims and does issue refunds. However, according to Salisbury University Professor and former special counsel for enforcement for the OCC David Webber said that the bank is not acting in good faith and is breaking the rules. According to CBS, the CFPB and OCC have not commented on the matter.

Editorial Wrap-Up

Washington Post.

"Now Republicans Are Offended By Mean Tweets?" The Washington Post (2/22, 10.52M) says that while OMB Director-designate Tanden "has been undiplomatic" because of her past habit of attacking Republicans on Twitter, the case "against her confirmation is weak – especially when you compare her with many of the people Republican senators have endorsed in the past." The Post adds, "It is not fair to hold [President] Biden's nominees to a far higher standard because the president has called for unity while his predecessor denigrated it." The Post concludes, "For the most part, Republican senators thus far have been supporting Mr. Biden's nominations with admirable bipartisanship. They will only look silly if they allow some hurt feelings to get in the way now."

"Biden Asked What Could Be Cut From His Covid Relief Package. Here Are Some Ideas." The Washington Post (2/22, 10.52M) says that amid growing concerns about the COVID relief bill's cost, President Biden "has challenged his critics," asking, "What would they have me cut?" The Post says, "The first trim should be to Mr. Biden's proposed $1,400 direct payments, the current House version of which would cost $422 billion. ... That's a lot of money to shower on the non-poor." The Post adds that it is "increasingly clear that the pandemic reduced states and local governments' revenue far less than initially feared, especially considering federal aid they have already received. ... Yet the House bill contemplates $510 billion in new aid." The Post argues that given the "investments he hopes to begin making later this year in infrastructure, climate research and other high-priority needs," when Biden asks, "What would they have me cut?" he "should listen with an open mind to good-faith answers to that question."

"The U.S. Should Reveal Its Intelligence About The Wuhan Laboratory." The Washington Post (2/22, 10.52M) writes that the US "possesses classified intelligence information about illnesses in the autumn of 2019, before the global pandemic, at the Wuhan Institute of Virology...which was carrying out research on bat coronaviruses very similar in genetic makeup to the pandemic virus." The Post says, "The intelligence should be declassified, and soon." The Post concludes, "Full transparency is needed from China, but also from the United States. ... The truth matters, and the United States should not hide any relevant evidence."

"Questions For Chairman Powell." The Wall Street Journal (2/22, Subscription Publication, 8.41M) editorial says when Federal Reserve Chairman Powell appears before Congress this week, lawmakers should ask him about rising bond yields and asset prices. How much looking-through does Mr. Powell plan to do if inflation does re-emerge?"

"Tech Censorship Is Accelerating." The Wall Street Journal (2/22, Subscription Publication, 8.41M) editorial decries what it sees as growing "ideological censorship" by tech firms. As an example, the Journal cites Amazon's removal of a book by conservative scholar Ryan Anderson. The Journal adds that Reps. Anna Eshoo (D-CA) and Jerry McNerney (D-CA) wrote to the CEOs of Amazon, Apple, Google and cable television companies to "demand...more ideological censorship." To the Journal, "Corporate media censorship...is accelerating. And government is right alongside, pushing for censorship with increasing force."

"The Court Won't End Election Anarchy." The Wall Street Journal (2/22, Subscription Publication, 8.41M) says that the Supreme Court was wrong not to seize the opportunity to examine "last year's judicial rewrite of Pennsylvania election law...to prevent future mischief."

Last Laughs

Late Night Political Humor.

Trevor Noah: "Five hundred thousand COVID deaths. A number that nobody wanted to see. And as painful as that is, you have to admit it is nice to see America's President actually take a moment, just a moment to recognize the toll that coronavirus has taken. I mean, the only time the previous President showed any sadness was when he accidentally deleted Fox News off his DVR."

Trevor Noah: "After getting blasted for flying to Cancun when his own heat went off, Ted Cruz, Texas senator and Disney prince before true love's kiss, is now back in his home state doing the literal bare minimum for the sake of the cameras. ... Sorry, Cruz, this is not going to cut it, my man. See this right here? This is a politician version of coming home with flowers the day after Valentine's Day. It's not nothing, but your [butt] is still sleeping on the couch.”

Jimmy Kimmel: "You know, usually when someone is forced to return that quickly on a flight, it's because they got busted going to Cancun while their constituents were freezing to death. That story just keeps getting funnier. Ted Cruz is doing damage control, after his estúpido trip to Mexico. He lent a helping hoof to those in need this weekend, and, of course, posted about it."

Jimmy Kimmel: "Remember Diamond & Silk? Trump's attention-seeking fans? They have a show on Newsmax where they cover important topics like Bill Gates and his suspicious enthusiasm for plant-based meat. ... It's like Bert and Ernie with brain tumors."

Jimmy Kimmel: "We are one step closer to hopefully, maybe, getting a look at Donald Trump's tax returns. The Supreme Court today ruled that Trump must turn them over to prosecutors in New York. And once they have those, we'll finally have the evidence we need to lock Hillary up!"

Jimmy Kimmel: "The only thing Trump has hidden from the public as well as his tax returns is Tiffany."

Jimmy Kimmel: "So prosecutors in New York will soon have Trump's perfect tax returns. Life's funny, isn't it? One day you're building walls, the next they're closing in on you."

Stephen Colbert: "We're approaching the pandemic's first anniversary. Traditionally, the gift is paper, on a roll, next to a toilet."

Stephen Colbert: "For years, the former President has been desperate to prevent prosecutors from getting their hands on any documents that might get him in legal trouble. So, any documents. But today, the high court ruled that he had to hand over his financial history to the Manhattan DA, who's been conducting a criminal investigation that could lead to conspiracy fraud charges, which are B felonies. Good. 'Cause he 'b' a felon."

Stephen Colbert: "Given the potential charges, the former President could be sent to jail if convicted. I can't wait to see it all play out in the new Netflix series 'Orange Is The New Orange.'"

Stephen Colbert: "Back in 2011, federal regulators warned Texas that its power plants couldn't be counted on to reliably churn out electricity in bitterly cold conditions. ... The guy in charge of the Lone Star State back then was former Texas Governor...Rick Perry. Last week, Perry defended his state's ludicrous energy setup, saying, 'Texans would be without electricity for longer than three days to keep the federal government out of their business.' That statement was so dumb, Rick Perry immediately tried to make himself seem smarter by wearing a second pair of glasses."

Stephen Colbert: "At the height of the crisis last week, folks on social media spotted Ted Cruz boarding a flight to Cancun. 'Cause you know what they say: 'When the going gets tough, Ted Cruz gets gone.'"

Stephen Colbert: "The senator got a lot of criticism, so he immediately swallowed his pride, pulled himself up by his own bootstraps, and threw his daughters under a bus."

Jimmy Fallon: "Everyone is still talking about this following the backlash over his trip to Cancun, so Sen. Ted Cruz spent the weekend trying his best to help the people of Texas. ... Yeah, people were upset when they realized Cruz was loading water into his car."

Jimmy Fallon: "People are also upset that Cruz tweeted those pictures himself. Even white people who only posted black squares on Instagram were like, 'You gotta do more than that.'"

Jimmy Fallon: "Seriously, you know Cruz is having a rough 2021 when fueling a riot at the Capitol is nowhere near his biggest problem."

Jimmy Fallon: "Things are so bad for Cruz, he spent today thinking about the good ol' days, when people just thought he was the zodiac killer."

Seth Meyers: "Newsmax host Greg Kelly criticized President Biden's dog Champ over the weekend, and said he looked like he was, quote, 'from the junkyard.' 'No, I would have remembered him,' said Steve Bannon."

Seth Meyers: "United Airlines announced over the weekend that they launched an investigation into who leaked data about Sen. Ted Cruz's travel itinerary amid media coverage of his trip to Cancun. They're trying to figure out who would have a motive, and they narrowed it down to everybody."

Seth Meyers: "The Senate this week is set to hold a confirmation hearing for President Biden's attorney general nominee, Judge Merrick Garland. Unless Mitch McConnell gets his way, 'Not until the election. Biden's presidency is almost over.'"

Seth Meyers: "President Biden reportedly carries a brown leather briefcase to the Oval Office every day. 'What's inside?' asked Trump about the Oval Office."

James Corden: "There's a big update in Donald Trump's never-ending quest to keep his taxes hidden. Earlier today, the Supreme Court said that Trump's accountants must turn over his financial records to prosecutors. This is it, guys. I think this is what is finally going to take down his presidency."

James Corden: "Obviously, this is huge news. You know what this means? We're one step closer to absolutely nothing happening. I thought we were done with Trump, I thought we were done talking about it, weren't we? Here he is sneaking back into the show like an ex who pretends he left their phone charger at the house."

Treasury in the News

Harris Swears In Yellen As Treasury Secretary.

The AP (1/26, Crutsinger) reports that on Tuesday, Janet Yellen was "sworn in...as the nation's 78th Treasury secretary and the first woman to hold the office” by Vice President Harris “at a ceremony performed outside on the East Wing entrance to the White House in view of the department Yellen will now lead.” The AP says Yellen’s husband, George Akerlof, “winner of the 2001 Nobel prize in economics, and their son Robert, also an economist, were present for the brief ceremony.” The AP reports that on Monday night, Yellen “became the third of President Joe Biden’s Cabinet nominees to win Senate approval on a vote of 84-15.”

The New York Times (1/26, Rappeport, 20.6M) says Yellen “will quickly be thrust into fraught negotiations over how to design and pass a robust stimulus package to help revive an economy that has been hammered by the coronavirus pandemic.” Yellen on Tuesday “said on Twitter that she was proud to be joining the Treasury Department and described the field of economics, and the agency’s mission, as one that can ‘right past wrongs and improve people’s lives.’”

In a column for Reuters (1/26), Gina Chon says Yellen has “one obvious way she, and the incoming class of financial watchdogs, can make a mark. That’s to revive the incentive compensation rule, an unfinished part of the Dodd-Frank regulation of 2010 that would make it easier to recoup pay from financiers when they foul up.”

Yellen Thanks Rapper For “Money” Song Made In Her Honor. The Hill (1/26, Polus, 5.69M) reports Yellen also “took to social media to thank rapper Dessa for releasing a ‘money’ song in her honor.” President Biden in December “inspired the tune when he...joked during the administration personnel announcement that Lin-Manuel Miranda, who wrote the hit Broadway musical ‘Hamilton’ about the nation’s first secretary of the treasury Alexander Hamilton, now needed to write a second musical about Yellen.” Dessa “tweeted out her song...shortly after Yellen was sworn into office Tuesday,” adding, “Congratulations, Madam Secretary.” Yellen, “cheekily thanking the rapper,” responded by telling Dessa, “your tune is ‘money’. Thanks for the mood music, I’ll take it from here.” The Treasury Department “joined in on the fun, tweeting in response to the mojito comment: ‘@usmint We’ll bring the mint.’”

Yellen Tasks Treasury Staff With Major Role In Addressing Major Crises Facing Nation.

The Hill (1/26, Lane, 5.69M) reports Treasury Secretary Janet Yellen on Tuesday “sought to rally department employees as the Biden administration tackles the economic damage wrought by the coronavirus pandemic.” Speaking to Treasury staff in a letter hours after the swearing-in ceremony, Yellen “laid out the crucial challenges facing the administration as the U.S. reels from the worst economic crisis since the Great Depression.” Yellen said, “I know many Treasury employees have been responding to the economic emergency since the beginning. ... But now we must complete the task. We must help the American people endure the final months of this pandemic by making sure they have roofs over their head and food on the table. Then, we must assist them in getting back to work safely.”

Bloomberg (1/26, Mohsin, 3.57M) reports Yellen “highlighted the past coordination between her new department and her previous fiefdom, the Federal Reserve, as she sought to rally the agency’s staff in battling an array of crises besetting the nation.” Yellen said in the letter, “Economics isn’t just something you find in a textbook. ... Economic policy can be a potent tool to improve society. We can – and should – use it to address inequality, racism and climate change.”

Reuters (1/26, Shalal) and Fox Business (1/26, Lea, 3.06M) also report.

Housing And Mortgage Industry Leaders Welcome Yellen’s Confirmation For Treasury Secretary.

HousingWire (1/26, 7K) reports housing and mortgage industry officials “were quick to signal their support” for the “historic U.S. Treasury Secretary confirmation of Janet Yellen, the 74-year-old who now holds the distinction of being the first female to hold the position in its 230-year history.” According to NAR Chief Economist Lawrence Yun, Yellen “recognizes the societal benefits and wealth building opportunities that homeownership can bring, especially among minority households.” MBA CEO Bob Broeksmit said he was “heartened” by Yellen’s confirmation, stating, “Our members are focused on several key issues she will have the opportunity to address that will have a significant impact on our nation’s real estate finance market. Specifically, these include working with key stakeholders to support the implementation of effective rent and mortgage payment assistance and the expansion of minority homeownership.” National Community Reinvestment Coalition CEO Jesse Van Tol said Yellen is “an ally and friend who understands that America’s enduring socio-economic disparities in wealth and opportunity need to be addressed through shifts in public policy and private sector practices.” NAFCU President Dan Berger said, “We look forward to continuing our successful relationship with [Yellen] as credit unions remain critical to helping our nation overcome this disastrous pandemic.” National Mortgage Professional (1/26) provides additional coverage.

Treasury Official Says Administration Not Considering Retroactive Tax Hikes.

Bloomberg (1/26, Davison, 3.57M) reports the Biden Administration “isn’t actively considering retroactive tax increases, which fail to give individuals and businesses time to respond to the higher rates.” At an ABA event on Tuesday, Deputy Assistant Treasury Secretary for Tax Policy Mark Mazur said, “You want to have a tax system where people – taxpayers – can react to the increases in the tax system so that they can change their behavior,” adding, “When you do retroactive tax increases that’s not possible.” According to Bloomberg, Mazur “said that if retroactive tax increases were pursued, doing them in the early part of the year ‘makes sense.’” The Biden Administration “also might consider them if the specific moves had been under discussion for a long time – and taxpayers had effectively been ‘given notice.’”

Treasury Grant News

Denver To Receive $22M From Federal Government To Assist Low-Income Residents Pay Rent, Utility Bills.

The Denver Post (1/26, Swanson, 660K) reports Denver "will receive nearly $22 million from the federal government to help low-income residents pay their rent and utility bills during the pandemic, which is approaching its 11th month." City officials "said in a news release that the money comes from the federal Emergency Rental Assistance Program and will coincide with Denver's current efforts to help residents pay their bills." The Post says the Treasury Department "is narrowing requirements for the [ERAP], and city officials say they're exploring how best to use the money."

MD County To Receive $9.7M Treasury Grant For Rental, Utility Assistance.

The Baltimore \(MD\) Sun (1/26, Faguy, 629K) reports Howard County "is set to receive $9.7 million from a U.S. Department of Treasury grant to help with rental and utility assistance amid the coronavirus pandemic." Pending City Council authorization, the funding "could be in renters' hands as soon as March, according to Kelly Cimino, director of the county Department of Housing and Community Development." The grant "allows the county to provide renters with up to nine months of rental assistance, as well as utility assistance." Cimino "said the Treasury Department grant has fewer restrictions than many other grant opportunities," adding, "This is different from other grants where we weren't allowed to help those who have already been helped. This is a major change."

Corpus Christi, TX Expecting $10M Treasury Grant For Rent, Mortgage Assistance.

KIII-TV Corpus Christi, TX (1/27, Burns) reports "more money is coming for county and city residents" who need "help with mortgage and rent payments because of the pandemic." County commissioners "are expected to approve a grant for close to a million dollars for people who've been impacted by the pandemic and are having trouble affording housing." In Corpus Christi last year, "almost 1,000 families received such benefits amounting to close to $400,000." The city "is next expecting to get almost $10 million from the Treasury Department for the same use in the next couple of weeks."

COVID-19 News

CDC Says Schools Can Resume In-Person Learning With Precautions.

NBC Nightly News (1/26, story 3, 2:30, Holt, 6.26M) reported, "The pandemic has had a profound impact on our children, cut off from friends and schools. But CDC experts said today in-person learning can resume if proper precautions are taken." NBC's Kate Snow added, "The leaders of the COVID response team at the CDC concluding school-related cases of COVID-19 have been reported, but there has been little evidence that schools have contributed meaningfully to increased community transmission," and that is "more ammunition for those pushing to reopen schools for in-person learning." Still, "there are heated debates over whether to return kids to classrooms, from Chicago to Atlanta to Maryland." According to the CDC, "schools will still need to require face masks, increase physical distance, and do testing."

ABC World News Tonight (1/26, story 2, 0:25, Muir, 7.57M) reported, "News tonight from the CDC coming in about the safety of children going back to school." ABC's Stephanie Ramos added, "The study looked at 17 schools where masks were worn and social distancing rules were followed. Even though there was community spread of the virus at the time, researchers found that there wasn't much spread of the virus in schools when those precautions were followed."

The Washington Post (1/26, Meckler, 10.52M) reports that according to the CDC "schools operating in person have seen scant transmission of the coronavirus, particularly when masks and distancing are employed." CDC researchers also concluded that "there has been little evidence that schools have contributed meaningfully to increased community transmission."

The New York Times (1/26, Rabin, 20.6M) reports, "On Tuesday, federal health officials weighed in with a call for returning children to the nation's classrooms as soon as possible," yet "local officials also must be willing to impose limits on other settings – like indoor dining, bars or poorly ventilated gyms – in order to keep infection rates low in the community at large, researchers at the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention wrote in the journal JAMA."

Reuters (1/26, Chander) reports the CDC researchers, writing in the Journal of the American Medical Association, "said that mitigation measures such as universal mask use, social distancing, and ventilation were key to avoiding infection." The Wall Street Journal (1/26, Abbott, Subscription Publication, 8.41M) and USA Today (1/26, Aspegren, Bacon, Ortiz, 12.7M) also report the news.

Administration Considers Requiring Negative COVID Test For Domestic Flights.

Reuters (1/26, Shepardson) reports that according to Marty Cetron, Director for the Division of Global Migration and Quarantine at CDC, "the Biden administration is 'actively looking' at expanding mandatory COVID-19 testing to travelers on U.S. domestic flights." Cetron added that "there's been a dramatic evolution and increase in both testing platforms and testing capacity."

Vaccine Fraud Said To Be Increasing In US.

ABC World News Tonight (1/26, story 7, 2:00, Muir, Gutman, 7.57M) reported, "Cases of alleged vaccine fraud growing in this country. This suspect accused of selling fake COVID shots, and in another case, the paramedic accused of stealing doses after making up fake patients, now claiming his supervisor wanted the doses for his own family.” ABC’s Matt Gutman added, “In Florida, paramedic Joshua Colon accused of hoarding doses, claiming a supervisor wanted them for his family. A tough-talking sheriff making an example of the pair.” ABC added, “He’s being charged with multiple counts, including forgery and falsifying medical records. Authorities say they are now investigating whether the supervisor played any role, as well.” In Washington state, a man is being charged “for posing as a biotech expert, claiming to have a COVID vaccine and offering to inject patients for between $400 and $1,000 each.”

Experts Say Rapid Testing, Masks, And Ventilation Are Best Bet To Reopen Safely.

The Wall Street Journal (1/26, A1, Hernandez, Toy, McCabe, Subscription Publication, 8.41M) reports that public health experts and researchers have concluded that rapid COVID tests, masks, and ventilation are most helpful to reopening businesses and other public institutions during the pandemic.

Vaccines Being Made Available To Teachers In At Least 22 States And DC.

The Washington Post (1/26, Natanson, St. George, Stein, 10.52M) reports that while “in many places, educators have been moved toward the front of the line for shots,” that “has not gone hand-in-hand with efforts to return students to classrooms.” The Post adds that “some officials are explicitly refusing to link vaccination and reopening.” According to the Post, “vaccines are available this week for teachers in at least 22 states and the District,” and some governors “are prioritizing teachers beyond what the CDC recommends.” Still, in some areas, officials and teachers unions are linking vaccinations and school reopening.

Newsom Lifts Stay-At-Home Orders, Hopes California Can Avoid Another Surge.

The Los Angeles Times (1/26, Luna, Karlamangla, Lin II, Fry, 3.37M) reports the “abrupt move” by California Gov. Gavin Newsom (D) “to lift stay-at-home orders – allowing outdoor dining and other business activities to resume – represents a gamble that California can avoid another deadly coronavirus surge in the coming months” as people await the vaccine, even with “the looming threat of more contagious strains.” The Times says that “lifting the stay-at-home order should be a boost to some restaurant owners and other merchants,” though “experts said it would not take a lot for the situation to spiral out of control again.”

The San Francisco Chronicle (1/26, Williams, 2.44M) reports, “Each of the nine Bay Area counties remained in the most restrictive tier of California’s color-coded reopening blueprint on Tuesday,” and statewide, “54 California counties stayed in the most restrictive purple tier,” while three “were in the red tier, and only Sierra County was in the orange tier.” None have been declared “eligible to be in the least restrictive yellow tier.”

The Chicago Teachers Union “said its members will still refuse to report to schools.” Mayor Lori Lightfoot “cast her decision to reopen schools as consistent with federal public health guidance,” and “repeatedly argued that she was doing everything she could to reach a deal.”

The Chicago Sun-Times (1/26, Issa, 970K) reports “the Chicago Teachers Union has told its members to work from home Wednesday and prepare for a strike Thursday if city officials ban remote teaching in response.”

WPost Urges More Genetic Sequencing Of Virus.

The Washington Post (1/26, 10.52M) in an editorial says that while “vaccines offer hope for an easing of the pandemic...the coronavirus is not loitering around,” and “two significant genetic variants in Britain and South Africa pose a challenge.” These genetic variants “require an urgent response and a concerted effort to scale-up genomic surveillance.” The Post says that “genetic sequencing technology ... should be deployed into a massive cross-country genomic virus surveillance network for disease detection and risk assessment.”

US May Not Enforce Self-Quarantine Requirement For International Travelers.

The Washington Post (1/26, McMahon, 10.52M) reports under a "new Biden administration executive order that took effect Tuesday, the United States now requires all international entrants" to "secure a negative coronavirus test result," and "to follow Centers for Disease Control and Prevention guidance to self-quarantine for at least seven days." The Post adds that "it remains unclear how a self-quarantine would be enforced, and the CDC said in an email Monday that it will not enforce its guidelines for quarantine as a rule."

EU Says It Expects Drug Companies To Live Up To Vaccine Obligations.

The AP (1/26, Casert) reports that on Tuesday, the EU "warned pharmaceutical companies that have developed coronavirus vaccines with EU aid that it must get its shots on schedule, a day after the bloc threatened to impose export controls on vaccines produced within its borders." According to the AP, the EU "made it very clear that it is bent on getting all doses as quickly as their contracts provide for at a time when infections are surging, many hospitals are overwhelmed, and many of the 27 members states are struggling to get their vaccine rollout going at top speed." The AP says "the hardening of its position came days after it accused AstraZeneca of failing to guarantee the delivery of coronavirus vaccines without a valid explanation. It also had expressed displeasure over vaccine delivery delays from Pfizer-BioNTech."

The Washington Post (1/26, Cunningham, Morris, 10.52M) reports the EU "stepped up pressure on pharmaceutical companies it says have hobbled coronavirus vaccine rollouts, proposing tighter export controls and threatening potential legal action" towards AstraZeneca, "which said last week that it would supply 'considerably fewer' doses of its coronavirus vaccine to E.U. member states than originally planned." Also on Tuesday, "Germany's health minister said he supported restricting vaccine exports to ensure doses reserved for E.U. member states remain in the bloc."

European Public Upset Over COVID Restrictions.

The CBS Evening News (1/26, story 7, 1:45, O'Donnell, 4.76M) reported, "Anger is rising in Europe as governments impose new COVID restrictions and vaccines are in short supply." CBS' Charlie D'Agata added, "Strict new lockdown measures triggered a backlash of violence that spread across the Netherlands for three nights running. Anger at a nighttime curfew drawing rioters on the streets. Countries across Europe resorting to extreme measures to stem the spread of a mutant variant of the virus first identified in the UK."

The Wall Street Journal (1/26, Subscription Publication, 8.41M) reports there have been riots for three nights in Dutch cities over COVID restrictions including the new curfews. Dutch Prime Minister Mark Rutte denounced the rioters and defended the regulations.

The New York Times (1/26, Landler, Castle, 20.6M) reports, "Britain on Tuesday surpassed 100,000 deaths from the coronavirus," which, it says, "laid bare the missteps in Prime Minister Boris Johnson's handling of the pandemic."

Venezuela's Maduro Touts COVID Treatment.

The AP (1/26, Rueda, Smith) reports Venezuelan President Nicolás Maduro "appears to be counting on yet another 'miracle' to save his citizens from COVID-19, promoting a secretive solution with no published scientific evidence he claims will conquer the new coronavirus." On Sunday in a TV appearance, Maduro touted "a powerful antiviral, very powerful, that neutralizes the coronavirus." The AP adds, "The local National Academy of Medicine said it appeared to be derived from the common herb thyme." Maduro called the treatment "carvativir" and said that it "has been under testing for nine months among Venezuelans ill with the coronavirus."

Cynthia McFadden added that epidemiologist Larry Brilliant "says the United States has a critical role to play in helping the world access the vaccine." NBC also reported, "Canada has already pre-ordered enough vaccine to inoculate every citizen nearly six times, and the US has enough purchase options to vaccinate everyone nearly five times, leaving much of the world scrambling."

Biden Says US Ordering 200M More Vaccine Doses, Increasing Shipments To States.

David Muir reported on ABC World News Tonight (1/26, lead story, 4:55, 7.57M) that President Biden said Tuesday that "he hopes to have enough vaccine for 300 million Americans by the end of the summer, ordering another 100 million doses from Pfizer and 100 million doses additional from Moderna. It comes as the global pandemic now reaches a staggering new toll: more than 100 million cases worldwide and more than two million dead. Here at home, more than 25 million Americans have now tested positive." The President "again [told] Americans this is 'a wartime effort,' requiring, quote, 'aggressive steps,' saying, 'Keep the faith, we will get there,' and that he will always level with you." ABC's Stephanie Ramos: "After weeks of frustration over a slow vaccine rollout and desperate calls for more supply, the President saying help is on the way." Biden: "We will both increase the supply in the short term by more than 15%, and give our states and local partners more certainty about when the deliveries will arrive." Ramos: "The Biden Administration now promising to buy an extra 100 million doses of both the Pfizer and Moderna vaccines for a total of 600 million – enough to vaccinate 300 million Americans by the end of this summer."

Norah O'Donnell said in opening the CBS Evening News (1/26, lead story, 3:00, 4.76M), "President Biden says the US is buying 200 million more doses of the two approved coronavirus vaccines, giving the government enough shots by the end of the summer for all Americans to get vaccinated." Biden "also says he's immediately increasing the number of vaccines the government is shipping to states and will give governors details and shipping schedules. ... The CDC says 44 million of the shots have been already given to states, but fewer than 24 million of them have actually been put in people's arms. That's because some states and hospitals are holding doses back, trying to make sure that they have enough to give those second shots. Still, the President says it will take months before enough people are vaccinated to make a real dent in the pandemic, and that Americans must keep wearing masks and social distancing."

Tom Costello said on NBC Nightly News (1/26, lead story, 3:35, Holt, 6.26M) that there is "a major White House push to surge vaccine doses to every state and territory, increasing by 16% the weekly vaccine supply that's sent to states, from 8.6 million doses to at least 10 million for the next three weeks, and giving states three weeks' notice on how many doses they'll receive so they can adjust their distribution plans." Jim Sciutto reported on CNN (1/26, 1.07M), "President Biden is raising the bar for his goal of vaccinations in the US. The President says he hopes the country will soon be able to administer 1.5 million shots a day, up from a million shots a day, therefore, raising a goal of 150 million vaccinations in his first 100 days in office."

The AP (1/26, Drew, Miller) reports that Biden, "answering growing frustration over vaccine shortages," said the US "is ramping up deliveries to hard-pressed states over the next three weeks and expects to provide enough doses to vaccinate 300 million Americans by the end of the summer or early fall. ... Governors and top health officials have been increasingly raising the alarm about inadequate supplies and the need for earlier and more reliable estimates of how much vaccine is on the way so that they can plan." The President's team "held its first virus-related call with the nation's governors on Tuesday and pledged to provide states with firm vaccine allocations three weeks ahead of delivery." The New York Daily News (1/26, Sommerfeldt, Slattery, 2.51M) reports, "Many state leaders complained that the Trump administration had kept them in the dark about how many shots they could expect each week, hampering distribution efforts."

Reuters (1/26, Hunnicutt) reports the Administration "will purchase 100 million doses each of the vaccines made by Pfizer Inc and BioNTech, and Moderna Inc, increasing the overall total doses to 600 million, with delivery expected by summer. The previous purchase target was 400 million doses." The Washington Post (1/26, A1, Stanley-Becker, 10.52M) reports both companies were "cautious in public statements, though people knowledgeable about the negotiations said formal deals were imminent because the government was using options built into contracts negotiated by the Trump administration to receive the additional doses. Those people, like several others, spoke on the condition of anonymity to describe internal matters."

The New York Times (1/26, A1, Stolberg, Weiland, LaFraniere, 20.6M) says that while Biden "said the moves were 'going to allow millions more Americans to get vaccinated sooner than previously anticipated,' that was likely not the case. Next week's increase to the states was expected as vaccine makers ramp up manufacturing. And the replenishing over the summer...was anticipated under contracts signed by the Trump administration, which gave the government options to continue increasing its commitments in increments of 100 million doses." Still, experts said the Administration "was wise to lock down as many doses as it could as soon as possible, even if the vials would only be delivered later in the year."

The Los Angeles Times (1/26, Megerian, 3.37M) reports admitting that "even the increased number of doses is unlikely to meet the vast demand for the vaccine, Biden urged patience and encouraged people to continue to wear masks to limit the spread of the coronavirus." He said, "The brutal truth is, it's going to take months before we can get the majority of Americans vaccinated. ... In the next few months, masks – not vaccines – are the best defense against COVID-19." Bloomberg (1/26, Wingrove, Parker, 3.57M) reports Biden "cautioned that the vaccination effort is an overwhelmingly difficult logistical effort." The President said, "A lot of things can go wrong along the way."

Chief of Staff Klain said on CNN (1/26, 2.74M), "We've been here seven days. We've ramped up capacity higher than it's ever been. We're moving it to the states faster, with more certainty and clarity, but there are just some limitations on this process." Klain added, "We need more vaccine, we need more vaccinations, we need more places to give the vaccinations. We are working on all three of those things."

White House Senior COVID Response Adviser Andy Slavitt said on CNN's Cuomo Prime Time (1/26, 3.11M), "We're giving states predictability. Every state and territory will now have at least a three-week window to know how many vaccines are coming so they can plan appropriately. ... So more of those vaccines will get in people's arms and more people will have their expectations met." Slavitt added, "The second thing we learned is we did not have enough vaccines contracted to give everybody who needs a vaccine a vaccine. We've taken care of that today, so it's been a good first week. We're still learning as we go along."

Asked on Fox News' America's Newsroom (1/26, 896K) about the timeline for vaccinating the general population, NIAID Director Fauci said, "By the time you get to April, you will have gotten to the point where...wherever you are in a priority, you can start getting the doses. Logistically, by the time you get doses into everyone who might want it, it will take several months...and I've been saying that probably by the end of the summer, you could get everybody vaccinated."

CNN (1/26, Lee, Sullivan, 89.21M) reports on its website, "The new efforts come one day after the President said he expects the US will soon be able to vaccinate 1.5 million people a day, which is a notable increase from the administration's previously stated target of 1 million per day. The President said that the US could surpass that initial target in about three weeks, and said that he thinks anyone who wants a vaccine will be able to get it by this spring." Roll Call (1/26, Kopp, 130K) says "the biggest unknown, even at the highest levels of officials overseeing the vaccination effort, had been when and how much vaccine supply will become available." USA Today (1/26, Groppe, Jansen, Behrmann, Wu, 12.7M), the Wall Street Journal (1/26, A1, Armour, Siddiqui, Restuccia, Subscription Publication, 8.41M), Politico (1/26, Cancryn, Roubein, 6.73M), and The Hill (1/26, Sullivan, Samuels, 5.69M) also have reports.

Johnson & Johnson Expects To Report Vaccine Data Next Week. Reuters (1/26, Mishra, O'Donnell) reports that on Tuesday, Johnson & Johnson "said it expected to report eagerly-awaited data on its COVID-19 vaccine early next week, and that it would be able to meet the delivery target for doses to countries with which it had signed supply agreements." Health officials "are increasingly counting on single-dose options like the one being tested by J&J to simplify and boost inoculations given the complications and slower-than-hoped rollout of authorized vaccines" from Pfizer and Moderna. The Wall Street Journal (1/26, Grossman, Loftus, Subscription Publication, 8.41M) reports J&J discussed its vaccine plans Tuesday as it reported fourth-quarter earnings.

Eli Lilly Reports Positive Findings On Antibody Drug. The AP (1/26, Marchione) reports recent study results "extend hopes for drugs that supply antibodies to fight COVID-19, suggesting they can help keep patients out of the hospital and possibly prevent illness in some uninfected people." On Tuesday, Eli Lilly said that a "two-antibody combo reduced the risk of hospitalizations or death by 70% in newly diagnosed, non-hospitalized COVID-19 patients at high risk of serious illness because of age or other health conditions." USA Today (1/26, Weintraub, 12.7M) reports Lilly's drug bamlanivimab was authorized by the FDA "late last year and has been used by 125,000 high-risk patients nationwide based on early-stage data suggesting it could be effective."

Biden Credits Previous Administration For Role In Vaccination Process, But Criticizes Program. Fox News (1/26, De Lea, 23.99M) reports on its website that the President on Tuesday "gave credit to former President Donald Trump's administration for its role in getting the coronavirus vaccination process off the ground, before criticizing it over a lack of transparency." Biden said credit "was 'absolutely due' to the Trump administration, as well as the medical and scientific communities." Biden "quickly added, however, that in the final days of the transition his team discovered 'the vaccine program [was] in worse shape than we anticipated or expected.'"

Harris Receives Second Dose Of Moderna Vaccine. Reuters (1/26) reports Vice President Harris received her second dose of the Moderna vaccine on Tuesday at the National Institutes of Health. The Washington Post (1/26, Wagner, 10.52M) reports Harris "thank[ed] the doctors and scientists for their lifesaving work and urg[ed] Americans to get the vaccine when they can." CNN (1/26, Zeleny, Collins, 89.21M) reports on its website that "several hundred White House employees had been vaccinated for Covid-19 as of Tuesday, two Biden administration officials told CNN, with more expected in the coming weeks."

Vaccine Rollout Forces States To Make Stark Moral Choices. The AP (1/26, Flaccus, Cline) reports that with a "mass vaccination campaign underway, the U.S. is facing a moral dilemma as officials from California to New Jersey decide who gets the shots first." In Oregon, one 75-year-old "was shocked when the state started vaccinating teachers this week before senior citizens in a push to get children back into classrooms." She said, "The thing that is so upsetting to me is that seniors don't matter, the elderly don't matter. And it's painful to hear that implication."

New COVID Variants May Increase Risk Of Spread. NBC Nightly News (1/26, story 2, 1:55, Holt, 6.26M) reported on the risk from "new and more contagious strains of the virus." NBC's Miguel Almaguer added, "Roughly half the country, including states like New York, Illinois, and California, have already confirmed cases of the highly contagious and perhaps deadlier UK strain and are now bracing for dangerous mutations from Brazil and South Africa." NBC also reported that "officials fear the virus variants can easily spread," while "epidemiologists warn with the new variants, even brief interactions, like an outdoor chat without a mask or having a cup of coffee indoors, can increase your transmission by up to 70%." So "authorities," are recommending "wearing two masks," and "skipping that next trip to the grocery store or coffee shop."

Vilsack Says Pandemic Will Be A USDA Priority. The New York Times (1/26, Severson, 20.6M) reports Agriculture Secretary-designate Vilsack "said in an interview on Friday that he has already sketched out his agenda. ... Topping the list is protecting Agriculture Department employees and people who process the nation's food from the virus, and figuring out which land-grant universities, government laboratories and other department offices might be able to store and administer vaccines."

Biden Calls Roy's Rejection On Mask-Wearing "Not Very American." Bloomberg (1/26, Sink, 3.57M) reports the President remarked Tuesday on comments by Rep. Chip Roy (R-TX) that "profanely dismiss[ed] the president's call to wear a mask to prevent the spread of the coronavirus." Biden said, "He used a very colorful term to say, 'Wearing a mask, tell them to kiss my ear, I'm not going to wear a mask.' Well, guess what? Not very American. The fact is, you want to be patriotic, you're going to protect people." Roy "defended the comment to RealClearPolitics, saying it was 'not my most Christian statement but it's very American.'"

Democrats Prepare To Pass Biden's COVID Relief Plan With Or Without GOP.

The AP (1/26, Mascaro, Boak) reports Senate Democrats are preparing to move quickly on President Biden's COVID relief package "even if it means using procedural tools to pass the legislation on their own, leaving Republicans behind." Senate Majority Leader Schumer "told senators to be ready to vote as soon as next week on a budget reconciliation package that would lay the groundwork for swift passage." The Washington Post (1/26, DeBonis, Werner, 10.52M) reports that the Administration "is courting Republican support publicly," and Schumer "held out hope of GOP backing. But a number of leading Republicans including [Senate Minority Leader] McConnell have panned Biden's plan as too costly, and behind the scenes Democrats are making plans to move forward without them." Reuters (1/26) reports that Schumer said Tuesday, "We want to work with our Republican colleagues to advance this legislation in a bipartisan way. But the work must move forward, preferably with our Republican colleagues, but without them if we must."

Phil Mattingly said on CNN (1/26, 1.68M) that "while the President has repeatedly said he wants bipartisan support, he wants unity, Democrats are very clear right now that they are willing to give Republicans a couple weeks to come on board, but they are not willing to cut down their package in a significant manner." John Harwood reported on CNN (1/26, 1.27M) that although Biden will "try to get the 10 Republican votes he would need to break a filibuster...that goal is less important to the Biden White House than getting something very close to the package that they've proposed." Harwood added that the White House is "determined to pass a big package. They think they can hold their 50 Democratic votes together to do that."

White House Office of Public Engagement Director Cedric Richmond said on CNN (1/26, 2.27M), "Congress sent out $600, and we need to make sure that we push for the other $1,400, which is why the American Rescue Plan is so important for Congress to pass it, so that we can get that number to $2,000, and we need them to act before March 15, when unemployment insurance and all the other benefits, the eviction and foreclosure moratorium, expire. We're in a dire crisis here, and we need to help these American families." Asked on MSNBC (1/26, 2.78M) about the possibility of advancing proposals to the floor now, Richmond said, "This pandemic is not picking people based on party affiliation, color, or income level, and we want and expect Congress to come along and help us help the American people. And so we're not going to compromise our values in an effort to reach a bipartisan compromise, but we promised that we would reach out and extend our hand of bipartisanship. ... So right now, we're doing both."

Bloomberg (1/26, Litvan, Wasson, 3.57M) says while a budget resolution "is the first step toward a so-called reconciliation bill," the "catch...is that not all of Biden's $1.9 trillion plan is likely to qualify for that route. The $160 billion for Covid-19 vaccines and testing would likely be out because discretionary spending is excluded from the process, while the proposed minimum-wage hike may also be disqualified for having insufficient budget impact." The Wall Street Journal (1/26, Duehren, Subscription Publication, 8.41M) says reconciliation is generally limited to tax and spending measures so the stimulus checks, the child tax credit and unemployment insurance in the Biden plan would likely qualify.

CNN (1/26, Barrett, 89.21M) reports on its website while many Republicans "have signaled they can't support" Biden's $1.9 trillion proposal "just a month after they passed a $900 billion bill, senators are still having conversations with their Democratic colleagues." Sen. Jerry Moran (R-KS) "told reporters on Tuesday that White House officials had just reached out to him again to follow up. Other Republicans" such as Sen. Rob Portman (R-OH) "said it would be 'irresponsible' for Democrats to move ahead with reconciliation so soon." Politico (1/26, Everett, Emma, Ferris, 6.73M) says while progressives "are itching to wield control...and are skeptical that talks between a bipartisan group of senators and President Joe Biden will bear fruit," moderates "say the party needs to be more patient and give the centrists some space to work." The Hill (1/26, Carney, 5.69M) and Roll Call (1/26, Krawzak, Lerman, 130K) provide similar coverage.

Deese: White House May Agree To Restrict Eligibility For $1,400 Checks. CNBC (1/26, Franck, 7.34M) reports on its website that in an interview for CNBC's Squawk Box from the White House Tuesday morning, NEC Director Deese indicated that the Biden Administration "could be open to adjusting eligibility levels for the next round of coronavirus stimulus checks to ensure the relief flows to families who need the emergency funds the most." Deese said, "When it comes to the checks, we put forward a proposal that...passed the House with 275 votes – 44 Republicans voted for it. ... Certainly, if there are ways to make that provision, and other provisions, more effective, that's something that we're open to, that we'll have conversations about." CNBC reports that on Monday, President Biden also "said he would consider curbing eligibility for the checks if it could help secure Republican support."

The Washington Post (1/26, Long, 10.52M) reports there are growing calls "to target the aid solely to low- and moderate-income families, and new data suggests that would provide the most needed and effective boost for the economy." An "analysis of how Americans are using the $600 economic impact payments this month by Opportunity Insights, a nonprofit research organization," found that families earning around $75,000 tend to spend the money quickly while families earning above the amount typically save it, "which provides little help to the overall economy and signals the money was not as urgently needed."

SBA Says $35B In Additional Pandemic Loans Approved As It Tries To Fix PPP Glitches.

Reuters (1/26) reports the SBA said Tuesday "it had approved 400,000 more pandemic relief loans worth $35 billion and was trying to fix issues operational snags with the program raised by lenders." The agency "launched the third round of the Paycheck Protection Program (PPP) this month, but significant changes to its rules, process and technology platform, has caused problems that were slowing approvals."

according to the American Bankers Association. The group said companies applying for a second PPP loan experienced technical issues and lenders are receiving a "high number of incorrect error messages" when submitting loan applications. The Wall Street Journal (1/26, Omeokwe, Subscription Publication, 8.41M) says the SBA will issue guidance to lenders and it is instructing field offices on how to assist borrowers and lenders who have issues when submitting second-time applications.

Democrats Mull Using Reconciliation To Pass Bill Raising Minimum Wage.

CNBC (1/26, Pramuk, 7.34M) reports on its website that on Tuesday, Democrats "reintroduced a bill...to raise the U.S. minimum wage to $15 per hour." the measure "would gradually hike the pay floor to $15 an hour nationwide by 2025, then tie future increases to median wage growth." It would also "end pay below the minimum wage for tipped workers." CNBC says President Biden support a $15 minimum wage and "included the policy in his coronavirus relief package." However, CNBC adds that even "if all Democrats supported the bill, the party would have to win over 10 skeptical Republicans to pass it in the Senate," and "it is unclear if Democrats could use budget reconciliation, a process that requires only a majority vote to pass bills but restricts what can go into the legislation, to pass a wage increase."

According to the Washington Post (1/26, Wagner, Itkowitz, Sonmez, 10.52M), Democrats do "plan to try to avoid the threat of a Republican filibuster by using the so-called reconciliation process to lift the minimum wage," although House Budget Chairman John Yarmuth "suggested that Democrats' efforts to move the wage increase through with a simple majority may run into some parliamentary hurdles, telling CNN on Monday that it was 'a stretch.'"

Paul Waldman writes in the Washington Post (1/26, 10.52M) that while "the prospects for passing a minimum wage increase through the Senate don't look great," it is "a fight Democrats should be eager to take on anyway" because "people need it" and "minimum wage increases are incredibly popular." Waldman adds that a debate on raising the minimum wage "might even be the kind of fight that could convince the Democratic senators who retain their bizarre affection for the filibuster that the procedural roadblock ought to be reformed, even if they won't agree to do away with it entirely."

Consumer Confidence Increased In January.

The Wall Street Journal (1/26, Fontdegloria, Subscription Publication, 8.41M) reports the Conference Board's consumer confidence index climbed to 89.3 in January from 87.1 in December, marking the first increase after two months of declines. The Journal adds that the index remains below the 101.4 reached in October, which was its highest level since the coronavirus pandemic began, as well as February's pre-pandemic level of 132.6.

The Wall Street Journal (1/26, Eisen, Subscription Publication, 8.41M) reports five of the nation's largest banks – JPMorgan Chase, Bank of America Corp., Citigroup Inc., Wells Fargo, and US Bancorp – have committed to requiring a diverse pool of applicants when hiring employees. The banks said they would alter policies for considering applicants or reveal the policies they have in place. The Journal says the policies reflect the "Rooney Rule," which began in the NFL to ensure people of color are considered for coaching positions.

Congress Expected To Probe Allegations That Big Tech Engages In Anti-Competitive Behavior.

The New York Times (1/26, Kang, 20.6M) reports that "many Democrats, as well as some Republicans, want to take on Big Tech with laws and regulations to address issues like market power, data privacy, and disinformation and hate speech." The Times says Facebook and Google are already "fighting federal and state regulators in court over allegations of anticompetitive conduct," and "regulators continue to investigate Amazon and Apple over antitrust violations." Sen. Amy Klobuchar (D-MN), who chairs the Senate Commerce Committee's subcommittee on Communications, Technology, Innovation, and the Internet, is quoted as saying, "We have a major monopoly and competition problem. People have just finally had it."

EU's Von Der Leyen Asks For Biden Administration's Help In Regulating Big Tech. The AP (1/26) reports that on Tuesday, the European Union urged the Biden Administration "to help draw up a common rule book to rein in the power of big tech companies like Facebook and Twitter and combat the spread of fake news that is eating away at Western democracies. In a speech to the Davos World Economic Forum, European Commission President Ursula von der Leyen urged the Biden administration to join forces against 'the darker sides of the digital world,' which she said was partly behind the 'shock' storming of Capitol Hill on Jan. 6. 'The business model of online platforms has an impact and not only on free and fair competition, but also on our democracies, our security and on the quality of our information,' von der Leyen said."

Cat Zakrzewski of the Washington Post (1/26, 10.52M) writes, "Democrats have been extremely critical of the tech companies' hands-off approach to falsehoods since the 2016 election, when Russian actors sowed disinformation on Facebook and other platforms to divide the American public. Now that they're in charge in Washington, expect them to use their control of the White House and key committees to force Silicon Valley companies to take greater responsibility for disinformation."

WPost: Trump Ban Will Be First Test Of Facebook's Oversight Board.

In an editorial, the Washington Post (1/26, 10.52M) says Americans are rightly reticent about the "the idea of letting politicians decide what's permissible for other politicians to say on the Internet," but are not "much happier at the idea of corporate executives...making such determinations without any sort of democratic mandate." The Post says an independent oversight board established by Facebook "to review a small number of its enforcement decisions" is "a middle ground: Its panelists are luminaries selected from around the world, relatively diverse in their backgrounds and their leanings but all committed to free expression." The board will consider whether former President Donald Trump "should have been kicked off Facebook and whether he should be permitted back. Its reasoning will elucidate how Facebook should take offline context into account in its online decisions."

Senate Confirms Blinken As Secretary Of State On 78-22 Vote.

The AP (1/26, Lee) reports the Senate on Tuesday in a 78-22 vote "confirmed Antony Blinken as America's top diplomat, tasked with carrying out President Joe Biden's commitment to reverse the Trump administration's 'America First' doctrine that weakened international alliances." The AP says that Blinken, "a longtime Biden confidant," had previously "served as deputy secretary of state and deputy national security adviser during the Obama administration," while Reuters (1/26, Zengerle) says Blinken had been "a committee staff director – when Biden, who spent decades in the Senate, was chairman – before he joined the Obama administration." According to Axios (1/26, Chen, 1.26M), "Blinken is a French-speaker and step-son of a Holocaust survivor whose stories he credits with shaping his worldview." Axios adds that like Biden, "Blinken is a committed multilateralist and advocate for the United States as a leading force for good in the world."

USA Today (1/26, Shesgreen, 12.7M) says the margin of the bipartisan vote for Blinken's confirmation is "particularly notable given" his predecessors under former President Trump, Rex Tillerson "was confirmed 55 to 43," and Mike Pompeo "took the helm of the State Department on a vote of 57 to 42." USA Today notes Senate Minority Leader McConnell was among the Republicans to vote for Blinken, whereas Sen. Rand Paul (R-KY) "emerged as Blinken's most vocal opponent." The Hill (1/26, Chalfant, 5.69M) reports Blinken is the President's fourth nominee to be confirmed by the Senate.

Politico (1/26, Toosi, 6.73M) says that Blinken's confirmation hearing before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee last week "went relatively smoothly, with Republicans expressing delight at times at how often Blinken agreed with them." Politico highlights that Blinken "said... Trump was right to take a tougher stance on China, although he disagreed with some of the tactics used by the previous administration. He also indicated that he would support keeping some terrorism-related sanctions on the Islamist-led government in Iran, despite the Biden administration's goal of rejoining the Iran nuclear deal, which Trump quit in 2018." In addition, Bloomberg (1/26, Wadhams, 3.57M) reports Blinken "called China the 'the most significant challenge of any nation-state to the United States' and said any re-entry to the Iran nuclear deal must be followed by a stronger, better agreement."

While Blinken "signaled he is prepared to roll back a number of State Department policies that were set under" Trump, the New York Times (1/26, Jakes, 20.6M) reports he "inherits a State Department where many diplomats say they are demoralized within an agency made up of about 1,000 fewer employees than when he left as its deputy secretary in early 2017." The Times adds that Blinken "told senators last week that he will view his plans to ensure diversity and multiculturalism in the diplomatic corps 'as a significant measure of whether I succeeded or failed, however long I'm in the job,'" in "another difference between his approach and that of [Pompeo], who derided multiculturalism as 'not who America is' just hours before Mr. Blinken's defense of it."

During Confirmation Hearing, Raimondo Vows To Be Tough On China.

The AP (1/26, Freking) reports Rhode Island Gov. Gina Raimondo (D), President Biden's pick to lead the Commerce Department, on Tuesday "focused her testimony" in her confirmation hearing before the Senate Commerce Committee "on the need to help those sectors of the economy and the workers hit hardest by the coronavirus pandemic," and she "took a tough line on China in her confirmation hearing," but "stopped short of singling out which Chinese companies should remain on a list that limits their access to advanced U.S. technology."

Reuters (1/26, Shepardson) reported Raimondo said she intends to "use the full toolkit at my disposal to the fullest extent possible to protect Americans and our network from Chinese interference or any kind of back-door influence." The New York Times (1/26, Rappeport, 20.6M) says Raimondo "declined to commit to keeping Huawei or other Chinese companies on the entity list when pressed to do so" by Sen. Ted Cruz (R-TX), "but she vowed to use the powers of the Commerce Department 'to protect Americans and our network from Chinese interference,' adding, 'that's Huawei, ZTE, or any other company.'" Raimondo said, "China's actions have been anti-competitive, hurtful to American workers and businesses, coercive, and...they are culpable for atrocious human rights abuses. Whether it's the entity list, or tariffs, or countervailing duties, I intend to use all those tools to the fullest extent possible to level the playing field for the American workers." A Wall Street Journal (1/26, McKinnon, Subscription Publication, 8.41M) article titled "Commerce Nominee Pledges Tough China Stance, But Mum On Huawei Blacklist" provides similar coverage.

Meanwhile, The Verge (1/26, Kelly, 1.54M) reports Raimondo "told lawmakers that she will pursue changes to Section 230 if confirmed." According to The Verge, Raimondo told Sen. Ron Johnson (R-WI) that she "would use the tools available through the Commerce Department's National Telecommunications and Information Administration (NTIA) to convene stakeholders, industry leaders, lawmakers and others to identify the means of reform to the pivotal internet law."

The Providence \(RI\) Journal (1/26, Gregg, Anderson, 376K) says that although the hearing "tested...Raimondo's knowledge and, at times, forced her to defend her much-touted Rhode Island record," Senate Commerce Chairman Roger Wicker told her, "I do not believe you will be serving as governor of the state of Rhode Island for very much longer." He added, "I look forward to working with you." However, the

New York Times (1/26, Swanson, 20.6M) says Raimondo "has faced a bit of backlash from progressive Democrats, who have criticized her close ties with venture capital and big tech firms."

Senate Panel Backs DHS Pick Mayorkas.

Politico (1/26, Rodríguez, 6.73M) reports the Senate Homeland Security Committee in a 7-4 vote on Tuesday "voted to move forward Alejandro Mayorkas' nomination to lead the Department of Homeland Security." According to Politico, "Senate Democrats and the Biden administration had pushed to get Mayorkas confirmed before President Joe Biden's inauguration, but it was delayed" by Sen. Josh Hawley (R-MO) last week. Politico adds that although "Senate leadership has not yet weighed in on when Mayorkas' nomination will come up for a floor vote," he is "widely expected to be confirmed."

Garland Names Coley To Lead Public Affairs At DOJ, Sources Say.

Axios (1/26, Nichols, 1.26M) reports President Biden's Attorney General-designate Judge Merrick Garland "has tapped Anthony Coley, an Obama-era Treasury Department official, to serve as a senior adviser and to lead public affairs at the Department of Justice, according to people familiar with the matter." Axios says Coley will "join chief of staff Matt Klapper, who held the same role for Sen. Cory Booker, and Dena Iverson, a DOJ veteran, who will serve as principal deputy director of public affairs."

CIA Warns Ex-Officers Against Working For Foreign Government, Speaking Publicly.

The New York Times (1/26, Barnes, Haberman, 20.6M) reports CIA Assistant Director for Counterintelligence Sheetal T. Patel on Monday "sent a note to retired officers this week warning against working for foreign governments either directly or indirectly," and it "urges retired officers to take care in speaking publicly on television, podcasts, panels or social media." According to the Times, "Former officials and C.I.A. historians said they could not remember such a broad warning being sent previously to the agency's retirees in the form of an email."

NYTimes Analysis: Small Share Of Trump Pardons And Commutations Were Fully Vetted By DOJ.

The New York Times (1/26, Vogel, 20.6M) reports that "of the nearly 240 pardons and commutations issued by" former President Trump, "only 25 came through the rigorous process for identifying and vetting worthy clemency petitions overseen by the Justice Department, according to a tally kept partly by Margaret Love, who ran the department's clemency process from 1990 to 1997 as the United States pardon attorney." The Times adds that "the system has a backlog of 14,000 applications." According to the Times, "The other pardons and commutations came through an ad hoc White House process that favored applications benefiting or pushed by Mr. Trump's allies, friends and family."

Meanwhile, the New York Times (1/26, Closson, 20.6M) reports that of the "dozens of pardons and commutations...Trump issued before leaving office, one name has left some law enforcement officials reeling: Jaime A. Davidson, notorious in upstate New York for planning a 1990 robbery that ended in the murder of a police officer." The Times says that while the commutation "bypassed the typical federal process for seeking clemency," the case "is complex, and he was long championed by lawyers and relatives as a candidate for clemency." The Times adds that "amid a national push to reduce incarceration rates that disproportionately affect Black men, some experts and advocates said the case was remarkable only because such decisions have been too rare."

Trump's Pardon Of Bannon Enables Testimony Against Co-Defendants. The New York Times (1/26, Weiser, 20.6M) says that out of all of Trump's pardons "in the hours before he left office, perhaps none was as galling to his critics, government watchdog groups and even some of his allies as the pardon of his former chief strategist, Stephen K. Bannon," who was "charged with conspiring to swindle donors to a private fund to build a wall along the Mexican border, siphoning off more than $1 million for personal and other expenses, the indictment said." The Times adds Bannon's pardon "also left three other men who were indicted with Mr. Bannon in an unusual and unenviable predicament. None of them received pardons and so they still must face a trial in May. What's more, legal experts said, Mr. Bannon could now be called as a government witness to testify against them, potentially increasing their legal jeopardy."

Floyd Trial Judge Denies Request To Use Past Incidents Against Former Officers

USA Today (1/26, Hauck, 12.7M) reports Hennepin County Judge Peter Cahill in an order made public on Tuesday ruled "evidence related to 16 incidents involving former Minneapolis police officers charged in George Floyd's death, as well as evidence related to Floyd's prior arrest and conviction, cannot be brought up at trial." USA Today adds Cahill "did not explain his decision but said an opinion would follow."

Minneapolis Settles First Lawsuit Against Police Response To Floyd Protests The Minneapolis Star Tribune (1/26, Furst, 855K) reports the city of Minneapolis last week "settled the first lawsuit by a demonstrator injured by a police projectile in the aftermath of George Floyd's death." The Star Tribune says the City Council approved $57,900 payment to Graciela Cisneros, 22, who "suffered an eye injury when a police officer fired a projectile at her on May 29 as she and her partner were walking home after a demonstration," and her attorneys.

Biden To Reopen ACA Exchange Via Executive Order.

Reuters (1/26, Hunnicutt, Heavey) reports President Biden is "set to reopen the nation's online health insurance marketplace as soon as this week...offering Americans who cannot get coverage through their employers another way to obtain it." Reuters says Biden has "vowed to restore full access to the healthcare.gov site," which "was created by former President Barack Obama's sweeping 2010 Affordable Care Act." Reuters adds "the order to reopen the federal exchange, which is normally accessible for just six weeks a year, could come as soon as Thursday." Reuters adds the Biden Administration "has touted the move as necessary to fight the coronavirus pandemic and help Americans who have lost their insurance." The Wall Street Journal (1/26, Armour, Siddiqui, Subscription Publication, 8.41M) provides similar coverage.

Aetna To Expand Coverage For Gender-Affirming Surgeries.

The New York Times (1/26, Abelson, 20.6M) reports Aetna is now "agreeing to pay for breast augmentation for some trans women," though in order for the women to qualify, they "would need to demonstrate that they had persistent gender dysphoria, undergo a year of feminizing hormone therapy and have a referral from a mental health professional." According to the Times, "The shift by Aetna represents an important evolution in how health insurers view the medical needs of transgender individuals."

Federal Judge Temporarily Lifts Biden's Deportation Ban.

CBS News (1/26, Montoya-Galvez, 5.39M) reports on its website that on Tuesday, US District Judge Drew Tipton of the Southern District of Texas "temporarily halted the Biden administration's 100-day moratorium on certain deportations of immigrants already in the U.S." According to CBS, Tipton "agreed to pause the policy for at least 14 days while he considered a lawsuit filed by Texas' Republican attorney general, Ken Paxton, who argued in a complaint on Friday that the deportation freeze violated immigration law and a legal agreement the state brokered with the Trump administration before Mr. Biden took office." CBS reports that "on January 8, Ken Cuccinelli, who was then the second-in-command at the Department of Homeland Security, signed an agreement committing the department 'to consult Texas and consider its views' before changing policies governing the enforcement of federal immigration law."

The AP (1/26, Merchant) reports that Tipton said that while the nationwide order was not based on the agreement with the state, the Administration did not "provide any concrete, reasonable justification for a 100-day pause on deportations." The decision "is an early blow to the Biden administration, which has proposed far-reaching changes sought by immigration advocates," though the order only "bars enforcement of a moratorium for 14 days" and "does not require deportations to resume at their previous pace." The White House "issued a statement saying the moratorium was 'wholly appropriate'" and that the President "remains committed to taking immediate action to reform our immigration system." The Wall Street Journal (1/26, Hackman, Subscription Publication, 8.41M) reports that Tipton, a Trump appointee, said he will also consider whether to announce a preliminary injunction that would extend the ban beyond two weeks.

The Dallas Morning News (1/26, Briseno, Solis, 772K) reports that Tipton "said Texas had a 'substantial likelihood' of prevailing in two of its six claims," including that the moratorium "violated a federal immigration law" placing a 90-day timeframe on final deportation orders, as well as "the state's argument that Texas would be at significant risk of suffering imminent and irreparable harm if a temporary restraining order was not granted." An attorney for the ACLU of Texas, Kate Huddleston, called the lawsuit an attempt to "follow Trump's xenophobic policies" and said, "The administration's pause on deportations is not only lawful but necessary to ensure that families are not separated and people are not returned to danger needlessly." Fox News (1/26, Lea, 23.99M) reports on its website that "it is unclear" whether terms of the federal agreement with Texas "are enforceable, but similar agreements were struck with several other states under the former administration."

The Houston Chronicle (1/26, Goldenstein, 982K) reports that the "nationwide order marks Paxton's first win in what he's predicted will be a string of legal action against the Biden administration." The Chronicle calls the ruling "a bright spot...for Paxton," who tweeted, "Within 6 days of Biden's inauguration, Texas has HALTED his illegal deportation freeze. This was a seditious left-wing insurrection. And my team and I stopped it."

The New York Times (1/26, Jordan, 20.6M) reports, "Immigration advocates challenged many of Mr. Trump's policies in federal court, and the decision by Judge Tipton on Tuesday signaled that immigration hawks might also sue to stymie Mr. Biden's initiatives." Immigration lawyer Stephen Yale-Loehr said, "The court's order shows the uphill battle President Biden has in trying to reverse the prior administration's immigration restrictions. A single judge can halt a federal agency's effort to review and reprioritize its immigration enforcement policies." The Washington Post (1/26, Miroff, 10.52M) reports that Boston College of Law immigration scholar Kari Hong called the ruling "baffling" and said it "seems to invite states to be litigating matters of national policy, which is a slippery slope that will end in chaos."

WSJournal: Judge's Ruling Echoes Trump-Era Decisions. The Wall Street Journal (1/26, Subscription Publication, 8.41M) editorializes that the ruling is similar in nature to judicial decisions on former President Donald Trump's immigration policies, including his 2017 travel ban, but suggests that a nationwide injunction may not stand under a review of the legal arguments. However, the Journal says the decision is a blow to the Biden Administration's early raft of executive orders.

Wilkinson Overturns "Zero Tolerance" Trump-Era Immigration Policy.

The AP (1/26, Balsamo, Long) reports that Acting Attorney General Wilkinson on Tuesday "rescinded a Trump-era memo that established a 'zero tolerance' enforcement policy for migrants" crossing the US-Mexico border, which resulted "in thousands of family separations." The new memo was issued "to federal prosecutors across the nation, saying the department would return to its longstanding previous policy and instructing prosecutors to act on the merits of individual cases." The AP says that while the move "is in part symbolic, it undoes the Trump administration's massively unpopular policy responsible for the separation of more than 5,500 children from their parents" at the border.

Lawmakers Call On Biden To Protect Immigrants In Sanctuary.

The Boston Globe (1/26, Ulloa, 1.04M) reports that "more than two dozen congressional Democrats are asking President Biden to grant temporary protection from deportation to 40 immigrants living in houses of worship as part of his pledge of a new approach to immigration." Immigrant families in churches and synagogues "were initially granted so-called stays of removal during the Obama administration but became targets of federal immigration officials under President Trump." In a letter to the President, 27 lawmakers led by Sens. Ed Markey (D-MA) and Elizabeth Warren (D-MA), and Rep. Joaquin Castro (D-TX), wrote that "those in sanctuary have suffered enough. Your administration's actions can bring them the relief they need and deserve."

Appeals Court Considers Constitutionality Of Terrorism Screening Database.

The AP (1/26, Barakat) reports that the Fourth Circuit Court of Appeals on Tuesday "expressed concerns about ordering wholesale changes to" the Terrorism Screening Database, "a government watchlist of roughly 1 million individuals labeled as 'known or suspected terrorists,' despite a lower court finding that the list was constitutionally flawed." While government lawyers at the hearing "said the problems encountered by those on the list...were too insignificant to merit intervention," an attorney for the Council on American-Islamic Relations, Gadeir Abbas, cited examples of plaintiffs "being shackled and having guns pointed at them." Judge J. Harvie Wilkinson "suggested it might be better for individual plaintiffs to file suits based on their own experiences" and "questioned whether the judiciary branch was able or qualified to require revisions to a program that the government insists is vital to national security."

TSA Recovered Record Rate Of Firearms In 2020.

The Washington Post (1/26, 10.52M) reports, "The Transportation Security Administration said Tuesday that it detected twice as many firearms per million passengers at airport security checkpoints in 2020 than it did in 2019." The TSA "announced that it found about 10 firearms per million passengers screened last year, compared with about five firearms per million passengers screened a year earlier," though the overall "number of firearms found decreased – 3,257 in 2020 compared with a record 4,432 in 2019." However, "the rate per passenger was the highest since the agency was founded in 2001."

Capitol Hill Investigation Expands To 400 Suspects, 150 Charged.

The AP (1/26, Balsamo, Richer, Long) reports that a prevalence of social media activity among those who stormed Capitol Hill on January 6 "and their friends' willingness to turn them in has helped authorities charge about 150 people as of Monday with federal crimes." However, "investigators must still work rigorously to link the images to the vandalism and suspects to the acts...in order to prove their case in court," in addition to deploying agents to track suspects "because so few were arrested at the scene." As a result, "federal prosecutors are focusing on the most critical cases and the most egregious examples of wrongdoing" in order to save manpower and cost.

USA Today (1/26, 12.7M) reports that "the far-reaching investigation into the deadly Jan. 6 Capitol siege continues to grow, as more than 400 suspects have been identified by federal authorities who expect to bring sedition charges against some of those linked to the insurrection." The Acting Attorney for the District of Columbia Michael Sherwin said prosecutors "are working on" sedition cases, "adding that officials expected the investigations to 'bear fruit very soon.'" Sherwin said numbers of arrests are "growing by the hour" and "cases are moving at a very rapid clip." The Wall Street Journal (1/26, O'Brien, Viswanatha, Ailworth, Subscription Publication, 8.41M) reports that the investigation is shifting focus toward assembling cases that some rioters coordinated the attack, based on evidence from over 200,000 tips, public testimony, confidential sources, local news coverage, surveillance, grand jury subpoenas, and search warrants.

The Washington Post (1/26, Hsu, Weiner, Barrett, 10.52M) reports, "U.S. authorities have opened case files on at least 400 potential suspects and expect to bring sedition charges against some 'very soon' in the sprawling investigation into the Jan. 6 breach of the U.S. Capitol, officials said." Sherwin said that new arrests will likely "plateau" as investigations into "militia groups [and] individuals from different several states" continue. When "asked about the potential of related future violence," FBI Assistant Director Steven D'Antuono "said the FBI is 'determining if there are any viable leads we can follow.'"

Katrina Vanden Heuvel writes in the Washington Post (1/26, 10.52M) that President Biden's inauguration last week on the same steps that had been "overrun by insurrectionists" sent the message that "democracy had been tested, and democracy had prevailed." But, "it would be a mistake to think the fight to preserve and revive our flawed democracy concluded on Inauguration Day. In fact, it has only begun." Vanden Heuvel adds, "The Capitol siege was just the latest and most brazen instance of politicians leading efforts to delay democracy when it threatens their power – by suppressing the votes of political opponents, giving corporate funding undue influence over the people's representatives and structuring Congress so that favored factions can hold on to outsize power."

Capitol Investigators Intensify Probe Into Proud Boys. The New York Times (1/26, Feuer, Robles, 20.6M) reports, "The leadership of the Proud Boys has come under increased scrutiny as agents and prosecutors across the country try to determine how closely members of the far-right nationalist group communicated during the riot at the Capitol this month and to what extent they might have planned the assault in advance, according to federal law enforcement officials." Six members of the group have been charged so far, "including one of its top-ranking leaders, Joseph Biggs," an Army veteran who "led about 100 men on an angry march" into the Capitol building. Investigators

"have started executing a series of search warrants connected to the group, a federal law enforcement official said," particularly focused on group leaders Ethan Nordean and Eddie Block, who reportedly took video of Biggs and Nordean at the siege. Authorities "have also focused their attention" on Proud Boys leader Enrique Tarrio, "who was thrown out of the city by a judge the day before."

DC National Guard Commander Says Pentagon Tied His Hands Prior To January 6. The Washington Post (1/26, Sonne, 10.52M) reports that Maj. Gen. William J. Walker, the commanding general of the District of Columbia National Guard, says the Pentagon "restricted his authority ahead of the riot at the U.S. Capitol, requiring higher-level sign-off to respond that cost time as the events that day spiraled out of control." According to the Post, "Local commanders typically have the power to take military action on their own to save lives or prevent significant property damage in an urgent situation," but Walker "said the Pentagon essentially took that power and other authorities away from him ahead of a pro-Trump protest on Jan. 6.," which "meant he couldn't immediately roll out troops when he received a panicked phone call from the Capitol Police chief warning that rioters were about to enter the U.S. Capitol."

Acting Capitol Police Chief Apologizes For January 6 Failures. On the CBS Evening News (1/26, story 4, 1:35, O'Donnell, 4.76M), Kris Van Cleave reported that Acting Capitol Police Chief Yogananda Pittman made "a stunning admission" that "leaders knew days before the January 6 attack [that] armed militia groups and white supremacists were coming to Washington, with Congress as a target." Pittman "told lawmakers Capitol Police knew there was a strong potential for violence, but officers were still not properly armed and failed to adequately lock down the building." Rep. Tim Ryan (D-OH) said, "It's time to start figuring out why some of this intelligence information was not acted upon."

On ABC World News Tonight (1/26, story 8, 0:25, 7.57M), David Muir reported that Pittman issued "a formal apology...for failures during the deadly riots at the Capitol." Pittman testified "before Congress that police knew that militia groups and white supremacists would be there, and that there was strong potential for violence." Pittman also "says National Guard troops were requested two days before the riots, but that the request was rejected by their supervising board." Muir said that "one member of that board [is] denying the claim."

Politico (1/26, Zanona, 6.73M) reports that on Tuesday, Pittman "apologized to Congress for the security failures at the complex the day of the deadly Jan. 6 riots, acknowledging in an extraordinary statement that the department 'failed to meet its own high standards as well as yours.'" Politico says Pittman "also admitted that a Capitol police board denied a request on Jan. 4 for additional support from the National Guard," and it "wasn't until the building was overrun by a pro-Trump mob the panel relented, an hour after another plea was made."

USA Today (1/26, Duret, Mansfield, Penzenstadler, 12.7M) reports that despite a $54 million budget boost in February 2020, including an additional $7 million "to upgrade equipment and supplies," Capitol Police "were sent into the chaos" on January 6 "with little if any protective gear," raising "questions of how [they] could be overrun by a loosely knit group of far-right mob, other rioters and hangers on." Rep. Maxine Waters (D-CA) said, "They should've had everything they needed to protect the Capitol." While Pittman said in her testimony that the agency did not do enough to prepare, "she also expressed the belief that nothing could have prepared them to prevent a protest of that size overrunning the Capitol," which "was made to be open and welcoming to citizens."

The Wall Street Journal (1/26, Levy, Subscription Publication, 8.41M) reports that House Appropriations Chairwoman Rosa DeLauro said after the hearing, "It is now obvious that intelligence agencies had ample evidence an angry mob would descend on Washington, with Congress' meeting to certify the presidential election as the intended target. The law-enforcement agencies tasked with protecting the Capitol did not act on this intelligence or adequately prepare for the looming threat."

The Washington Post (1/26, Wagner, Itkowitz, Sonmez, 10.52M) reports that Pittman is "one of several officials testifying before members of the House Appropriations Committee about the events and decisions that led to rioters storming the Capitol on Jan. 6, and the steps that security outfits are taking to ensure such a breach is not repeated." The New York Times (1/26, Broadwater, Cochrane, Goldman, 20.6M) and Reuters (1/26) have more on the testimony.

Williams' Attorney Says FBI Did Not Recover Pelosi's Laptop. The Philadelphia Inquirer (1/26, Roebuck) reports that on Tuesday, A.J. Kramer, the public defender for Riley Williams, said during a hearing with US Magistrate Judge Zia Faruqui that the FBI did not recover House Speaker Pelosi's laptop after searching her car and apartment. Williams "surrendered to authorities last week, two days after they first accused her of stealing it in an attempt to sell it to the Russian security services." The Inquirer says, "It remains unclear whether Pelosi's laptop was ever in Williams' possession at all," after prosecutors said "she boasted about" taking the device "on the social media platform Discord." However, "they clarified that at this point they have only lodged charges against her for aiding and abetting the theft."

Oregon GOP Claims Siege Was A "False Flag" To "Discredit" Trump. The Washington Post (1/26, Peiser, 10.52M) reports that the Oregon Republican Party "isn't just backing former president Donald Trump – its official position falsely claims that the entire episode was a 'false flag' operation staged to discredit the GOP and silence Trump's supporters." The Oregon GOP last week "released a resolution passed by its executive committee that says the supposedly fake operation was meant to undermine Trump and give more power to President Biden, citing websites by John Solomon and the Trump-friendly Epoch Times." The Post says, "State Republican parties nationwide have been castigating members for opposing Trump, voting to impeach him and certifying Biden's victory."

Biden Issues Executive Orders Aimed At Racial Equity.

Politico (1/26, Niedzwiedek, 6.73M) reports that on Tuesday, President Biden "rolled out an additional slate of executive actions to address racial equity." Politico says Biden "directed the Department of Justice to not renew contracts with private prison operators and signed a presidential memorandum acknowledging the role the federal government has played in discriminatory housing policy." In addition, Biden is "instructing the Department of Housing and Urban Development to reassess moves implemented under former President Donald Trump, including making it harder for plaintiffs to meet the legal threshold for proving unintentional discrimination, known as the disparate impact rule." Biden "said that Tuesday's actions are a direct response to the groundswell of protests that emerged following the killing of George Floyd."

The Los Angeles Times (1/26, Stokols, 3.37M) says Biden "took action...to disavow another aspect of his predecessor's legacy – racial animus toward Asian Americans." One of Biden's orders "called for providing the Justice Department with additional guidance and resources to more accurately track hate crimes and harassment of Asian Americans." In his remarks, Biden "referred to an increase in xenophobic attacks against Asian Americans," which he said "is unacceptable and it's un-American." The Hill (1/26, Johnson, 5.69M) says the order "comes in response to former President Trump regularly referring to COVID-19 as the 'China virus,' which was widely criticized as xenophobic." Nancy Cordes reported on the CBS Evening News (1/26, story 2, 1:40, O'Donnell, 4.76M), "Since the pandemic started, advocacy groups have logged nearly 3,000 reports of racism and discrimination against Asian Americans."

The New York Times (1/26, Tankersley, Karni, 20.6M) says the orders "are incremental pieces of Mr. Biden's broader push for racial equity – an initiative that is expected to be a centerpiece of his administration and that follow an executive order last week directing federal agencies to review policies to root out systemic racism."

Reuters (1/26, Lynch, Hunnicutt) reports Biden "said he believes the vast majority of Americans believe in equality." Biden said, "We've never fully lived up to the founding principles of this nation – to state the obvious – that all people are created equal and have a right to be treated equally throughout their lives. ... And it's time to act now, not only because it's the right thing to do, but because if we do we'll all be better off for it." NBC Nightly News (1/26, story 5, 1:25, Holt, 6.26M) showed Biden saying, "I'm not promising we can end it tomorrow, but I promise you we're going to continue to make progress to eliminate systemic racism."

Bloomberg (1/26, 3.57M) reports White House Domestic Policy Council Director Susan Rice "said at a briefing earlier Tuesday that Biden also intends to address moves by Republican-led state legislatures to roll back voting expansions that contributed to Donald Trump's defeat." Rice said, "It's a matter of real concern because we ought to be in the business of encouraging and enabling all Americans who are eligible to vote, to be able to vote." In a separate story, Reuters (1/26) reports that Rice "said the White House would work with Congress on legislation to address voting rights."

USA Today (1/26, Groppe, Subramanian, Berry, 12.7M) reports Rice and the President "stressed that the equality agenda is not aimed solely at communities of color but is designed to help all marginalized communities, including people with disabilities, religious minorities, members of the LGBTQ community and anyone living in persistent poverty – whether in urban, rural or suburban areas."

Asked on CNN (1/26, 2.27M) whether the White House will pursue legislation on the executive orders, White House Office of Public Engagement Director Cedric Richmond said, "Yes, we want to put it in law. We want to work with the other side, both Republicans and Democrats, to make sure that we have that lasting, empowering transformational impact on Black and Brown and other marginalized communities." Richmond said on MSNBC (1/26, 2.78M), "For those things we can do by executive order, we're going to do by executive order because it's a priority. ... We're the first Administration to roll out a whole-of-government approach to racial equity, and it's going to create a very intentional movement by this Administration to make sure we tackle systemic racism across agencies and government-wide."

Cecilia Vega of ABC World News Tonight (1/26, story 6, 1:40, Muir, 7.57M) reported Biden "is trying to make good on a campaign pledge to address these issues of racial equity in this country," and the AP (1/26, Madhani) says Tuesday's actions "reflect [Biden's] efforts to follow through with campaign pledges to combat racial injustice," while the Washington Post (1/26, 10.52M) says they "reflected the extent to which Biden's ascent to the presidency was wrapped up with the nation's racial struggles." The Post adds that "activists are making it clear they expect more from Biden than a diverse administration and rhetoric about justice. Tuesday marked his first major effort to respond, to mixed reviews from civil rights groups." Axios (1/26, Contreras, 1.26M) describes Biden's orders as "a down payment on racial equity."

Biden To Impose "Wide-Ranging Moratorium" On Oil And Gas Leases.

The AP (1/26, Daly) reports that on Wednesday, President Biden will "announce a wide-ranging moratorium on new oil and gas leasing on U.S. lands, as his administration moves quickly to reverse Trump administration policies on energy and the environment and address climate change." According to the AP, "The move follows a 60-day suspension of new drilling permits for U.S. lands and waters announced last week and follows Biden's campaign pledge to halt new drilling on federal lands and end the leasing of publicly owned energy reserves as part of his plan to address climate change." The AP reports that "oil industry groups slammed the move, saying Biden had already eliminated thousands of oil and gas jobs by killing the Keystone XL oil pipeline on his first day in office."

Reuters (1/26, Volcovici, Resnick-Ault) reports that Biden's "orders will impact large swathes of acreage onshore in mostly Western states, as well as offshore drilling acreage located mainly in the U.S. Gulf of Mexico." However, "Tribal lands, which host significant reserves of oil and gas...will not be included in Biden's executive order." According to Reuters, "Biden's other climate-related executive orders on Wednesday will include beefing up the use of climate science in policy decisions and setting up an international summit on climate change for April." Reuters says "the push to end new federal drilling marks an easy target for the new administration: federal lands and waters produce roughly a quarter of the nation's oil and gas, and also account for around a quarter of its greenhouse gas emissions."

The Wall Street Journal (1/26, Puko, Restuccia, Subscription Publication, 8.41M) reports that Biden has targeted the oil and gas industry with this policy and with his revoking of the Keystone XL pipeline permit.

The New York Times (1/26, Davenport, Friedman, 20.6M) reports that as Biden readies to announce the policy, "powerful and surprising forces are arrayed at his back," listing automakers; "large oil and gas companies"; corporate shareholders; "and a youth movement." On the other side, the Times says, are "senators from fossil-fuel states in both parties," specifically "Joe Manchin III of West Virginia, who will lead the Senate Energy Committee."

Biden To Focus On Environmental Justice In Climate Plan. The Washington Post (1/26, Eilperin, Dennis, Fears, 10.52M) reports that Biden "plans to make tackling America's persistent racial and economic disparities a central part of his plan to combat climate change." To do that, "Biden will direct agencies across the federal government to invest in low-income and minority communities that have traditionally borne the brunt of pollution," and "will sign an executive order establishing a White House interagency council on environmental justice, create an office of health and climate equity at the Health and Human Services Department and form a separate environmental justice office at the Justice Department."

USA Today: US Should Follow Science In Tackling Climate Change. USA Today (1/26, 12.7M) in an editorial says that an interview with NIAID Director Fauci shows that "his informed advice for grappling with a growing pandemic was all but dismissed by a White House flirting with denialism." USA Today says that helped to lead to the level of COVID deaths, and that "same kind of fact-based, science-based approach is also needed to tackle climate change."

Nicolas Loris, Deputy Director of the Heritage Foundation's Roe Institute for Economic Policy Studies, writes in response at USA Today (1/26, 12.7M), "Climate change is real, and man-made emissions are indeed having an impact," but "many of the subsidies and regulations being proposed are costly and ineffective." Loris argues that "Biden's expected moratorium on new oil and natural gas leases and drilling permits on federal lands" would hurt "Western and Gulf Coast states," and "would result in less supply, fewer jobs and less revenue." It would also "buy a change in the Earth's temperature that's practically unnoticeable."

Colorado Delegation Asks Biden To Keep Space Command Headquarters In State.

The Denver Post (1/26, 660K) reports Colorado's entire congressional delegation asked the Biden Administration on Tuesday "to reconsider moving U.S. Space Command headquarters from Colorado Springs to Alabama." Two weeks ago, former President Donald Trump "said the agency's headquarters would move to Huntsville, Alabama, drawing bipartisan rebukes." The six Democrats and three Republicans in Colorado's delegation wrote in a letter Tuesday, "This move undermines our ability to respond to the threats in space and is disruptive to the current mission. ... Additionally, significant evidence exists that the process was neither fair nor impartial and that President Trump's political considerations influenced the final decision."

NYTimes Covers Decision To Include ASL Interpreter At White House Briefings.

The New York Times (1/26, Sullivan, 20.6M) reports that the Biden Administration "announced this week that it would include an American Sign Language interpreter in its daily press briefings, a step that the previous administration avoided taking until a court ordered it to do so late last year."

TV Ratings For Biden's Inaugural Exceeded Only By Reagan, Obama.

The AP (1/26, Bauder) reports that the television ratings for President Biden's inauguration were exceeded only by those of the first inaugurations of Presidents Ronald Reagan and Barack Obama. According to the Nielsen company "33.8 million people watched Biden's inauguration over 17 television networks between 10 a.m. and 4 p.m. last Wednesday." Reagan's inauguration in 1981 "drew 41.8 million viewers, and Obama's 2009 inaugural reached 37.8 million, Nielsen said." The AP adds that Biden "exceeded the 30.6 million who watched Donald Trump take office in 2017, Nielsen said."

Schumer Says Senate Can Organize After Filibuster Standoff.

CNBC (1/26, Pramuk, 7.34M) reports on its website that Senate Majority Leader Schumer on Tuesday cited what he described as "notable progress" in his discussions with Senate Minority Leader McConnell and said, "We're finally able to get the Senate up and running." According to CNBC, "a breakthrough did not come until two of the chamber's most conservative Democrats said they would vote against getting rid of the legislative filibuster." Sens. Joe Manchin (D-WV) and Kyrsten Sinema (D-AZ) have "said they would not vote to get rid of the filibuster, effectively ending the standoff."

Axios (1/26, Perano, 1.26M) says McConnell "on Tuesday condemned Democratic support for abolishing the legislative filibuster, arguing that it would" result in a "scorched-earth Senate." McConnell said on the Senate floor, "If your legislation can't pass the Senate, you don't scrap the rules or lower the standards. You improve your idea, take your case to the people, or both. ... Four years ago, Republicans had just won unified control. President Trump and others pressured us heavily, me in particular, to scrap this rule when it was protecting the Democratic minority. ... But we stood firm. I stood firm, endured many tweets on the subject. I said we would not do that to our colleagues in the minority. No short term policy win justifies destroying the Senate as we know it."

The New York Times (1/26, Hulse, 20.6M) says the skirmish over the filibuster "foreshadowed an epic battle ahead over what Democrats should do if Republicans obstruct President Biden's agenda." While McConnell "abandoned his insistence that Democrats commit to keeping the filibuster," his "surrender did not mollify progressive activists who have long clamored for Senate Democrats to curb the procedural weapon. They promised to keep the pressure on in their campaign to end the filibuster." The Times cites "several Democrats" who "said it was up to Mr. McConnell and his fellow Republicans to determine whether the filibuster comes under threat, arguing that if the minority party sought to block Mr. Biden's agenda at every turn, it would be at fault for destroying the storied Senate weapon."

Jamelle Bouie writes in the New York Times (1/26, 20.6M) that liberals "see the opportunity of the moment," while moderates "don't appear to be frustrated enough with gridlock and inaction to change the rules of the chamber." Bouie argues, "The first step toward victory is a government that can act." Moderate Democrats "can keep the filibuster if they want," but they should prepare for when voters decide "it would rather have the party that promises nothing and does nothing than the one that promises quite a bit but won't work to make any of it a reality."

Marc A. Thiessen writes in the Washington Post (1/26, 10.52M) that although Schumer said he will not allow Senate Republicans to "dictate to the Senate what we should do and how we should proceed," as minority leader, he "vigorously used the filibuster to do just that." Thiessen lists a range of measures Senate Democrats used the filibuster to block under Schumer, and argues they "should take stock of everything they delayed and derailed under Trump because of the filibuster – and then imagine all that and more being enacted by simple majority vote when Republicans regain control of Congress and the presidency, which they eventually will."

Schumer Lists Goals For Country, New York, Impeachment.

USA Today (1/26, Spector, 12.7M) reports when Senate Majority Leader Schumer "has always prided himself on balancing his national role with his state responsibilities, never seemingly finding a local issue too small to take on or a place to visit for one of his well-known Sunday press conferences." Now, he "ticks off a lengthy list of goals he has for New York, the nation and, of course, moving forward with an historic impeachment trial of ex-President Donald Trump." Schumer "will look to reach a deal with President Joe Biden, Republicans and the Democratic-led House on a $1.9 trillion stimulus package." In addition, he "has to guide the confirmation of Biden's cabinet members in advance of the Feb. 9 start of the impeachment trial." Also, "there are all the infrastructure projects that Schumer said he hopes to push through as majority leader."

CNN (1/26, Rogers, Raju, Barrett, 89.21M) says on its website that Schumer "will have to piece together a coalition from a diverse caucus to push legislation through the slow-moving chamber. Schumer, who has cut bipartisan deals in the past, will have to showcase those deal-cutting bonafides while keeping at bay restless liberals."

Leahy Sent Home From Hospital After Falling Ill.

The AP (1/26) reports Sen. Patrick Leahy (D-VT) "was taken to a hospital Tuesday evening after not feeling well and later sent home after tests, a spokesman said, hours after the 80-year-old Democrat began presiding over the impeachment trial of former President Donald Trump." The President Pro Tempore of the Senate, who had "been in his Capitol office, was taken to George Washington University Hospital 'out of an abundance of caution' after being examined by Congress' attending physician," a spokesman said.

The New York Times (1/26, Cochrane, Gold, 20.6M) reports Leahy "has received both vaccine shots for the coronavirus, and it was unclear what his symptoms were." The Burlington \(VT\) Free Press (1/26, 85K) reports Sen. Charles Grassley (R-IA), "who was the president pro tempore in the last Senate session as its most senior Republican, sent well wishes to his fellow octogenarian and colleague." Politico (1/26, Emma, 6.73M) and The Hill (1/26, Axelrod, 5.69M) also report.

Greene Called For Executing Democratic Politicians.

CNN (1/26, Steck, Kaczynski, 89.21M) reports on its website that Rep. Marjorie Taylor Greene (R-GA) "repeatedly indicated support for executing prominent Democratic politicians in 2018 and 2019 before being elected to Congress." She also "frequently posted far-right extremist and debunked conspiracy theories on her page." Greene had posted on her Facebook page that House Speaker Pelosi "is guilty of treason."

Forbes (1/26, Solender, 10.33M) cites CNN in reporting that, "Greene liked a Facebook comment from Jan. 2019 arguing 'a bullet to the head would be quicker' for removing [Pelosi], in addition to liking comments about executing FBI agents seen as working for the 'deep state.'" The Hill (1/26, Gangitano, 5.69M) adds that Everytown for Gun Safety is pushing Greene to resign "following reports that she expressed support for violence against Democrats before running for Congress."

Kudlow To Join Fox News, McEnany Still Under Consideration.

The AP (1/26, Bauder) reports, "Trump administration alumni Larry Kudlow is joining Fox News amid reports that a colleague, former White House press secretary Kayleigh McEnany, will soon be joining him." Kudlow, previously a "CNBC personality" before being national economic council director for Trump, "will host a weekday program on the Fox Business Network and be a commentator across all of Fox's platforms." McEnany "worked at CNN before joining Trump," and has reported that "she had an employment agreement with Fox News." But according to Fox, McEnany "is not a Fox employee." Reuters (1/26, Richwine) reports on Kudlow's hiring and adds that "Fox...has held talks with" McEnany "about a possible on-air role."

The New York Times (1/26, Grynbaum, 20.6M) reports, "This is the first major television gig secured by a senior Trump aide who stayed in the White House until the president's term ended" and "is also something of a hiring coup for Fox Business." About McEnany, the Times adds that Fox said that "it remains open to hiring Ms. McEnany at a later date." Politico (1/26, Forgey, 6.73M) also reports the news.

WPost Executive Editor Baron Announces February Retirement.

The AP (1/26, Bauder) reports, "Washington Post Executive Editor Marty Baron, who has led the resurgent newspaper as it nearly doubled its staff in eight years," announced on Tuesday "that he will retire at the end of February."

The New York Times (1/26, Robertson, Tracy, 20.6M) reports Baron "led The Washington Post, The Boston Globe and The Miami Herald to numerous Pulitzer Prizes." Baron, 66, said he will retire February 28. The Washington Post (1/26, Farhi, 10.52M) says Baron is "one of the most highly regarded editors in American journalism and an outspoken advocate of the value of a free press."

All But Five GOP Senators Vote To Declare Trump Impeachment Trial Unconstitutional.

Lester Holt reported on NBC Nightly News (1/26, story 4, 1:20, 6.26M), "The impeachment trial of former President Trump is moving forward, but there's already a major new signal tonight that there are not enough votes for a conviction." NBC's Peter Alexander reported there was "an early blow to Democrats' hopes of a conviction" on Tuesday, with "just five Republicans voting with them that an impeachment trial of the former president is constitutional." Sen. Rand Paul (R-KY): "Democrats are wasting the nation's time on a partisan vendetta against a man no longer in office. It's almost as if they have no ability to exist except in opposition to Donald Trump." Alexander: "Democrats firing back." Senate Majority Leader Schumer: "It is clearly and certainly constitutional to hold a trial for a former official."

Rachel Scott said on ABC World News Tonight (1/26, story 3, 3:10, Muir, 7.57M) that Paul "forc[ed] senators to vote on whether the trial itself is unconstitutional, since Trump is already out of office." Paul: "This is not the trial of a president, but of a private citizen." Scott: "Democrats and many legal experts insist the Constitution does not exempt former presidents from impeachment. ... Still, today, nearly all the Republican senators, 45 of them, voted that the trial is unconstitutional." Kris Van Cleave said on the CBS Evening News (1/26, story 5, 0:50, O'Donnell, 4.76M), "With so many Republicans, including Mitch McConnell, moving to dismiss the trial, it makes it pretty clear Mr. Trump will be acquitted next month."

The AP (1/26, Mascaro, Jalonick) reports that "while the Republicans did not succeed in ending the trial before it began, the test vote made clear that Trump still has enormous sway over his party. ... Many Republicans have criticized Trump's role" in the January 6 Capitol "attack – before which he told his supporters to 'fight like hell' to overturn his defeat – but most of them have rushed to defend him in the trial." Senate Minority Whip Thune said, "I think this was indicative of where a lot of people's heads are."

The New York Times (1/26, Fandos, 20.6M) writes, "Senators could yet change their views. But for now, the vote signaled the likelihood that Mr. Trump would for the second time in a year be acquitted by the Senate in an impeachment trial. ... It would take two thirds of senators – 67 votes – to attain a conviction, meaning 17 Republicans would have to cross party lines to side with Democrats in finding him guilty." USA Today (1/26, Behrmann, 12.7M) also says the vote "suggests a lack of support for convicting Trump on the charge of inciting insurrection," while the Washington Post (1/26, DeBonis, 10.52M) says the "largely partisan vote indicated that, nearly three weeks after the Capitol attack, much of the GOP anger over Trump's actions immediately before and during the siege has faded."

The Los Angeles Times (1/26, 3.37M) reports Sens. Susan Collins (R-ME), Lisa Murkowski (R-AK), Mitt Romney (R-UT), Ben Sasse (R-NE), and Pat Toomey (R-PA) "joined Democrats against the Paul measure. ... Though many more GOP lawmakers have condemned Trump's actions in inciting the Jan. 6 attack on the U.S. Capitol, the party has largely coalesced around the idea that an impeachment trial of a former president is unconstitutional." Politico (1/26, Desiderio, Everett, 6.73M) says that view "has been strongly challenged by legal scholars across the political spectrum."

Roll Call (1/26, McPherson, 130K) reports Collins said after the vote, "It's pretty obvious from the vote today that it is extraordinarily unlikely that [Trump] will be convicted. Just do the math." Axios (1/26, Treene, 1.26M) reports Collins and Sen. Tim Kaine (D-VA) "are privately pitching their colleagues on a bipartisan resolution censuring former President Trump," according to "three sources familiar with the discussions."

Chief of Staff Klain said on CNN (1/26, 2.74M), "The reality is that the Senate has to do its constitutional duty. It has to hold this trial. Our focus...is on how we can get work done around that."

The Wall Street Journal (1/26, Subscription Publication, 8.41M) says in an editorial that while there are fair arguments on both sides of the issue of constitutionality, Tuesday's vote showed that Trump is all but certain to be acquitted if the trial proceeds, and that pressing forward would be purely political on the part of Democrats – and could backfire by firing up Trump and his supporters. However, the Washington Post (1/26, 10.52M) says in an editorial that the theory that a former president cannot be impeached "runs against the weight of scholarship, historical practice and common sense. Many Republicans may be embracing the theory nonetheless because it gives them an excuse to avoid any responsibility: They do not have to condone the former president's incitement of the Jan. 6 Capitol invasion, but they also do not have to anger his supporters."

Jennifer Rubin writes in the Washington Post (1/26, 10.52M) that the "flock of Republicans [who] now declare that convicting a president for sedition after he left office is 'unconstitutional'" are "wrong." The House and Senate "have previously determined that they retain power to proceed against an executive branch official that has resigned from office." In addition, their "empty objection to the trial on the grounds that it would set a 'dangerous precedent' has it backward. Allowing a president to attempt sedition for the purposes of retaining office with absolutely no penalty would be as frightening an invitation as one could imagine to future presidents and their enablers."

In an op-ed for the Washington Post (1/26, 10.52M), Nancy Gibbs, Director of the Shorenstein Center on Media, Politics and Public Policy at Harvard's Kennedy School of Government, that if the Senate fails to convict former President Trump, lawmakers "can effectively disqualify him from ever running again and broadly serve the common good" by "hardening norms into laws." Gibbs argues party nominees for president "should be required to release their tax returns to the Federal Election Commission or some bipartisan body that can look them over."

Reuters (1/26), the Wall Street Journal (1/26, Hughes, Wise, Subscription Publication, 8.41M), the New York Post (1/26, Bowden, 7.45M), The Hill (1/26, Carney, 5.69M), and the CNN (1/26, Foran, Raju, Barrett, 89.21M) and Fox News (1/26, 23.99M) websites are among the other outlets covering the vote.

I just got elected barely two years ago. There’s a lot of work to do, and I look forward to continuing to fight for Missouri every day that I can.”

WSJournal: “Buy American” Rules Will Increase Delays, Costs For Public Works Projects.

A Wall Street Journal (1/26, Subscription Publication, 8.41M) editorial says the biggest difference between President Biden’s “Buy American” rules and those of former President Donald Trump is bureaucracy. Federal agencies can grant waivers to procurement rules if it is in “the public interest.” Under Trump, agencies granted such waivers generously. Biden is creating an office in OMB to examine all waiver requests and post them for public review, which means agencies will have to be vetted by the White House, unions, and lawmakers. The Journal says the result will be increased costs and delays in public works projects.

WSJournal Calls For Repeal Of Electoral Count Act.

In an editorial, the Wall Street Journal (1/26, Subscription Publication, 8.41M) urges Congress to repeal the Electoral Count Act of 1887, arguing it is at odds with federalism and the separation of powers because it allows Congress to meddle in state decisions by disqualifying electors.

Elizabeth Dole Lauds Relaunching Of Joining Forces Initiative.

Former Sen. Elizabeth Dole (R-NC) writes at Military.com (1/26, 269K), “The military community rightly heralded First Lady Jill Biden’s recent announcement that she will re-launch Joining Forces – the initiative she co-founded in 2011 with then-First Lady Michelle Obama to unite the nation behind those who serve. The return of Joining Forces will not only strengthen a military community strained by the demands of maintaining national security during a global pandemic, it will serve as a reminder of what we can accomplish as a nation if we rediscover our ability to work together. ... At a time when so many of us have been left to wonder what can heal our country’s hardening divisions, Dr. Biden is poised to show us.”

Dr. Biden reached out to us in that spirit.” Lamont “said she had met several of her contemporaries in recent years at National Governors Association events, and the subtext of problem-solving was a familiar one.” She said, “Dr. Biden reached out in that spirit, reminding us that you are all passionate about helping people. She was very inclusive. It was very positive, with a message of unity.”

IMF Raises Global Growth Outlook For 2021, Says “Exceptional Uncertainty” Remains.

Reuters (1/26, Shalal) reports the IMF on Tuesday “raised its forecast for global economic growth in 2021 and said the coronavirus-triggered downturn last year – the biggest peacetime contraction since the Great Depression – would be nearly a full percentage point less severe than expected.” The Fund “said multiple vaccine approvals and the start of vaccinations in some countries had boosted hopes of an eventual end to the pandemic that has now infected nearly 100 million people and claimed the lives of more than 2.1 million globally.” However, the IMF “warned that the world economy continued to face ‘exceptional uncertainty’ and new waves of COVID-19 infections and variants posed risks, and global activity would remain well below pre-COVID-19 projections made one year ago.”

The AP (1/26, Wiseman), The New York Times (1/26, Rappeport, 20.6M), The Wall Street Journal (1/26, Kiernan, Subscription Publication, 8.41M), Bloomberg (1/26, Martin, 3.57M), CNBC (1/26, Amaro, 7.34M), MarketWatch (1/26, Robb, 2.64M), Fox Business (1/26, Henney, 3.06M), and The Hill (1/26, Elis, 5.69M) also report.

IMF Official Says Fund Supports US Minimum Wage Increase For Poverty Reduction.

Reuters (1/26, Shalal) reports the IMF “supports an increase in the U.S. federal minimum wage to reduce poverty and inequality, but sees an argument for phasing the higher rate in slowly to gauge the impact on employment, the IMF’s chief economist said on Tuesday.” Gita Gopinath “told Reuters in an interview” that the US “was still in an ‘emergency situation’ with regard to the pandemic, and should accelerate vaccinations and testing, as well as targeted support to households and businesses.”

ECB Official Assess Whether Differences With Fed Policy Boost Euro.

Bloomberg (1/26, Radow, 3.57M) reports ECB policymakers “have agreed to look deeper into the euro’s appreciation against the dollar since the start of the pandemic, focusing on whether it’s driven by differences in stimulus policies compared with the U.S., according to officials familiar with the matter.” The review “could shape how the ECB responds to an issue that has alarmed policy makers, who worry that the euro’s strength over the past year depresses inflation that is already below zero. That could force the central bank to provide more monetary stimulus, even as it acknowledges mounting risks to financial stability.” The ECB Governing Council “noted during last week’s meeting how an increase in U.S. market interest rates in recent months failed to propel dollar gains, the officials said.”

Kerry Plans For US To Resume Leadership Role Against Climate Change.

The AP (1/26, Knickmeyer) reports climate envoy John Kerry “is talking the U.S. back into a leading role in global climate action, making clear the nation isn’t just revving up its own efforts to reduce oil, gas and coal pollution but that it intends to push everyone in the world to do more, too.” According to the AP, “Kerry’s diplomatic efforts match the fast pace of domestic climate directives by the week-old Biden administration, which created the job Kerry now holds.” However, the AP adds Kerry faces domestic “pushback from the oil and gas industry” and there is international “uncertainty about whether Biden’s climate commitments can survive the United States’ intensely divided politics, let alone the next presidential transition,” but “environmentalists are pushing him to be aggressive – even demonstrating outside his house on his first full day on the job.”

Biden Administration To Review Sanctions On ICC Officials.

Reuters (1/26, Lewis) reports a State Department spokesman on Tuesday announced the Biden Administration “will ‘thoroughly review’ U.S. sanctions on International Criminal Court officials imposed over investigations into U.S. forces in Afghanistan.” Reuters says the Trump Administration last year “accused the Hague-based tribunal of infringing on U.S. national sovereignty when it authorized an investigation into war crimes committed by Afghan forces, the Taliban or U.S. troops.”

Beijing Announces South China Sea Drills In Wake Of US Carrier Group’s Entry.

Reuters (1/26) reports that on Tuesday, the Chinese government “said...it will conduct military exercises in the South China Sea this week, just days after Beijing bristled at a U.S. aircraft carrier group’s entry into the disputed waters.” According to Reuters, “A U.S. carrier group led by the USS Theodore Roosevelt entered the South China Sea on Saturday to promote ‘freedom of the seas,’ the U.S. military said, days after Joe Biden began his term as president.” Reuters says “the U.S. military has steadily increased its activities there in recent years as China asserts its territorial claims in the area in conflict with neighbouring countries including Vietnam, Malaysia, the Philippines, Brunei and Taiwan.”

Taiwanese Jets Demonstrate Readiness To Repel Chinese Attack. Reuters (1/26, Lee) reports, “Armed and ready to go, Taiwan air force jets screamed into the sky on Tuesday in a drill to simulate a war scenario, showing its fleet’s battle readiness after dozens of Chinese warplanes flew into the island’s air defence zone over the weekend.” Reuters says Taiwan “has been on edge since the large-scale incursion by Chinese fighters and nuclear-capable bombers into the southwestern part of its air defence identification zone on Saturday and Sunday, which coincided with a U.S. carrier group entering the South China Sea.” Reuters goes on to report that the government of China

"has provided no public explanation for what its aircraft were doing at the weekend." Reuters says the Biden Administration "responded by calling on China to cease pressuring Taiwan and reaffirming its commitment to the democratic island."

Merkel Rejects Biden's Call For Anti-China Coalition. Under the headline "Merkel Sides With Xi On Avoiding Cold War Blocs," Politico Europe (1/26, 15K) reports that on Tuesday, German Chancellor Angela Merkel "rejected calls for Europe to pick sides between the U.S. and China, in a nod to the plea made by Chinese President Xi Jinping a day earlier." Politico says the Biden Administration is "looking to group together democracies to contain China," but Merkel was "pointedly wary about the formation of factions." Speaking to the World Economic Forum, Merkel said, "I would very much wish to avoid the building of blocs. I don't think it would do justice to many societies if we were to say this is the United States and over there is China and we are grouping around either the one or the other. ... The Chinese president spoke yesterday, and he and I agree on that. We see a need for multilateralism."

New Delhi Farmers Protest Turns Violent.

The New York Times (1/26, Mashal, Schmall, Kumar, 20.6M) reports, "Thousands of protesting farmers poured into New Delhi on Tuesday, using their tractors to pull apart barricades and challenging government forces who fired tear gas, blocked internet access and charged demonstrators with bamboo sticks to bring some order to a capital that felt under siege." The demonstration, which has resulted in at least one death, "was the most violent escalation in two months of general peaceful protests that have tested the government of Prime Minister Narendra Modi in unprecedented ways."

Biden And Putin Discuss Extending Last Remaining Nuclear Arms Deal.

Reuters (1/26, Hunnicutt, Holland) reports President Biden on Tuesday spoke to Russian President Vladimir Putin "for the first time since taking office and raised concerns about Russian activities including the treatment of jailed Kremlin critic Alexei Navalny." White House Press Secretary Jen Psaki "announced the phone call between the two leaders at her daily briefing," and she revealed topics "included Biden's proposal to extend the New START nuclear arms treaty with Russia for five years and 'strong [US] support for Ukraine sovereignty' in the face of ongoing Russian aggression." In addition, Biden "also voiced concern about the massive Solar Winds cyber hack blamed on Russia and reports that Russians offered bounties to Taliban insurgents for killing U.S. troops in Afghanistan."

The Washington Post (1/26, Wagner, Itkowitz, Sonmez, 10.52M) reports the Kremlin "had a slightly different readout of the call" than the White House, "saying in a statement that the two leaders had discussed...cooperation on the coronavirus pandemic, trade and economic matters." According to the Post, "The Kremlin mentioned 'the Ukraine domestic settlement' but none of the hot-button issues listed by the White House. It said the two leaders discussed President Donald Trump's withdrawal from the Open Skies agreement and the preservation of the Iran nuclear deal."

USA Today (1/26, Shesgreen, 12.7M) says Biden and Putin "have a long history of engagement – much of it frosty," while CNN (1/26, Liptak, 89.21M) reports on its website that the call "amounted to Biden's opening bid at diplomacy with one of his chief adversaries, whom he has met previously but not dealt with as an equal."

The New York Times (1/26, Troianovski, 20.6M) characterizes the call as "the opening act of what promises to be a deeply adversarial relationship between the two leaders, and most likely the sharpest turn in American foreign policy since...Trump left office one week ago." On ABC World News Tonight (1/26, story 6, 1:40, 7.57M), David Muir concurred that the call "signal[s] a very different tone than what we saw with...Trump."

Fox News (1/26, McFall, 23.99M) reports on its website that Biden had "accused his predecessor of being weak on Russia, calling Trump 'Putin's puppy' during the first presidential debate last year, criticizing him for not taking decisive action after reports surfaced regarding bounties placed on American soldiers in Afghanistan." Fox News adds that Biden also confirmed the US stance "on supporting Ukraine's sovereignty, condemned the poisoning of Russian opposition leader Aleksei Navalny."

According to Politico (1/26, Leonard, 6.73M), "Biden's agenda for his call with Putin struck a decidedly different tone than...Trump, who was the subject of significant criticism for his relatively soft rhetoric toward Russia, especially relative to his broader America-first approach to foreign policy." On the CBS Evening News (1/26, story 2, 1:40, O'Donnell, 4.76M), Nancy Cordes said the discussion of "Russian hacking and interference in the 2020 election" were "the kind of topics Mr. Trump was often reluctant to discuss with his Russian counterpart." Reuters (1/26, Gardner, Hunnicutt) reports Psaki "said on Tuesday that...Biden continues to believe the Nord Stream 2 natural gas pipeline is a bad deal for Europe," and "the Biden administration will be reviewing measures, which have been taken to date relating to the pipeline."

However, the AP (1/26, Lemire) says Biden and Putin "on a positive note...agreed to have their teams work urgently to complete an extension of New START, the last remaining U.S.-Russian arms control treaty, before it expires next month." According to the AP, Biden has "looked to establish a break from the warm rhetoric often displayed toward Putin by" Trump, but is also "looking to preserve room for diplomacy." Reuters (1/26, Tétrault-Farber, Hunnicutt) reports the Kremlin "said Putin and Biden "expressed satisfaction" that diplomatic notes between the two nations had been exchanged earlier on Tuesday confirming the pact would be extended and that procedures required for the pact to come into force before it expires would be completed in the coming days."

The AP (1/26, Isachenkov) says the treaty, which was "signed in 2010 by President Barack Obama and Russian President Dmitry Medvedev, limits each country to no more than 1,550 deployed nuclear warheads and 700 deployed missiles and bombers, and envisages sweeping on-site inspections to verify compliance." The AP adds that during the 2020 campaign, Biden "indicated...he favored the preservation of the New START treaty, which was negotiated during his tenure as U.S. vice president."

Citing "US officials," the AP (1/26) reports that the Russian government "reached out last week to request the call." The AP says Biden "agreed but wanted first to prepare with his staff and speak with European allies, including the leaders of Britain, France and Germany." Bloomberg (1/26, Parker, Wadhams, 3.57M) says that although the call "took place before Biden has spoken with leaders of several allied nations, underscoring the importance that he attaches to confronting the challenge from Russia," Biden on Tuesday also spoke with NATO Secretary General Jens Stoltenberg "in another signal aimed at showing U.S. unity with its allies against Russia," and they "discussed 'dealing with a more assertive Russia,' the North Atlantic Treaty Organization said in a statement." The Wall Street Journal (1/26, Thomas, Subscription Publication, 8.41M) provides similar coverage.

Navalny Ally Pledges To Continue To Seek Release. The AP (1/26, Litvinova) reports Lyubov Sobol, "a top ally of Alexei Navalny," on Tuesday "vowed...to keep up the fight to free the jailed Russian opposition leader and his battle to influence this year's parliamentary election despite a government crackdown on nationwide protests and its attempts to create a climate of fear." The AP adds Sobol, a "lawyer and politician," told reporters that Navalny's Foundation for Fighting Corruption "and his team's regional offices will continue to operate even amid the 'arrests of our followers and allies, open criminal probes (and) criminal probes that are yet to come.'" Meanwhile, the Wall Street Journal (1/26, Grove, Kantchev, Subscription Publication, 8.41M) says the protests over Navalny's arrest appear to be coalescing into a broader opposition movement against the Russian government.

David Ignatius writes in the Washington Post (1/26, 10.52M) that Navalny is "the most potent political threat that...Putin has ever faced." His "battle with Putin presents an early test for President Biden and his foreign policy team." While the Administration "called for Navalny's release" from prison, in an interview, Leonid Volkov, the manager of Navalny's 2018 presidential campaign, "argued that the United States should do more, working with European countries to identify and freeze assets held outside Russia for Putin's benefit."

Administration Restores Relations With Palestinians.

The AP (1/26, Lederer) reports that on Tuesday, the Biden Administration "announced...it was restoring relations with the Palestinians and renewing aid to Palestinian refugees, a reversal of the Trump administration's cutoff and a key element of its new support for a two-state solution to the decades-old conflict between Israelis and Palestinians." The AP says Acting US Ambassador to the UN Mills "made the announcement of Biden's approach to a high-level Security Council meeting, saying the new U.S. administration believes this 'remains the best way to ensure Israel's future as a democratic and Jewish state while upholding the Palestinians' legitimate aspirations for a state of their own and to live with dignity and security.'"

Bloomberg (1/26, 3.57M) quotes Mills as saying, "President Biden has been clear in his intent to restore US assistance programs that support economic development and humanitarian aid for the Palestinian people, and to take steps to reopen diplomatic missions that were closed by the last US Administration." According to Bloomberg, at the UN Security Council on Tuesday, Mills "said the U.S. will emphasize humanitarian issues, especially in Gaza, and seek to create the atmosphere needed for eventual peace talks, even as he conceded that Israel and the Palestinian leadership remain far apart for any immediate progress to be made." Reuters (1/26) reports that also on Tuesday, White House Press Secretary Jen Psaki indicated that Biden "believes a two-state solution is the only way forward for peace between Israel and the Palestinians."

However, the New York Times (1/26, Crowley, 20.6M) reports analysts "and regional leaders say the prospects of an Israeli-Palestinian peace agreement are dimmer than they have been in decades." According to the Times, "The parties have all but ceased communications, Palestinian leaders summarily rejected a peace plan offered by the Trump White House last year, and the issue is not among Mr. Biden's top foreign policy priorities."

Austin Planning To Review Trump's Withdrawal Of Troops From Afghanistan, Iraq.

The Wall Street Journal (1/26, Lubold, Youssef, Subscription Publication, 8.41M) reports Defense Secretary Austin will review former President Trump's decision to withdraw more than 3,000 US troops from Afghanistan and Iraq prior to leaving office, according to defense officials. However, Austin's spokesman, John Kirby, "said officials hadn't yet made a formal decision to review troop levels in either country."

In an op-ed for the Washington Post (1/26, 10.52M), Afghan Ambassador to the US Roya Rahmani writes that while "progress is being made on peace," Afghanistan "has experienced unprecedented levels of violence since the U.S.-Taliban agreement was signed last year. Although peace talks are ongoing in Doha, Qatar,, the Afghan people have not seen peace manifest on the ground." Rahmani adds, "The Biden administration will have to grapple with this stark reality as they formulate their policy in Afghanistan." She argues that the US "must make the bold decision to hold the Taliban accountable for its egregious violations of the agreement and fully commit to the U.S.-Afghan partnership."

Yemenis Submit Petition Seeking Redress For US Drone Strikes.

The Washington Post (1/26, Ryan, Mekhennet, 10.52M) reports the families of at least 34 Yemenis "alleged to have been killed in American military actions have asked an international human rights body to determine whether the deaths were unlawful, in a case that could draw attention to the human cost of overseas counterterrorism campaigns." Per the Post, "The petition, the first of its kind to be submitted to the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights, asserts that six drone strikes and one Special Operations raid targeting Yemen's al-Bayda governorate during the Obama and Trump administrations inflicted catastrophic damage on two families." The Post adds the filing "provides new visibility into a counterterrorism campaign that has mostly been shrouded in secrecy, as American military and intelligence officials conduct an extended effort against al-Qaeda in the Arabian Peninsula (AQAP) and other militant threats.”

According to Bloomberg, "Tenants in rent-stabilized units owe at least $1 billion in rent and wealthier ones are fleeing the city, leaving behind vacancies and pushing newly-built luxury towers into foreclosure."

Industry Mourns The Passing Of PennyMac's Stanford Kurland.

HousingWire (1/26, 7K) reports PennyMac Mortgage Investment Trust "announced that company founder and Non-Executive Chairman Stanford Kurland died at age 68 due to complications from COVID-19. Kurland had also been battling brain cancer." Industry leaders called him an "esteemed industry leader, visionary, and friend."

Zillow: US Housing Market Gained $2.5T In Value In 2020, The Largest Yearly Gain In 15 Years.

National Mortgage Professional (1/26) says the US housing market "gained nearly $2.5 trillion in value for 2020, the most in a single year since 2005, according to" a report from Zillow, amid surging demand, low interest rates, and the quickest pace of sales Zillow has ever recorded. According to NMP, "With inventory being swallowed up, the homes that were left on the market saw large price hikes. Zillow also noted that the Millennial generation aged into prime first-time homebuying age." Zillow economist Treh Mahertz explained, "While many [Americans] faced financial hardships because of the pandemic, others fortunate enough to maintain stable income took a step back to contemplate what they wanted their home to be and hopped on Zillow to help find a place that filled their wish list. Builder confidence, perhaps in reaction to the boosted demand, hit record highs and more homes are being built as a result."

FHFA House Price Index Up 11% YoY In November, Accelerating From October.

The Wall Street Journal (1/26, Friedman, Subscription Publication, 8.41M) reports the FHFA on Tuesday reported that US house prices climbed 11% in November from a year earlier. Reuters (1/26, Mutikani) reports that YoY price growth accelerated, with November's gain following a 10.3% YoY increase in prices in October. Potentially behind a paywall, Bloomberg (1/26, Giammona, 3.57M) reports house prices were up 1% from October on a month-to-month basis.

HousingWire (1/26, 7K) reports the 10-city composite price index "checked in at 8.8% year-over-year, and it was also up from 7.6% in October." Meanwhile, the 20-city composite "showed a 9.1% year-over-year gain, and was also up from 8.0% in October." CoreLogic Deputy Chief Economist Selma Happ said, "With buyer demand continuing to outpace the previous year's levels amid historically lowest inventory of for-sale homes, the pressure on home prices is going to fuel home price growth in the first half of 2021."

Mortgage News Daily (1/26) reports, "FHFA's HPI is based on the sales prices of homes financed by the GSEs Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac. The index was benchmarked at 100 in January 1991 and was at 310.1 in November compared to 307.0 in October." According to Dr. Lynn Fisher, FHFA's Deputy Director of the Division of Research and Statistics, "House prices have risen by at least one percent for six consecutive months. The acceleration has been slowing but annual gains now outpace the prior housing boom. Current conditions can be explained by fundamentals, including low rates and tight housing supply, which have been intensified by the pandemic."

In its coverage of the FHFA and Case-Shiller indices, MarketWatch (1/26, Passy, 2.64M) reports, "While there may be evidence that demand among home buyers is waning from the heights reached this summer – as evidenced by lower mortgage application volumes – it still remains very strong. Plus, the supply of homes for sales is all but exhausted. The lack of inventory should continue to fuel home-price increases for foreseeable future, especially in popular markets such as Phoenix and Boise, Idaho." However, MarketWatch says, "with mortgage rates potentially rising in the months to come, high home prices will threaten to push many prospective buyers out of the market."

Crain's New York Business (1/26, 230K) carries Bloomberg's coverage.

Analysis: Refinancing Can Save Borrowers Tens Of Thousands, But They Should Be Aware Of GSE Adverse Market Refi Fee.

A Credible piece carried by MarketWatch (1/26, 2.64M) provides readers with an overview of the potential benefits of refinancing as mortgage rates "keep sinking." According to the piece, however, "As of Dec. 1, 2020, Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac (the two agencies that buy most of the mortgages in the U.S) will start charging a new adverse market refinance fee of 50 basis points (0.500%). The fee is meant to help with many of the expenses Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac sustained because of Covid-19's economic impact. Refinance loans that are over $125,000 are subject to this new fee, while refinance loans equal to or less than $125,000 are exempt."

Cybersecurity

How The SolarWinds Hack Happened.

CNBC (1/26, 7.34M) reports in a video that, "in December, cybersecurity firm FireEye discovered that it had been compromised by a sophisticated hack." SolarWinds, an IT firm that FireEye used, "was the victim of a supply-chain attack that gave hackers access to potentially thousands of targets, including FireEye." A separate CNBC (1/26, Howard, 7.34M) report adds that Microsoft, Google and several US government agencies "were among those compromised by the intrusion." Jacob Williams, founder of Rendition InfoSec, said, "What's unique about this or special about this particular intrusion is that they use the access they got by compromising SolarWinds itself to insert malware into the build process. This then allowed them to target SolarWinds [and] customers that deployed this back door update." The repercussions of the SolarWinds hack "are still being unraveled."

Vaccine Distribution Creates Cybersecurity Risks.

The Washington Post (1/26, Riley, 10.52M) reports in its 'Cybersecurity 202' column that security experts and government officials are "bracing for a wave of cyberattacks targeting the coronavirus vaccine distribution process." The complex supply chain "behind making and delivering vaccines is creating a plethora of opportunities for hackers." The attacks could be "from criminal hackers motivated by financial incentives or nation-states looking to cause economic and civil disruption."

North Korea Using Hackers To Infiltrate Cybersecurity Researchers.

Bloomberg (1/26, Mehrotra, 3.57M) reports hackers from North Korea have "embarked on a sweeping intelligence gathering campaign aimed at cybersecurity researchers who hunt for vulnerabilities in corporate networks." According to Google, the North Korean government "mounted a social engineering operation for several months in hopes of engaging with the researchers." According to a Monday blog post by Google's Threat Analysis Group, essential to the attack were "several research blogs, YouTube videos, LinkedIn profiles and chat groups used by the hackers to build credibility in the hopes of duping the researchers." CNBC (1/26, 7.34M) reports Google announced that its Threat Analysis Group "has identified an ongoing campaign targeting security researchers working on vulnerability research and development at different companies and organizations." It attributed the campaign "to a government-backed entity based in North Korea." Forbes (1/26, Brewster, 10.33M) reports Google "says North Korean hackers have been masquerading as cybersecurity bloggers in order to target researchers in the field." They're doing so by "exploiting mysterious weaknesses in computers running the most up-to-date versions of Microsoft Windows and Google Chrome." Adam Weidemann, a researcher at Google's Threat Analysis Group, "said the attacks have been ongoing over the last three months." The hackers set up "fake Twitter accounts to show off security research and link to a blog."

North Korea Targets COVID-19 Vaccine Data Through Hacking. The New York Post (1/26, Brown, 7.45M) reports North Korea has "started human trials on a COVID-19 vaccine – using info stolen from Western drugmakers by a dedicated team of hackers." An informant told Daily NK North Korea is "already at phase 3 in trials for its shot, produced even as the secretive nation refuses to admit to any confirmed cases." The insider "confirmed to the outlet that it was based on the work of a specialist 'hacking organization' devoted to stealing vaccine info, raising the alarm in the US, UK and South Korea starting last year." The hacking unit – called Bureau 325 – "operates under the Reconnaissance General Bureau while receiving direct orders from the Central Committee."

Opinion: America Not Prepared For A Catastrophic Cyberattack.

In a commentary in the Washington Times (1/26, 626K), Clifford D. May, founder and president of the Foundation for Defense of Democracies, writes, "The National Defense Authorization Act (NDAA) that became law on January 1 includes 25 legislative measures recommended to Congress by the Cyberspace Solarium Commission (CSC), a bipartisan panel established two years ago to develop a 'strategic approach to defending America in cyberspace against cyberattacks of significant consequences.'" He contends, "Nevertheless, effective deterrence is a process, not a posture. Those who see themselves as our enemies will respond, adapt, and innovate in pursuit of superior offensive cyber capabilities. They will probe for our weaknesses, for ways to damage and diminish us. Additional thinking and planning is essential. Prudently, the NDAA extends the CSC's mandate for two more years." He concludes, "What's critical right now is for President Biden to prioritize this threat. In particular, he should quickly nominate someone highly skilled as national cyber director."

Commerce Secretary Nominee Won't Promise To Maintain Huawei On US Blacklist.

The Washington Examiner (1/26, Dunleavy, 888K) reports President Biden's nominee to "lead the Commerce Department would not commit to keeping Huawei on the US entities blacklist after the Trump Administration deemed the Chinese telecom company a national security threat and sought to limit its sway worldwide and its access to US markets." Gina Raimondo often took "a strong rhetorical stance on China throughout her Tuesday confirmation hearing before the Senate Commerce Committee, but she declined to promise that Huawei would remain on the Commerce Department's 'entities list' for companies deemed to be national security threats." When pressed about Huawei, she said, "I will review the policy, consult with you, consult with industry, consult with our allies, and make an assessment as to what's best for American national and economic security."

Federal Reserve

The Fed Is Catching Up On Climate Change.

The Financial Times (1/26, Jones, Subscription Publication, 1.48M) reports, "The Federal Reserve, it is fair to say, has lagged behind its central bank counterparts, such as the European Central Bank and the Bank of..."

Financial Regulatory Agencies

Biden's CFPB Pick Expected To Take Aggressive Reg Approach.

The Hill (1/26, Lane, 5.69M) reports President Biden's pick to lead the Consumer Financial Protection Bureau (CFPB), Rohit Chopra, "is expected to embolden the powerful agency with a more aggressive approach to how banks, lenders and debt collectors treat their customers." For years, "progressives and Wall Street critics raged...as Trump-appointed CFPB leaders weakened regulations, upended the agency's structure and took a less combative approach to oversight and enforcement." The CFPB's structure "gives its director unilateral power over nearly everything it does," so the agency "is largely defined by the priorities of its leader." The first CFPB director, Richard Cordray, "used his perch to write strict rules, file well-publicized lawsuits against banks and lenders and issue frequent warning shots to the financial sector." According to the Hill, "Both Chopra's supporters and critics expect him to govern in the Cordray mold, unapologetically holding banks and lenders to strict standards while bringing back the CFPB's crusading mentality."

Office of the Comptroller of the Currency

OCC Pauses CRA Information Collection Survey.

The Texas Bankers Association (1/26) reports the Office of the Comptroller of the Currency "announced that national banks will not be required to respond to the agency's Community Reinvestment Act information collection by the previously established May 31, 2021 deadline." The OCC "issued the information collection to gather bank-specific data on which to base the new CRA performance benchmarks under the agency's June 2020 CRA rule."

Politico Receives "Flood Of Emails And Texts" Objecting To Barr As Head Of OCC.

Politico Morning Money (1/26, White, Weaver, 6.7M) reports that it received "a flood of emails and texts from financial reformers objecting to the idea that Michael Barr should head the OCC" in response to Tuesday's lead story. Many of the messages "were akin to this from Jeff Hauser, executive director of the Revolving Door Project: 'Barr's defenders love to skip past his enormous conflict of interests on fintech issues.'"

Crypto Grew Rapidly Under Trump Thanks To Regulators Such As OCC.

In his CoinDesk (1/26, 49K) newsletter "State of Crypto," Nikhilesh De writes, "Crypto grew rapidly over the four years Trump was in office – despite his own public admission that he is 'not a fan' of bitcoin. While he wasn't directly responsible for this growth, the regulators he appointed and some of the policies his administration pursued undeniably boosted the crypto industry." While the OCC "wasn't hugely involved in the crypto space for most of Trump's term, outside of a legal fight over a fintech charter," when Brian Brooks was appointed acting head, the agency "really began making public moves relevant to the industry."

Analysis: New SAR FAQs Should Dispel Concerns Created By FinCEN Files.

Bloomberg Law (1/26, Kim, Subscription Publication, 4K) reports in an analysis that federal banking regulators' recent answers to frequently asked questions (FAQs) surrounding suspicious activity report (SAR) filings resemble the FinCEN Files criticism of SAR filing practices, indicating the agencies' FAQs were presented in response to that criticism. Earlier this month, FinCEN along with the Fed Board, the FDIC, the OCC, and the NCUA issued answers to seven FAQs to clarify policies on SAR filing. Bloomberg Law says, "FAQs 1 through 5 should dispel concerns that the FinCEN Files campaign has created" and "should reassure U.S. financial institutions that their regulators are not suddenly changing long-established AML regulatory policies in response to media pressure."

Analysis: OCC's Citibank Fine Offers Operational Risk Lessons.

Risk Management Magazine (1/26, Kennett) reports in an analysis that the OCC's recent fine of Citibank offers operational risk lessons for financial institutions. The penalty – of $400 million "based on the bank's unsafe or unsound banking practices for its long-standing failure to establish effective risk management and data governance programs and internal controls," according to the OCC – "sets a precedent that regulators in the United States – but likely in other jurisdictions soon as well – will be more proactive to avoid the damaging consequences of an event by administering fines for more generalized poor risk management."

Editorial Wrap-Up

Washington Post.

"Yes, Ex-Presidents Can Be Impeached." The Washington Post (1/26, 10.52M) says that the theory that a former president cannot be impeached "runs against the weight of scholarship, historical practice and common sense. Many Republicans may be embracing the theory nonetheless because it gives them an excuse to avoid any responsibility: They do not have to condone the former president's incitement of the Jan. 6 Capitol invasion, but they also do not have to anger his supporters."

"The New 'Supreme Court' Of Facebook Invites A Reckoning For The Future Of Social Media." The Washington Post (1/26, 10.52M) says Americans are rightly reticent about the "the idea of letting politicians decide what's permissible for other politicians to say on the Internet," but are not "much happier at the idea of corporate executives...making such determinations without any sort of democratic mandate." The Post says an independent oversight board established by Facebook "to review a small number of its enforcement decisions" is "a middle ground: Its panelists are luminaries selected from around the world, relatively diverse in their backgrounds and their leanings but all committed to free expression." The board will consider whether former President Donald Trump "should have been kicked off Facebook and whether he should be permitted back. Its reasoning will elucidate how Facebook should take offline context into account in its online decisions."

"As The Virus Mutates, Here's Another Public Health Failing That Needs Correcting." The Washington Post (1/26, 10.52M) says that while "vaccines offer hope for an easing of the pandemic...the coronavirus is not loitering around," and "two significant genetic variants in Britain and South Africa pose a challenge," and "require an urgent response and a concerted effort to scale-up genomic surveillance." The Post says that "genetic sequencing technology ... should be deployed into a massive cross-country genomic virus surveillance network for disease detection and risk assessment."

Wall Street Journal.

"The Law That Fueled The Capitol Riot." The Wall Street Journal (1/26, Subscription Publication, 8.41M) urges Congress to repeal the Electoral Count Act of 1887, arguing it is at odds with federalism and the separation of powers because it allows Congress to meddle in state decisions by disqualifying electors.

"No Impeachment Surprise." The Wall Street Journal (1/26, Subscription Publication, 8.41M) says that while there are fair arguments on both sides of the issue of the constitutionality of impeaching former President Donald Trump, Tuesday's Senate vote showed that Trump is all but certain to be acquitted if the trial proceeds, and that pressing forward would be purely political on the part of Democrats – and could backfire by firing up Trump and his supporters.

"Biden Out-Trumps Trump." The Wall Street Journal (1/26, Subscription Publication, 8.41M) says the biggest difference between President Biden's "Buy American" rules and those of former President Donald Trump is bureaucracy. Federal agencies can grant waivers to procurement rules if it is in "the public interest." Under Trump, agencies granted such waivers generously. Biden is creating an office in OMB to examine all waiver requests and post them for public review, which means agencies will have be vetted by the White House, unions, and lawmakers. The Journal says the result will be increased costs and delays in public works projects.

"An Immigration TRO For Joe." The Wall Street Journal (1/26, Subscription Publication, 8.41M) editorializes that the ruling by US District Judge Drew Tipton of the Southern District of Texas that temporarily halted the Biden Administration's moratorium on deportations of immigrants already in the US is similar in nature to judicial decisions on former President Donald Trump's immigration policies, including his 2017 travel ban, but suggests that a nationwide injunction may not stand under a review of the legal arguments. However, the Journal says the decision is a blow to the Biden Administration's early raft of executive orders.

Last Laughs

Late Night Political Humor.

Conan O’Brien: “Many of the participants in the siege of the Capitol have been identified. You know how? The FBI identified the people who took over the Capitol thanks to their own post on social media. Isn’t that crazy? ... There’s another word for it: stupid.”

Trevor Noah: “Let’s kick things off with President Joseph ‘Rolex’ Biden. He has been in office for less than a week, but man, he’s already putting his stamp on the presidency with a series of eye catching progressive moves. ... Damn, Joe Biden coming in hot! He's walking into the White House like it's the first day of prison. 'Yo! Who's the wokest [person] in here, because I'm about to whip him or her on their [butt]!'"

Trevor Noah: "Harriet Tubman on the $20 billion. ... Although, this might be too little, too late, because no one uses cash. It might be safer to incorporate her into the Venmo logo."

Trevor Noah: "Still, replacing one of the most racist presidents with a Black woman who helped slaves escape is amazing progress. If you went back in time and told Andrew Jackson that Joe Biden was doing this, he would be like, 'Wait, Joe Biden? That guy who just got elected to the Senate?'"

Jimmy Kimmel: "Twitter last night said goodbye to the MyPillow guy, Mike Lindell. ... Kicked off Twitter for posting that the election was rigged over and over again. Twitter had enough. Can you imagine, 10 years ago, if I told you a former crackhead pillow executive would be kicked off Twitter for helping Donald Trump overthrow the government? I feel like we're not fully appreciating the comedy here. Imagine if Biden's closest adviser was the guy who invented the Shake Weight."

Jimmy Kimmel: "The Senate impeachment trial is set to begin two weeks from yesterday. Today, only five Republicans voted in favor of the trial, which means there's no chance Trump will be convicted. Even Mitch McConnell, who specifically said Trump provoked the crowd, voted against it. I knew we should have been suspicious when he did the right thing."

Jimmy Kimmel: "Some Republicans say impeachment would divide the nation even more. Some made the ridiculous claim that it's unconstitutional to convict a President after he leaves office. ... This is the tough-on-crime party. This is the party that investigated Benghazi for over two years. We still don't know what Benghazi is. This is the man who still hasn't admitted he's lost the election. Move on. It's been almost a week, but we've got to move on from this."

Stephen Colbert: "Last night, House impeachment managers delivered the article of impeachment to the Senate. ... When you incite insurrection against your own government, you don't get to hold office again. That's why after the Civil War, Confederate President Jefferson Davis had to get a job at Best Buy."

Stephen Colbert: "Now, to get a conviction, the House is going to have to convince 17 Republican senators that the former President incited the riot. And even though they were all hustled out through secret tunnels to keep them from being murdered by the President's own bloodthirsty, fascist squad of goons, they're on the fence. ... Yes. That's his defense. He didn't actually go with his cult members to commit murder, so he's not guilty. I'm sorry, that's actually Charles Manson's defense. But I'm sure Charlie would fit in with those rioters. He's got the team tattoo."

Stephen Colbert: "According to a source familiar with the situation, Mar-a-Lago has become a 'sad' and 'dispirited' place since the ex-President moved in, as opposed to before he moved in, when it was hailed as the number-one luxury COVID hot spot where you can enjoy room-temperature chowder while a Chinese spy loads malware on your phone."

Stephen Colbert: "Today we learned that Biden wants Congress to pass his COVID relief bill before March. Yes, ideally, before last March, which I think this still is. It goes '30 days has September, it's been March since I can't remember.'"

Stephen Colbert: "Well, there's good news, because just before we went on the air, tonight President Biden came out with a brand new announcement: He ordered a bunch of new vaccines. ... Two hundred million more doses! Ooooh, baby. America's got a new boyfriend, and he is spoiling us, and we are loving it. And by 'spoiling us,' I mean 'not leaving us to fend for ourselves in the face of a deadly pandemic.'"

Stephen Colbert: "Yet another thing is returning to somewhat normal, because on Sunday, presidential dogs returned to the White House! The dogs are back! ... The two very good boys are 12-year-old Champ Biden...and two-year-old Major Biden. ... The canine Bidens already have their own children's book, 'Champ And Major: First Dogs.' So much better than the children's book about Nixon's dog, 'Shhh! I Think Checkers Is Wearing A Wire.'"

Stephen Colbert: "The first dogs are already making their presence felt. Yesterday, during the signing of an executive order lifting the ban on transgender people serving in the military, we heard [them barking]. That's nice. They're either excited for social justice, or they're desperate to get into the Oval Office because the previous occupant soaked everything with burger juice."

Stephen Colbert: "All these animals are especially exciting, because the previous first family did not have any pets for the four years they lived in the White House. That is unless of course you count Lindsey Graham."

Jimmy Fallon: "Sources in touch with Trump have said he's, quote, 'bored out of his mind.' Well, he was already out of his mind, so I guess now he's just bored. Apparently, playing 36 holes of golf every day isn't as exciting when you're not ignoring a global pandemic."

Jimmy Fallon: "President Biden's very busy, and today, he spoke with Vladimir Putin for the first time since taking office. As soon as the call began, Trump was like, 'I feel a disturbance in the Force.'"

Jimmy Fallon: "I think you can tell Putin was used to talking to Trump. Out of habit, he ended the call with, 'Love you, too.'"

Seth Meyers: "The Senate yesterday confirmed former Federal Reserve chair Janet Yellen to be the first female treasury secretary in the department's 232-year history, which means that in 232 years, 'The Janet Yellen Musical' is going to be lit."

Seth Meyers: "The Supreme Court yesterday declined to hear two cases regarding whether former President Trump violated provisions of the Constitution that bar a President from profiting from a foreign government, mainly because they just don't think it seems likely that Trump made a profit."

James Corden: "Earlier today, all 100 senators were sworn in as jurors for Donald Trump's upcoming impeachment trial, which starts on February 8. The trial is to determine if the attack on the Capitol by thousands of people wearing flags and hats that said 'Trump' is the fault of – get this – Trump. But honestly, I think I speak for everyone when I say the American people are hungry for justice right now. And I don't care if it's Trump, or Victoria from 'The Bachelor,' but someone needs to pay for their actions."

James Corden: "Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell has dropped his demand that Democrats commit to preserving the filibuster, which will now make it easier for the two parties to share power together. McConnell compromised when Chuck Schumer offered him an extra two hours a day under the sunlamp in his terrarium."

James Corden: "According to recent reports, the Biden Administration is looking to speed up the release of new $20 bills featuring Harriet Tubman. Tubman would replace former problematic President Andrew Jackson on the 20. Biden's looking to replace a problematic white man with an inspiring Black woman. He's already done it with Mike Pence, so why not?"

Treasury in the News

Administration Leaving Stimulus Talks To McConnell As Pelosi, Schumer Signal No Compromise.

The Washington Post (11/12, Werner, 14.2M) reports that on Thursday, "Congressional Democratic leaders accused Republicans...of refusing to confront the dramatically worsening coronavirus pandemic and instead acquiescing to" President Trump's "false insistence that he won last week's presidential election." According to the Post, Trump "tweeted incessantly about the need for an economic relief bill before the Nov. 3 election, but he has been silent on the matter ever since, and initial signs that congressional Republicans wanted a deal also have cooled." The Post says House Speaker Nancy Pelosi and Senate Minority Leader Chuck Schumer "said that Biden's election win constitutes a mandate for their demands for a new multitrillion-dollar relief bill, particularly given how coronavirus case numbers are jumping."

The AP (11/12) says Pelosi and Schumer "adopted a combative posture on COVID-19 relief on Thursday, pressing their case for a $2 trillion bill that's a nonstarter for Republicans and faulting the GOP for dragging its feet on acknowledging Biden's victory." According to the

AP, "The message...was that Republicans should concede Biden won and immediately return to negotiations on COVID relief, with the Democrats' $2.4 trillion 'HEROES Act' as the starting point." Pelosi told reporters: "It's most unfortunate that the Republicans have decided that they will not respect the will of the people. It's like the house is burning down, and they just refuse to throw water on it."

The New York Times (11/12, Fandos, Cochrane, Rappeport, 18.61M) says, "By holding firm to keeping $2.4 trillion in new spending as their starting point, Democrats appeared to be closing the door on the possibility of a year-end compromise with Republicans, who have proposed spending a fraction of that amount." CNBC (11/12, Pramuk, 3.62M) says, "Lawmakers would have to overcome a number of challenges to pass pandemic relief legislation before Inauguration Day on Jan. 20. Among the barriers, Trump has showed little interest in anything other than fighting the election results since Nov. 3."

According to Politico (11/12, Everett, Ferris, 4.29M), "Prospects for a new stimulus bill this year just about hit rock bottom on Thursday" as Pelosi and Schumer "said they have no plans to budge from their position of demanding a $2 trillion coronavirus relief measure, and no less." Politico adds, "Barely an hour later, Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell rejected their approach," and "said that he still believes a bill of about $500 billion is the way to go, even though Senate Democrats have repeatedly rejected his proposal. He said the improving economy only makes it clearer the Senate should do something 'highly targeted at what the residual problems are.'"

Reuters (11/12, Cornwell) quotes McConnell as saying, "I gather she (Pelosi) and the Democratic leader in the Senate still are looking at something dramatically larger. That's not a place I think we're willing to go." Reuters reports that although "a senior official in Trump's administration said it was leaving any negotiations about a coronavirus relief package to McConnell and Pelosi for the time being," there is "no sign such talks were imminent."

Bloomberg (11/12, Mohsin, Litvan, Wasson, 4.73M) also reports that the Trump Administration is "stepping back from negotiations" and "leaving it to" McConnell to "revive long-stalled talks." According to Bloomberg, "While the White House probably would consult with GOP lawmakers on details of a Covid-19 relief bill, it's now unlikely to take the lead on talks," and "would only take over if negotiations have to be restarted completely." Senate Finance Committee Chairman Chuck Grassley (R-IA) is quoted as saying, "There's not been any discussion yet between McConnell and Pelosi, but McConnell is not going to rely on [Treasury Secretary Steven] Mnuchin any more to do the dealing. I think he is intending to take it over and to try to get something going and get it done." Bloomberg reports that Senate Appropriations Committee Chairman Richard Shelby (R-AL) "underscored Republicans' limited appetite for relief," saying, "We're not going to do a big big big deal. So, mainly targeted at small business, and you know some people are hurting."

The AP (11/12) reports that Joe Biden's transition team announced on Thursday that he has spoken with Pelosi and Schumer "about 'intensifying' the country's coronavirus response and coping with the economic fallout the pandemic has inflicted." According to the AP, "They also discussed the 'urgent need' to use the lame duck congressional session to approve bills on slowing the spread of COVID-19, as well as economic relief for 'working families and small businesses, support for state and local governments trying to keep front-line workers on the payroll,' expanded unemployment insurance and expanded access to affordable health care."

Chappatta: Mnuchin, Powell Must Withstand "Political Crosscurrents" To Keep Economy Afloat.

In a column for Bloomberg Opinion (11/12, 4.73M), Brian Chappatta says investors, amid the Covid-19 crisis, have viewed Treasury Secretary Steven Mnuchin and Fed Chair Jerome Powell "as steady leaders who are capable of steering the world's largest economy through uncharted waters." Mnuchin and Powell "have appeared together before Congress to give updates on their joint emergency lending programs, which helped restore smooth functioning to corporate-bond and municipal-debt markets." However, after the results of the elections last week, "it seems Democrats and Republicans are jockeying for power, and Mnuchin risks being thrown into the fray as well." Chappatta argues that if Mnuchin and Powell "let political crosscurrents impede their hard-fought efforts to get the economy through the Covid-19 pandemic, it's only America that loses in the end."

Budget Deficit More Than Doubled To $284B In October.

The Wall Street Journal (11/12, Davidson, Subscription Publication, 7.57M) reports the Treasury Department said Thursday that the federal government posted a budget deficit of $284 billion in October, a 111% increase from last month. The AP (11/12, Crutsinger) reports the CBO "is projecting that this year's deficit will remain above the $1 trillion level, coming in at $1.8 trillion, the second largest annual deficit on record but an improvement over the $3.1 trillion set in 2020."

Treasury Grant News

Ohio City Approves $2.3M CARES Act Funds Usage For Police Department.

ThisWeek Community Newspapers (OH) (11/12) reports Reynoldsburg, Ohio "will use the majority of more than $3 million in federal CARES Act funds to pay for public safety." The Reynoldsburg City Council "on Nov. 9 unanimously approved using about $2.3 million in CARES Act money to pay salaries and benefits for the Reynoldsburg police department." City Attorney Chris Shook said, "We have to rely on guidance that we receive from the United States Treasury Department and from the Ohio Office of Management and Budget to determine how it is that we can spend this money." Shook added that Treasury "has determined that our police officers' jobs are now substantially different or dedicated to addressing the COVID-19 pandemic in our city; we are now able to utilize those CARES Act funds to reimburse the city for their payroll and expenses during that time period."

Media Analyses: Trump Silent On Pandemic, "Largely Out Of Sight," As Election Challenges Continue.

While coverage of President Trump's challenges to vote counts in several states continues, media attention shifted Thursday and early Friday to the President's near-total absence over the past week and his silence on pressing matters. David Muir said on ABC World News Tonight (11/12, story 3, 2:55, 6.57M) that Trump "has remained largely out of sight. He's not addressed the country's worsening coronavirus situation, his tweets still largely on the election." Lester Holt said on NBC Nightly News (11/12, story 3, 0:35, 4.9M), "As the COVID crisis deepens across the country, President Trump has said nothing about it publicly since the election." NBC's Hallie Jackson: "The White House says the President is getting regular updates and making sure local officials have what they need. The COVID task force did meet Monday, but it was for only the second time in the last three and a half weeks. The President has not addressed the public in person in a week." On ABC World News Tonight (11/12, story 4, 0:40, Muir, 6.57M), Jonathan Karl said, "The President has been nowhere on this. He hasn't spoken about the alarming increase in infections. He has not met with the coronavirus task force for months. He hasn't even tweeted about it."

The AP (11/12, Madhani, Miller) says the President "has publicly disengaged from the battle against the coronavirus at a moment when the disease is tearing across the United States at an alarming pace." The AP says Trump "remains angry that an announcement about progress in developing a vaccine for the disease came after Election Day. And aides say the president has shown little interest in the growing crisis." The Los Angeles Times (11/12, Megerian, 4.64M) writes, "More than a week after his stinging electoral defeat, President Trump spent another day secluded in the White House on Thursday feverishly tweeting, watching television and telephoning allies – focused more on his own future than governing the nation as it struggles with a worsening pandemic."

The Washington Post (11/12, A1, Nakamura, 14.2M) writes, "On Thursday, six American service members were killed in a helicopter crash during a peacekeeping mission in Egypt. Tropical Storm Eta made landfall in North Florida, contributing to severe flooding. The number of Americans infected with the novel coronavirus continued at a record-setting pace, sending the stock market tumbling." But Trump "spent the day as he has most others this week – sequestered from public view, tweeting grievances, falsehoods and misinformation about the election results and about Fox News's coverage of him. Neither he nor his aides briefed reporters on the news of the day."

Politico (11/12, Forgey, 4.29M) reports that on Thursday, White House Press Secretary Kayleigh McEnany declined to say when Trump "might end his conspicuous pause of post-election public appearances, telling Fox News that Americans will 'be hearing from him at the right moment.'" Politico says the President "has not appeared or spoken publicly since a White House news conference last Thursday, when he repeated his attacks on the country's electoral system and his baseless claims of widespread voter fraud."

Politico (11/12, Cook, Orr, 4.29M) additionally reports that Chief of Staff Meadows "gathered senior aides on a call" on Monday "to plot the conservative policy moves they could push through in their final 10 weeks on immigration, trade, health care, China and school choice." Staffers "have compiled a list of roughly 15 moves they could make through executive orders, executive actions or finalizing agency rules that they plan to pursue in the coming days, according to interviews with three administration officials," and aides say Trump "intends to start issuing the orders as soon as possible." However, White House officials told the Wall Street Journal (11/12, Ballhaus, Restuccia, Subscription Publication, 7.57M) that Trump has not discussed what he wants to achieve over the next two months, and one official said little formal planning is taking place.

The Washington Post (11/12, 14.2M) editorializes, "The pandemic has reached runaway speed in the United States, and the president has vanished. ... On Wednesday, 1,549 people died from the virus in the United States. Would the leadership of the nation be on high alert if, say, that many people were killed in three jumbo jet crashes? If a terrorist group or foreign attacker drew such an awful toll on a single day? Yet there was not a word from President Trump, so self-absorbed with his election defeat and the mirage of voter fraud that he seems unable and unwilling to deal with a supreme national crisis."

Trump Campaign Continues To File Legal Challenges. Ben Tracy reported on the CBS Evening News (11/12, story 5, 2:20, O'Donnell, 4.06M), "The Trump campaign continues to file legal challenges, even as senior advisers tell CBS News there is no viable path to overturning the election results. Sources say President Trump knows this, but likes to be seen as a fighter." The New York Times (11/12, Haberman, 18.61M) writes, "There is no grand strategy at play, according to interviews with a half-dozen advisers and people close to the president." Trump is "simply trying to survive from one news cycle to the next, seeing how far he can push his case against his defeat and ensure the continued support of his Republican base. By dominating the story of his exit from the White House, he hopes to keep his millions of supporters energized and engaged for whatever comes next."

The AP (11/12, Swenson, Seitz) reports the President on Thursday "falsely claimed on Twitter that an election technology firm 'deleted' large numbers of his votes or 'switched' them to count for Joe Biden." USA Today (11/12, Jackson, 10.31M) writes, "Intentionally or not," Trump also "re-tweeted several items Thursday warning about the prospect of a Democratic-controlled U.S. Senate – something that can only happen if Biden becomes president and Kamala Harris becomes vice president." CNN (11/12, Bash, Borger, Klein, 83.16M) reports on its website that while Donald Trump Jr. and Eric Trump "are gung-ho, leading the charge for the President to stay in the fight," Ivanka Trump "has emerged as someone looking for a way for the President to save face as he considers his next steps."

The New York Times (11/12, Feuer, 18.61M) reports, "Almost from the moment the election ended, President Trump and his allies have relentlessly attacked the integrity of both the voting and vote counting, a narrative they have sought to advance in nearly 20 lawsuits filed in the past eight days. While these suits have alleged systemic fraud in at least five states, the evidence they have offered has been different. At least so far, it has been limited, narrow and, according to several judges and experts, unlikely to affect – let alone to overturn – the outcome of the race." The Wall Street Journal (11/12, Ramey, Randazzo, Subscription Publication, 7.57M) reports the Trump campaign is pressing ahead with legal action in Georgia, Michigan, Pennsylvania, and Wisconsin, and on Friday, a Pennsylvania judge is set to hear a challenge to more than 8,000 Philadelphia ballots with minor errors.

White House Press Secretary Kayleigh McEnany said on Fox News' The Story (11/12), "Let's get to the bottom of this in an effectual way, in a truthful way, and be very careful on the information we are putting forward, which is what we've done." McEnany said on Fox News' Hannity that new affidavits from Pennsylvania show "one system for Democrat counties" and "another system for Republican counties," amounting "to tens of thousands of ballots that were counted improperly."

The New York Post (11/12, Bowden, 4.57M) reports the Trump campaign "was handed a minor legal victory on Thursday when a Pennsylvania judge ruled that a small number of ballots be tossed, from people who did not provide ID by a Monday deadline." The state appellate court ruling "bars counties from including in their final tally mail-in ballots from people who failed to validate their identification against state records by Nov. 9." The Daily Caller (11/12, 716K) says "ballots for which proof of identity had been provided between November 10 and 12 had been separated while the court decided what to do with them." The ruling "means that the segregated ballots will not be counted."

The Philadelphia Inquirer (11/12, 347K) says "tens of thousands of Pennsylvanians are still waiting to see if their vote will be counted as officials continue the tedious process of verifying what is likely to be a record-breaking number of provisional ballots." And Reuters (11/12, Spiezio) reports that Jones Day, "the go-to law firm" for the Trump campaign, is "under fire for representing Republicans in a lawsuit over Pennsylvania's extended deadline to receive mail-in ballots, with law students threatening to boycott the firm and a prominent anti-Trump group targeting it online."

In Arizona, the Arizona Republic (11/12, 869K) reports, "all counties that have conducted required hand-count audits of a sample of their ballots found no or minor discrepancies, county audit reports submitted to the state show." In Georgia, the AP (11/12, Brumback) reports, counties are preparing "for a hand tally of the presidential race." The New York Times (11/12, Hakim, Fausset, 18.61M) reports Georgia's "159 counties were poised on Thursday to begin recounting nearly five million ballots in the presidential election." The Atlanta Journal-Constitution (11/12, 895K) reports that "the recount is open to the public. Anyone can watch from an observation area. Official monitors appointed by political parties will be able to get closer, but they're not allowed to talk to audit teams or touch ballots." In Michigan, Townhall (11/12, McCarthy, 177K) reports, GOP state senators "are requesting a full audit of the 2020 general election after allegations of election improprieties and irregularities."

USA Today (11/12, 10.31M) editorializes, "Two days after the election, [Trump] stood in the White House claiming he was cheated out of victory. 'It's a corrupt system,' he told the nation. 'We have so much evidence.' A week later, it's reasonable for Americans to ask: Where is it? The increasingly obvious answer is that the evidence does not exist. There is no proof of any widespread voter fraud, and surely not enough to overturn the results in a single state, much less the three or more states Trump would need to reverse the outcome."

The Washington Post (11/12, 14.2M) editorializes, "Trump is attempting to overturn the lawful results of a free election by spreading lies and suborning local officials to abet his conspiracy. He is not likely to succeed, but the toxic effects on U.S. democracy will not soon dissipate. ... Though conducted by partisan officials, the mechanisms of vote-counting and election-certifying have until now been understood to be formalities based on actual vote counts. Vote counting cannot depend on which party can more effectively manipulate the machinery of government."

Cybersecurity Experts Say Election Was "Most Secure In American History." The AP (11/12, Tucker, Bajak) reports, "A coalition of federal and state officials said Thursday that they have no evidence that votes were compromised or altered in last week's presidential election. ... The statement from cybersecurity experts...trumpeted the Nov. 3 election as the most secure in American history." USA Today (11/12, Johnson, 10.31M) says "the security group, including the Department of Homeland Security's Cybersecurity & Infrastructure Security Agency (CISA) and the National Association of State Election Directors, issued what appeared to be a definitive coda to the 2020 vote."

The New York Times (11/12, Sanger, Stevens, Perloth, 18.61M) calls the statement "a strong rebuke of President Trump's baseless assertion that the election had been stolen from him," while the Washington Post (11/12, Itkowitz, 14.2M) says the "firmly worded statement calling the Nov. 3 elections 'the most secure in American history'...contradict[ed] any claims of widespread voter fraud."

At Least 10 GOP Senators Say Biden Should Receive Intelligence Briefings. On ABC World News Tonight (11/12, story 3, 2:55, Muir, 6.57M), Muir said a "growing number of Republican senators...say it's time to start giving [Biden] the intelligence briefings incoming presidents get to keep this country safe." ABC's Jonathan Karl: "There are signs tonight Republican support for the President's give-no-ground posture is crumbling. While most Republican senators have yet to acknowledge have yet to concede Joe Biden won the election, a growing number are now saying it's time for Biden to receive the classified intelligence briefings normally given to a president-elect." Sen. James Lankford (R-OK): "If that's not occurring by Friday, I will step in as well to be able to push and to say this needs to occur so that regardless of the outcome of the election, whichever way that it goes, people can be ready for that actual task." Karl: "All told, at least 10 Republican senators, including Trump loyalist Lindsey Graham, said it's time for Biden to get those intel briefings."

Tracy reported on the CBS Evening News (11/12, story 5, 2:20, O'Donnell, 4.06M), "The President's firewall of Republican support is starting to crack. ... Several Republican senators, including Ted Cruz, now say Biden should have access to the presidential daily intelligence briefings, something the White House has not provided." Sen. Ted Cruz (R-TX): "For the sake of protecting the country, you want whoever is going to assume that office to be aware of the significant threats, because the first responsibility of any president is to keep the American people safe." On NBC Nightly News (11/12, story 4, 0:25, Holt, 4.9M), Jackson similarly said Trump's "red wall of Republican support is showing some cracks. More GOP lawmakers now say [Biden] should get access to classified information, briefings being blocked right now by the Trump Administration."

The AP (11/11, Riechmann) reports Trump is not allowing Biden access to the President's Daily Brief, the "ultra-secret daily brief of the nation's most sensitive intelligence," and "national security and intelligence experts hope Trump changes his mind, citing the need for an incoming president to be fully prepared to confront any national security issues on Day One." Politico (11/12, Levine, Desiderio, 4.29M) reports Lankford "noted that in 2000, then-President Bill Clinton allowed George W. Bush to begin receiving presidential-level intelligence briefings during the recount in Florida." According to Politico, Lankford "added that he plans to question the government agency responsible for jump-starting the transition process if a certification is not made by Friday." The New York Daily News (11/12, McAuliff, Sommerfeldt, 2.52M) reports Sen. John Cornyn (R-TX) "echoed Lankford in saying that the president should break the logjam and allow Biden access to national security briefings since he might 'win in the end.'"

USA Today (11/12, King, 10.31M) reports "prominent and powerful Republicans are signaling that Joe Biden should be treated as the next president," with senators saying "they see no issue with Biden receiving the same daily intelligence briefings Trump is getting." Sen. Charles Grassley (R-IA) "said he had 'no problem' letting Biden have access to the briefings," and several others, "including some of the president's most ardent allies" like Graham and Sen. Josh Hawley (R-MO), "quickly followed suit." The New York Times (11/12, Sanger, Stevens, Perloth, 18.61M) quotes Sen. Roy Blunt (R-MO) as saying, "I don't think they need to know everything. I think they do need to know some things, and national security would be one of them."

The Washington Post (11/12, Sonmez, DeBonis, 14.2M) also reports that "an increasing number of Senate Republicans" say Biden "should be granted access to classified briefings during the presidential transition, an acknowledgment of the election results despite President Trump's insistence that he will win." Senate Majority Whip Thune told CNN. "I think that it probably makes sense to prepare for all contingencies. And as these election challenges play out in court, I don't have a problem with, and I think it's important from a national security standpoint, continuity."

Asked on Fox News' Fox and Friends First (11/12, 483K) about whether the Administration is considering giving Biden access to the President's Daily Brief, McEnany said, "All laws are being followed with regard to an expected transition, though we expect to continue on as the Trump Administration. We will see how our litigation goes." Reuters (11/12, Cornwell, Chiacu, Lewis), Bloomberg (11/12, Dennis, 4.73M), the Wall Street Journal (11/12, Peterson, Wise, Subscription Publication, 7.57M), Axios (11/12, Arias, 521K), The Hill (11/12, Carney, 2.98M), and the CNN (11/12, Raju, Barrett, 83.16M) website have similar reports. Meanwhile, Politico (11/12, Bertrand, 4.29M) reports that "a group of more than 150 former national security officials who served under [Trump] and other Republican and Democratic administrations is warning that the government's delay in recognizing" Biden's victory "poses a 'serious risk to national security.'"

According to the New York Times (11/12, Sanger, Stevens, Perloth, 18.61M), "Deprived of access to secure government communications by the Trump administration, Mr. Biden's team of more than 500 former officials and outside experts has embraced workarounds, talking over encrypted apps like Signal to shield their conversations from the Chinese, meeting in outdoor coffee shops with government officials they once worked alongside." The Times adds, "The conversations are circumspect, both because of rules on both sides limiting how much information Mr. Biden's team can seek and how much executive branch officials are allowed to say."

Obama Says He Is "Troubled" By Republicans "Who Clearly Know Better" Supporting Trump's Claims. The CBS Evening News (11/12, story 4, 1:05, O'Donnell, 4.06M), previewing a 60 Minutes interview with former President Barack Obama, showed Obama saying, "The President doesn't like to lose, and never admits loss. I'm more troubled by the fact that other Republican officials who clearly know better are going along with this, are humoring him in this fashion. It is one more step in delegitimizing not just the incoming Biden Administration, but democracy generally. And that's a dangerous path."

Adelson-Owned Newspaper Urges Trump To Cooperate With Biden Team. The Washington Post (11/12, Izadi, 14.2M) reports, "In October 2016, the Las Vegas Review-Journal was the first major newspaper to endorse then-candidate Donald Trump for president. ... Four years later, the Review-Journal – owned by Trump supporter and Republican megadonor Sheldon Adelson – is advising Trump that he did indeed lose the 2020 presidential race and that he should start cooperating with the Biden transition team." In a Thursday editorial, the newspaper wrote, "It is too fitting that the Trump presidency concludes amid a babel of bluster and bravado. But the president does a disservice to his more rabid supporters by insisting that he would have won the Nov. 3 election absent voter fraud. That's simply false." Politico (11/12, Niedzwiadek, 4.29M) and The Hill (11/12, Budryk, 2.98M) also cover the editorial, while in her Washington Post (11/12, 14.2M) column, Margaret Sullivan looks at the challenges media organizations are facing in covering the post-election machinations.

Commerce Department Will Delay Enforcement Of TikTok Shutdown Order.

The Wall Street Journal (11/12, Maher, Subscription Publication, 7.57M) reports the Commerce Department said Thursday it will not enforce an order that would have effectively shut down TikTok by prohibiting US companies from offering it as a mobile app and offering web-hosting service for the company. Citing a preliminary injunction against the shutdown last month from US District Judge Wendy Beetlestone in Philadelphia, the Department said the order will not take effect "pending further legal developments." The New York Times (11/12, McCabe, 18.61M) provides similar coverage.

Disney Reports Second Consecutive Quarterly Loss.

The Wall Street Journal (11/12, Prang, Subscription Publication, 7.57M) reports Walt Disney Co. reported a $710 million loss for the recently ended quarter, marking its second consecutive quarterly loss. The Washington Post (11/12, Zeitchik, 14.2M) says Disney "has been battered by the pandemic, which has kept it from attracting large numbers to its theme parks and from opening new movies in theaters. Both realms are usually very popular in the summer." Reuters (11/12, Richwine, Rana) says Disney's "revenue fell 23% to $14.71 billion in the quarter, above analysts' average estimate of about $14.2 billion. Disney's adjusted loss per share, excluding one-time items, of 20 cents, also beat Wall Street expectations of a more drastic 70 cents per share loss." The AP (11/12, Anderson, Ortutay) reports the results "weren't as bad as feared and the company's shares advanced after hours."

The Orlando (FL) Sentinel (11/12, Russon, 536K) reports Disney "announced Thursday it will not pay a stock dividend for the second half of fiscal 2020 because of the pandemic's effect and the company's investment into Disney Plus." The New York Times (11/12, Barnes, 18.61M) reports, "Investors are confident that Disney's theme park empire will come roaring back when a vaccine is deployed – and all they really care about, at least for the moment, is streaming, streaming, streaming."

Bloomberg (11/12, Palmeri, 4.73M) reports while Disney "is still reeling from the pandemic, the growth of Disney+ has softened the blow. ... The service grew to 73.7 million paid subscribers, smashing the 65.5 million analysts had been anticipating." The Los Angeles Times (11/12, 4.64M) provides similar coverage.

Xi Made Decision To Halt Ant Group's IPO.

Citing Chinese officials, the Wall Street Journal (11/12, Yang, Wei, Subscription Publication, 7.57M) reports Chinese President Xi Jinping personally made the decision to stop Ant Group's IPO. The Journal says the move came after years of tension between Ant Group's controlling shareholder Jack Ma and the Chinese government.

Revlon Reaches Agreement Allowing It To Avert Bankruptcy.

The Wall Street Journal (11/12, Gladstone, Subscription Publication, 7.57M) reports Revlon said Thursday it has gotten support from a sufficient number of bondholders to avoid a bankruptcy filing. The company said nearly 70% of the holders of a bond nearing maturity have agreed to a debt-swap deal, giving it more time to pay off its loans.

Harley-Davidson Pulling Out Of India.

The New York Times (11/12, Singh, 18.61M) reports Harley-Davidson "is giving up on India because of weak sales, after more than a decade of pursuing a huge but ultimately frustrating place to do business." Harley-Davidson "sold a total of 2,470 bikes in India in the 12 months that ended in March, almost half the number it reached five years ago, according to the Society of Indian Automobile Manufacturers, a nonprofit representing automotive manufacturers." Its motorcycles are "out of reach for many. Harley's top model exceeds $88,000 in Delhi after taxes and licensing fees. That is 41 times India's average yearly income, according to the World Bank."

Agreement Reached With Pharmacies To Provide Free COVID Vaccinations.

The AP (11/12, Alonso-Zaldivar) reports that "federal health officials have reached an agreement with pharmacies across the U.S. to distribute free coronavirus vaccines after they are approved and become available to the public." According to the AP, "Thursday's agreement with major chain drug stores, grocery market pharmacies and other chains and networks covers about 3 in 5 pharmacies," and "looks ahead to a time next spring when yet-to-be-approved vaccines will start to become available beyond priority groups." HHS Secretary Azar is quoted as saying, "The vast majority of Americans live within five miles of a pharmacy," and the deal is "a critical step toward making sure all Americans have access to safe and effective COVID-19 vaccines when they are available."

State Health Officials Prepare For Vaccination Distribution Logistical Complexities. The AP (11/12, Choi, Smith) says, "With a COVID-19 vaccine drawing closer, public health officials across the country are gearing up for the biggest vaccination effort in U.S. history – a monumental undertaking that must distribute hundreds of millions of doses, prioritize who's first in line and ensure that people who get the initial shot return for the necessary second one." According to the AP, "The push could begin as early as next month, when federal officials say the first vaccine may be authorized for emergency use and immediately deployed to high-risk groups, such as health care workers." The AP says state officials are "planning for the likelihood that the first shipments will not be enough to cover everyone in high-priority groups."

Vaccination Distribution Requires Cooperation Between Governments, Drug Makers, Suppliers, Employees. The New York Times (11/12, Gelles, Robins, 18.61M) reports Pfizer, the US government, and "the public health community face a new challenge: quickly making millions of doses of the vaccine and getting them to the hospitals, clinics and pharmacies where they will be injected, two separate times, into people's arms." Before shipment, "federal and state governments must tell it where to send how many doses," and medical supplier McKesson "will have to provide hospitals and other distribution sites with the syringes, needles and other supplies necessary to administer the vaccine." Employees "will need to be trained to store and administer the vaccine" and "ensure that, four weeks after people get the vaccine, they return for a second dose." In addition, "millions of Americans must be persuaded to get the shots in the first place."

Work On COVID Vaccine Began When Virus Was Spreading In Wuhan. On NBC Nightly News (11/12, story 11, 1:45, Holt, 4.9M), Richard Engel said that when the novel coronavirus began to spread in Wuhan, China in December 2019, "the Chinese government swooped in with all its authoritarian might, but China did something else few noticed. It made a call for help, written in genetic code. ... Chinese researchers quickly cracked the code and published it" online. Imperial College London COVID-19 Vaccination Lead Robin Shattock "fed it into a computer and came up with a prototype vaccine within weeks. Nearly all the work since then has been testing."

Eli Lilly Antibody Treatment Aims To Speed Recovery Time For Vulnerable COVID Patients. ABC World News Tonight (11/12, story 2, 2:45, Muir, 6.57M) reported, "Eli Lilly's antibody treatment receiving FDA emergency use authorization just this week, working to speed up the recovery in some of the most vulnerable patients." Correspondent Alex Perez said researchers took "the most powerful antibody from one of the first survivors and [are] using a synthetically-made version to fight the virus." However, "only certain patients are eligible. They must be 12 years or older with mild to moderate symptoms and likely to develop severe illness, including many with pre-existing conditions like diabetes and obesity. It's not for people already in the hospital. Availability is limited. 88,000 doses ready now. 212,000 more expected by the end of the year."

Fauci Says Working With Administration Has Been "Stressful."

The Australian Broadcasting Corporation (11/12, 99K) reports on its website that in an interview, NIAID Director Fauci "said controlling America's worsening coronavirus outbreak was not impossible but becoming more and more difficult." Fauci also said "working with the Trump administration on the coronavirus pandemic had 'obviously been very stressful.'" Fauci said, "When you have public figures like [former Trump advisor Stephen] Bannon calling for your beheading, that's really kind of unusual. That's not the kind of thing you think about when you're going through medical school to become a physician."

In Recording, Facebook CEO Defends Decision Not To Suspend Bannon. Reuters (11/12, Paul) reports Facebook CEO Mark Zuckerberg "told an all-staff meeting on Thursday that [Bannon] had not violated enough of the company's policies to justify his suspension when he urged beheading" Fauci and FBI Director Wray, "according to a recording heard by Reuters." Zuckerberg said, "We have specific rules around how many times you need to violate certain policies before we will deactivate your account completely. ... While the offenses here, I think, came close to crossing that line, they clearly did not cross the line."

Fauci: Lockdown Can Be Avoided.

The New York Times (11/12, Zraick, Pérez-Peña, Grady, 18.61M) reports that on Thursday, NIAID Director Fauci "urged Americans...to 'double down' on basic precautions as coronavirus cases soared across the country and more Covid-19 patients were hospitalized than ever before." However, in an appearance on ABC's Good Morning America, Fauci "reiterated that a nationwide lockdown was unlikely, saying there was 'no appetite for locking down in the American public.' But he expressed confidence that virus cases could be reduced without such drastic measures – if Americans 'double down' on basic preventive steps, like social distancing and masks." Fauci is quoted as saying, "I believe that we can do it without a lockdown, I really do."

Azar: Facts "Do Not Support" Lockdown Of Country. HHS Secretary Azar said on Fox News' The Story (11/12), "We should be driven by science and data and the facts here, and they simply do not support the notion of locking down the country, sheltering in place. You know, it's important the American people know the facts, and the simple facts are that our colleges, K-12 schools, workplaces, air travel, and healthcare settings "are not mechanisms for major spread of the disease." Azar added that lack of protection during "indoor gatherings" is "what's driving this" second wave.

Birx Urges Tighter Restrictions, Guidance Adherence.

WISC-TV Madison, WI (11/12, 2.66M) reported that White House Coronavirus Task Force Coordinator Deborah Birx visited Wisconsin and "said that what we are doing right now here in the state is not enough," urging the Badger State to take cues from other states' efforts to flatten the curve. Birx said, "Your absolute case number's extraordinarily high, your rate of hospitalization is extraordinarily high, and we know what follows that is a high rate of fatalities. ... We're really asking people in this moment to do everything they can to save their own life and the lives of those that they love."

Asked on WISN-TV Milwaukee (11/12, 87K) about potential restrictions on bars and restaurants, Birx said, "We know that anytime people take their mask off indoors, that it can create a spreading event...and it's very difficult to eat and drink with a mask on, and so Wisconsin really needs to consider additional tightening, at least either close early, decrease capacity, and really, I don't know of a situation where at this point in Wisconsin that bars are safe."

In an appearance on WFRV-TV Green Bay, WI (11/12, 28K), Birx cited superspreader events and a number of asymptomatic cases as major drivers of the state's spike. Birx said, "It's no one's fault. They don't know they're infected. I know it's difficult to comprehend that there's a virus out there that can cause no symptoms in some and hospitalizations and deaths in others, and long-term consequences in others." She "says to flatten the curve, Wisconsin has to stop superspreader events and...stay home."

US COVID Infections Topped 150K Thursday; States See Surge In Hospitalizations.

The CBS Evening News (11/12, lead story, 4:00, O'Donnell, 4.06M) reported, "America will soon be facing a coronavirus emergency more severe and potentially more deadly than when the pandemic first began. The country isn't just breaking records. It's blowing through them, reaching new highs again tonight in cases and hospitalizations. ... There are few words to describe the staggering size or depressing depth of the crisis. In just three weeks, the number of new infections recorded each day in the US has doubled," and "Americans are now dying each day at levels not seen since the worst months of the pandemic." ABC World News Tonight (11/12, lead story, 4:50, Muir, 6.57M) reported hospitalizations also nearly doubled "in just two weeks."

On NBC Nightly News (11/12, lead story, 2:30, Holt, 4.9M), Miguel Almaguer said, "As the US skyrockets above yet another astonishing single day record for new COVID cases, doctors tracking the pandemic since March are equally alarmed by the steady and seemingly unstoppable waves of infections, now surging off the charts. With 46 states seeing a rise in cases," on Thursday "the Chicago mayor issued a stay-at-home advisory," and "governors across the nation are also pleading for the public to take precautions." The Wall Street Journal (11/12, A1, Levitz, Ansari, Subscription Publication, 7.57M) reports the governors of New York, Utah, Maryland, Iowa, and Minnesota, among other states, are imposing new measures aimed at curbing rising COVID infection numbers.

CNBC (11/12, Feuer, 3.62M) reports on its website that "average daily new cases are up by at least 5% over the last week in at least 47 states and DC as of Wednesday, according to a CNBC analysis of data compiled by Johns Hopkins University."

The New York Times (11/12, Smith, 18.61M) reports, "Eight days after 100,000 US cases" of COVID infections "were found in a day for the first time, the number topped 150,000 on Thursday." The pandemic "has risen to crisis levels in much of the nation, especially the Midwest, as hospital executives warn of dwindling bed space and as coroners deploy mobile morgues." Over "100,000 coronavirus cases have been announced nationwide every day since Nov. 4, and six of the last nine days have broken the previous record." Hospitalizations "also set a record on Thursday, climbing to 67,096, according to the Covid Tracking Project. It was the third straight day of record numbers, and the figure has doubled in just five weeks."

Study Finds COVID Death Rate Down 30% Since April. The AP (11/12, Murphy) reports, "Deaths per day in the US have soared more than 40 percent over the past two weeks, from an average of about 790 to more than 1,100 as of Wednesday, the highest level in three months." This is "still well below the peak of about 2,200 deaths per day in late April, in what may reflect the availability of better treatments and the increased share of cases among young people, who are more likely than older ones to survive a bout with COVID-19."

Reuters (11/12, Beasley) reports, "The likelihood that a coronavirus infection will prove fatal has dropped by nearly a third since April due to improved treatment, researchers at the University of Washington's Institute for Health Metrics and Evaluation (IHME) said on Thursday." In the US, COVID-19 "now kills about 0.6% of people infected with the virus, compared with around 0.9% early in the pandemic, IHME Director Dr. Christopher Murray told Reuters." He "said statistics reflect that doctors have figured out better ways to care for patients, including the use of blood thinners and oxygen support. Effective treatments, such as the generic steroid dexamethasone, have also been identified."

Redfield: 1M New Cases Per Week Not "Unlikely." CDC Director Redfield said on WXYZ-TV (11/12, 151K), "It's really important not to underestimate this virus. The threat is really real. A number of us were saying back in September that we were on a course to get up from 30,000, 40,000 to 100,000, 150,000, maybe even 200,000 cases a day, and then see the increased hospitalizations a couple weeks later and then, unfortunately, increased deaths. This is a very serious threat. I don't think it's unlikely in the next week or two that we won't be having one million cases a week in this country. Clearly, we're likely to see significantly more deaths."

Experts Warn About Trajectory Of COVID Infections In US. The Washington Post (11/12, Iati, 14.2M) reports, "Public health experts are sounding the alarm about the trajectory of the pandemic in the United States as the coronavirus spreads through the country largely unabated and officials muse aloud about the possibility of fresh lockdowns." The warnings "come amid widespread fatigue with restrictions, even as the virus is nowhere near finished rampaging across the country. Although several states implemented new mitigation measures this week, many people have been letting down their guards or, in some cases, vowing outright to ignore the rules."

California Cities Reimpose Restrictions As State Reaches Millionth COVID Case.

The AP (11/12, Melley, Taxin) reports California recorded its millionth known case of COVID-19 case on Thursday, following Texas as the second state to reach the "grim milestone."

The New York Times (11/12, Fuller, Arango, Hubler, 18.61M) reports, "Citing an alarming increase in cases, San Francisco this week banned indoor dining at restaurants and paused a plan to reopen schools." In Los Angeles, "thousands of residents have flocked in recent weeks to the parking lot of Dodger Stadium, one of the largest testing sites in the nation." In Sacramento, "the number of people hospitalized with the virus has doubled to 158 in the past two weeks." In San Diego, "where rising cases pushed the city to the most restrictive level of the state's guidelines, indoor activities will be banned as of Saturday in churches, gyms, yoga studios and movie theaters."

The San Francisco Chronicle (11/12, Allday, 2.67M) says the "upward trend is especially concerning with multiple threats on the horizon. People will naturally want to come together for the holidays, and the cold weather will draw them indoors. Plus the flu season could further complicate the COVID-19 pandemic." The Los Angeles Times (11/12, Money, 4.64M) reports Los Angeles Public Health Director Barbara Ferrer, during a briefing on Thursday, "emphasized that LA County remains on a knife's edge and that everyone needs to do their part to keep conditions from worsening." She said, "We all need to act now. ... The actions we take today, tomorrow and next week have tremendous impact on the health and well-being of many, many people across the county. If, collectively, we fail to stop the acceleration of new cases, we will have no choice but to look at additional actions."

Upper Midwest, Plains States See COVID Cases Rising.

The Washington Post (11/12, Gowen, Bailey, 14.2M) reports, "Covid's long, dark winter has already arrived in the Upper Midwest, as cases and deaths surge, snatching lives, overwhelming hospitals, exhausting health-care providers and raising fears that the region's medical system will be completely overwhelmed in the coming days." Experts "say that cases are surging in the region as the weather has turned colder and more people are forced inside – into more poorly ventilated indoor spaces where transmission thrives – with the virus arriving even in remote areas in largely conservative states where Republican leaders have resisted mask mandates or business closures, asking their residents to rely instead on personal responsibility." In Minnesota, Gov. Tim Walz (D) "has warned of more 'nightmare' numbers to come, even as the state has instituted new restrictions on bars, restaurants and social gatherings in an attempt to stop the spread." NBC Nightly News (11/12, story 2, 1:40, Holt, 4.9M) reported that in Michigan, "officials warn the state's healthcare system could soon capsize amid a nearly five fold surge in COVID hospitalizations since just last month. ... Hospitals throughout the state are understaffed and overwhelmed, with cases and hospitalizations doubling every two weeks."

North Dakota Nurses Association Reject Policy Allowing COVID-Positive Employees To Continue Working. The Hill (11/12, Weixel, 2.98M) reports that in a statement on Wednesday, the North Dakota Nurses Association rejected "a policy that would allow COVID-positive nurses to continue treating patients at coronavirus units of hospitals and nursing homes if they are not symptomatic." They association "said the policy does not address the root of the problem and called for a statewide mask mandate and other public health measures to be implemented first." On Monday, Gov. Doug Burgum (R) announced the policy "as a way to ease pressure on hospitals that are short-staffed and nearing capacity, as COVID-19 cases surge uncontrollably throughout the state." North Dakota "is currently the worst-hit state in the country in terms of coronavirus cases per 100,000 residents, but is one of 15 states without a mask mandate."

Chicago Mayor Issues Stay-At-Home Advisory.

Reuters (11/12, Caspani, O'Brien) reports Chicago Mayor Lori Lightfoot (D) "issued a stay-at-home advisory and Detroit stopped in-person schooling on Thursday to staunch the coronavirus outbreak as more than a dozen states reported a doubling of new COVID-19 cases in the last two weeks." Lightfoot "on Thursday issued a 30-day advisory calling upon residents to stay at home and have no visitors, even during Thanksgiving festivities." According to Reuters, Illinois "has emerged as the pandemic's new epicenter in the region as well as across the country."

Bloomberg (11/12, Singh, 4.73M) reports Lightfoot's advisory urges "residents to avoid leaving home except for work, school and other essentials as new Covid-19 cases and hospitalizations surge." The restrictions "will take effect on Monday and stay in place for 30 days, or until the health commissioner changes it. If the city continues on the current path, at least 1,000 more Chicagoans could die from the virus by the end of the year, Lightfoot said during a press conference on Thursday."

CNN (11/12, Parks, Jones, Jimenez, Asmelash, 83.16M) reports on its website that Lightfoot said in the release, "The gains we have made this past year have been the result of our willingness to work together. Even in this difficult moment, we will continue to unite as we always have for our city in order to halt the rise we're seeing, shake out of the fatigue we've been experiencing, and make the crucial difference in what our future is going to look like."

The Chicago Tribune (11/12, Munks, Pratt, 2.65M) reports that at a coronavirus briefing on Thursday, Gov. J.B. Pritzker (D) said, "If things don't take a turn in the coming days, we will quickly reach the point when some form of a mandatory stay-at-home order is all that will be left. ... With every fiber of my being, I do not want us to get there. But right now, that seems like where we are heading."

The Chicago Sun-Times (11/12, 875K) says "more people have contracted the virus in Illinois over the past 15 days – nearly 140,000 – than during all of summer." Of "all 536,542 people who have tested positive in Illinois so far during the eight-month pandemic, almost half of them have been diagnosed just since the beginning of October alone."

NYC Schools Seen As Likely To Close Again Amid Resurgence Of COVID.

The New York Times (11/12, Shapiro, 18.61M) reports New York City's school system – despite having coronavirus transmission being "strikingly low, with a positive-test rate of just .17 percent according to the most recent data, prompting one of the city's top health officials to declare that the public schools are among the safest public places around" – is expected to shut down by Thanksgiving, if not earlier. The move "would be perhaps the most significant setback yet for the city's recovery since the bleak days of spring, when it was a global center of the pandemic and all the schools were shuttered."

Meg Oliver of the CBS Evening News (11/12, story 2, 1:30, O'Donnell, 4.06M) said New York City's COVID positivity rate was at 2.6% on Thursday, "closing in on the 3% threshold that would trigger a move to remote learning in all public schools."

Health Officials Encouraging Extra COVID Precautions For Holidays.

The Washington Post (11/12, Brulliard, 14.2M) reports the "record-breaking surge in US coronavirus cases is being driven to a significant degree by casual occasions that may feel deceptively safe, officials and scientists warn – dinner parties, game nights, sleepovers and carpools." The White House coronavirus task force "has been urging states that are virus hot spots to curtail maskless get-togethers of family and friends, saying in reports that asymptomatic attendees 'cause ongoing transmission, frequently infecting multiple people in a single gathering.'"

On NBC Nightly News (11/12, story 14, 1:30, Holt, 4.9M), Stephanie Gosk said, "The safest thing to do this Thanksgiving, health officials say, is stay home. The reality is a lot of people aren't going to stay home." NBC's John Torres said, "By far the safest thing is to not to travel, but if you do travel, take those steps you need to take to stay safe. That means wearing a mask, social distancing, washing your hands."

Asked on Fox News' The Story (11/12) about New York City's Thanksgiving restrictions, HHS Secretary Azar said, "We've got real practical suggestions" for managing the risks, including opening "your window if you can to increase ventilation," turning on ceiling fans, and using "single-serving" utensils for food. Azar said, "The most important thing is, even if we sacrifice this year for Thanksgiving and Christmas, we want to make sure that everyone in your family is available next year for Thanksgiving and Christmas so you can celebrate fully."

Birx Encourages Mask Wearing To Stem Fall Surge. WFRV-TV Green Bay, WI (11/12, 16K) reported that White House Coronavirus Task Force Coordinator Deborah Birx touted the effectiveness of mask mandates and "said other countries have already had success in stemming the tide of the virus when they get aggressive with prevention." Birx said, "Even though this fall surge is more rapid, resulting in more hospitalizations, we already have countries that are successful in flattening the curve, because they put in a mask mandate, they told you not to gather and take your mask off, and they closed bars and restaurants." Birx "is asking Americans to hang on for another four to six weeks when it comes to limiting contact."

Clinical Laboratories Warn COVID Testing May Be Delayed.

Politico (11/12, Lim, 4.29M) reports the American Clinical Laboratory Association, which "represents private labs, including LabCorp and Quest," warned that labs may soon be facing processing delays for COVID tests amid the surge of infections nationwide. Quest Diagnostics "this week said its average turnaround time for PCR testing is two days, but private labs say results will take longer to process once the number of new samples begins to exceed testing capacity." Association of Public Health Laboratories CEO Scott Becker said, "Labs are doing everything they can to eke out whatever additional capacity they can, but they are limited by supplies and in some cases test kits."

Lewandowski Tests Positive For COVID.

USA Today (11/12, Fritze, Santucci, 10.31M) reports Trump campaign adviser Corey Lewandowski "has tested positive for COVID-19, the latest member of the president's inner circle to contract the illness in recent weeks." Lewandowski "was present on election night at the White House for a gathering after initial results showed Trump ahead in several states." Chief of Staff Meadows and HUD Secretary Carson, "who were also present at the gathering, also tested positive in recent days." The Hill (11/12, Samuels, 2.98M) says the "White House election night party has emerged as the latest super-spreader event inside the building."

CNN (11/12, Acosta, Collins, Vazquez, 83.16M) reports on its website that Lewandowski "said he is feeling fine and will stay home as a precaution." He "joins a growing list of individuals close to the President to have tested positive for the virus this week after attending campaign events in the lead-up to and days after the election." In addition to Lewandowski, Meadows, and Carson, Trump adviser David Bossie and White House Political Affairs Director Brian Jack "all tested positive for the coronavirus this week." The New York Times (11/12, Haberman, 18.61M) reports similarly on this story.

Ivanka Trump, Kushner Withdrew Children From School After White House Outbreak.

The New York Daily News (11/12, Crane-Newman, 2.52M) reports Ivanka Trump and Jared Kushner withdrew their children from school "after fellow parents complained about the president's top aide and his daughter failing to follow pandemic protocols amid a COVID-19 outbreak in the White House." They "withdrew their three children from Milton Gottesman Jewish Day School in Washington, DC, three weeks after a coronavirus outbreak in the Oval Office and two weeks before Election Day," and enrolled them at a Maryland school.

The AP (11/12, Thiessen) reports Rep. Don Young (R-AK) "announced Thursday that he has tested positive for COVID-19, a day after the 87-year-old won his 25th term in the US House." On Twitter, Young wrote, "I am feeling strong, following proper protocols, working from home in Alaska and ask for privacy at this time." The AP says Young's "positive test came after he was campaigning for re-election in Alaska, which is experiencing a surge of cases."

The Washington Post (11/12, Itkowitz, 14.2M) reports Young "downplayed the coronavirus in its early days, calling it the 'beer virus,' a seeming reference to Corona beer." Young said in March, "It attacks us senior citizens. I'm one of you. I still say we have to as a nation and state go forth with everyday activities." Reuters (11/12) says Young is the latest of the 17 Republican and nine Democratic members of the House and Senate to "have tested positive or are presumed to have had COVID-19."

In an editorial, the Wall Street Journal (11/12, Subscription Publication, 7.57M) says the decision by Delaware Gov. John Carney (D) to settle with a pastor alleging the state's emergency orders discriminate against churches means Carney has agreed to treat houses of worship neutrally.

WSJournal: Biden's COVID Team Would Push For Lockdowns.

In an editorial, the Wall Street Journal (11/12, Subscription Publication, 7.57M) says Joe Biden's coronavirus advisory committee members believe lockdowns are beneficial, but in fact they would have negative economic and public health consequences. The Journal advises Biden to diversify by calling the Great Barrington Declaration authors to join his committee.

Greg and Travis McMichael were "seen chasing Arbery before Travis fatally shot the 25-year-old after spotting him running in their Brunswick, Georgia neighborhood, in what they told police as an attempted citizen's arrest of a suspected burglar." Travis McMichael's friends testified "that he is remorseful," with attorneys "citing his service in the Coast Guard" and "saying this was no hate crime." Travis McMichael's attorney, Bob Rubin, said, "We have substantial evidence that on the day in question, Mr. Arbery was not a jogger. He was there for nefarious purposes." The attorneys "are asking the judge to reject the indictments' malice murder charge...saying it was written in such a way that it actually charges two crimes in one count." The hearing resumes on Friday morning.

House And Senate Poised To Extend Trump-Era Investigations.

Politico (11/12, Cheney, Desiderio, 4.29M) says President Trump "will be a private citizen in January. But Republicans and Democrats on Capitol Hill are poised to carry on the investigations and legal battles that helped define his presidency." Politico says that in the House, Democrats are "still in court fighting to obtain Trump's financial records and testimony from his first White House counsel Don McGahn, a key figure in the obstruction of justice case against Trump." Meanwhile, in the Senate, Republicans are "plotting ways to expand and intensify their investigations targeting the former Obama administration" and Joe and Hunter Biden, "with Senate Republicans saying they will use the lame duck period to ramp up their probes."

Jean Carroll's defamation lawsuit against President Trump can move forward, scheduling a telephone conference in the case for Dec. 11." The conference scheduling follows Kaplan's earlier denial of the Justice Department's attempt to "take over the case." Carroll's lawyer, Roberta Kaplan, said in a statement to ABC News, "We look forward to finally moving ahead with discovery in the case, which has been on hold since Trump filed his motion for a stay last February, and look forward to the initial conference in E Jean Carroll's case on Dec. 11, if the parties cannot agree on a schedule."

DOJ Report: Acosta Engaged In No Misconduct When He Agreed To Epstein Plea Deal.

The CBS Evening News (11/12, story 10, 0:25, O'Donnell, 4.06M) reported, "This news today: The Justice Department said the prosecutor who handled a 2008 case against Jeffrey Epstein showed poor judgment but did not engage in professional misconduct. Alex Acosta, who later became President Trump's labor secretary, was under fire for the generous plea deal that he entered into with Epstein, who was accused of abusing dozens of teenage girls. Well, today, a lawyer for Epstein's victims called the DOJ report a cover-up."

The AP (11/12, Balsamo, Tucker) says a report from the Justice Department's Office of Professional Responsibility has found Acosta "exercised 'poor judgment' in handling an investigation into wealthy financier Jeffrey Epstein when he was a top federal prosecutor in Florida." The report details Acosta's "handling of a secret plea deal with Epstein, who had been accused of sexually abusing dozens of underage girls." According to the AP, the report "concludes that none of the prosecutors committed misconduct in their interactions with the victims," which the AP says is "likely to disappoint the victims, who have long hoped this would hold the Justice Department officials accountable for actions they say allowed Epstein to escape justice."

Reuters (11/12) reports, "In a statement released on Thursday, the Justice Department said that when Acosta let Epstein enter the non-prosecution agreement in 2008 that spared him from federal sex trafficking charges, he 'failed to make certain that the state of Florida intended to and would notify victims identified through the federal investigation about the state plea hearing.'" Reuters also reports that Sen. Ben Sasse (R-NE) denounced the report's conclusions, saying, "Letting a well-connected billionaire get away with child rape and international sex trafficking isn't 'poor judgment' – it is a disgusting failure."

The New York Times (11/12, Goldstein, Benner, 18.61M) says that "the review was an attempt to close the door on an embarrassing episode for the Justice Department that critics have said allowed Mr. Epstein to largely go unscrutinized in the face of years of allegations that he sexually abused dozens of teenage girls." The Times says despite the department's insistence "in its summary that it found no wrongdoing, it is clear from the full, nearly 350-page report that Mr. Epstein and his defense lawyers were in control of the negotiations from June 2007."

The Washington Post (11/12, Zapotosky, Reinhard, 14.2M) reports that "lawyers for the victims criticized the report," as Adam Horowitz saying, "The mountain of mistakes was not just poor judgment. It was reckless." Sasse also "called on the department to release its entire report," saying, "We have an obligation to make sure this never happens again." A Justice Department spokesperson "said the department could not release the entire report publicly, citing privacy law, but noted it was being turned over to lawmakers."

Among the outlets also reporting on the review are the Wall Street Journal (11/12, Gurman, Subscription Publication, 7.57M), the CNN (11/12, Scannell, 83.16M) website, and Axios (11/12, Chen, 521K).

WPost: Voters Usher In “New Phase Of Drug Policy.”

In an editorial, the Washington Post (11/12, 14.2M) says that Election Day votes to legalize recreational marijuana in New Jersey, Arizona, South Dakota, and Montana, medical marijuana in Mississippi, and decriminalize “small quantities” of hard drugs in Oregon “mark a welcome shift in decades of destructive drug policy” beginning with “the Reagan-era escalation of the war on drugs.” The Post says “severe criminal penalties have fueled a huge growth in the prison population” with an outsized impact on many Black communities, while soaring opioid overdose deaths have underscored “just how cruel and counterproductive it is to criminalize addiction.” With new state legislation, The Post argues, researchers will now “be able to closely observe these laboratories of democracy, hopefully ushering in a new phase of drug policy based on evidence and the principles of public health.”

At Least Four Dead As Eta Moves Through Southeast.

The CBS Evening News (11/12, story 3, 2:00, O'Donnell, 4.06M) reported, “At least four people have died and dozens rescued after Tropical Storm Eta made landfall. Tonight, the devastating storm is dumping heavy rain on the Carolinas and Virginia.” On NBC Nightly News (11/12, story 8, 1:05, Holt, 4.9M), Sam Brock said, “A nightmare in North Carolina: a deadly November storm steam rolling through the Southeast, forcing water rescues across the region.” The AP (11/12, Anderson, Frisaro) reports Eta “raced off the Southeast Atlantic seacoast late Thursday, spreading heavy rains and gusty winds around the Carolinas only hours after blustering across north Florida. ... The storm system triggered flash flooding, multiple water rescues and road closures, and at least one collapsed bridge in South Carolina.”

The Washington Post (11/12, Cappucci, 14.2M) says “after a 3,000-mile journey, an impact on seven countries, four landfalls and two bouts as a hurricane, the two-week rampage of Tropical Storm Eta was progressing through its final destructive act.” ABC World News Tonight (11/12, story 6, 1:05, Muir, 6.57M) and the New York Times (11/12, Vigdor, Paybarah, 18.61M) also report.

Appeals Court Upholds Harvard Affirmative Action Ruling.

The New York Times (11/12, Hartocollis, 18.61M) reports, “A federal appeals court on Thursday ruled that Harvard’s admissions process did not violate civil rights law, but the victory for the university could be short-lived should the case be taken up by the Supreme Court.” The case has “elevated efforts by conservative activists,” who have sought “to reach the Supreme Court, where an increasingly conservative tilt because of three justices appointed by President Trump has made it appear more likely that they could prevail despite more than 40 years of precedent.”

The Washington Post (11/12, Anderson, 14.2M) says that “Students for Fair Admissions, a group opposed to the use of race in admissions decisions, sued the university in 2014 in an effort to halt what it alleged was unlawful discrimination” against Asian-American applicants. US District Judge Allison Burroughs “ruled in 2019 for Harvard on all counts” in the case, a decision that appellate Judges Jeffrey Howard and Sandra Lynch upheld. Students for Fair Admissions president Edward Blum said while the group is “disappointed” in the ruling, the suit “is now on track” for a ruling by the Supreme Court.

The Wall Street Journal (11/12, Korn, Subscription Publication, 7.57M) reports that Howard and Lynch said in a 104-page opinion that Harvard has targeted measurable goals in considering race and that variances in admission rates for minority students invalidates arguments that the university used quotas, adding that the school’s subjective criteria does not indicate bias toward Asian-American applicants.

WSJournal: Harvard Ruling Signals Need For Definitive Supreme Court Decision. In an editorial, the Wall Street Journal (11/12, Subscription Publication, 7.57M) argues that cases around affirmative action like the Harvard case continue to surface because the Supreme Court has failed to offer clear definitions of how or how much race should be considered as a factor in admissions. The Journal says that an appeal presents an opportunity for the Supreme Court to offer clarification in accordance with the majority opinion of Americans who reject the consideration of race.

Two DHS Officials Reportedly “Forced To Resign”; Krebs “Expects To Be Fired.”

CNN (11/12, Marquardt, Sands, 83.16M) reports on its website that DHS Assistant Secretary for International Affairs Valerie Boyd and DHS Cybersecurity and Infrastructure Security Agency Assistant Director for Cybersecurity Bryan Ware “have been forced to resign by the White House, according to sources familiar with the resignations.” CNN says Ware’s “farewell letter to staff indicates that he did not want to step down.” In addition, Reuters (11/12, Bing, Menn) reports that Christopher Krebs, who heads the Cybersecurity and Infrastructure Security Agency, “has told associates he expects to be fired by the White House.”

Deputy AG Rosen Reportedly Blocked Charges Against Zinke.

The Washington Post (11/12, Eilperin, Zapotosky, 14.2M) reports that Deputy Attorney General Jeffrey Rosen “deferred a bid from line prosecutors to move forward with possible criminal charges against former interior secretary Ryan Zinke, saying they needed to gather more evidence and refine the case.” According to the Post, “The move late last year by Rosen...angered some career prosecutors in the Justice Department’s Public Integrity Section and has delayed for months the release of an Interior Department Office of Inspector General report about Zinke's conduct." At issue is whether Zinke "made false statements to Interior investigators who were looking into his decision not to grant a petition by two Indian tribes to operate a commercial casino off reservation land" in Connecticut.

Trump Accountability Project "No Longer Active."

Breitbart (11/12, 673K) reports under the headline "Leftists Back Down On Plans To Create List To Block Trump Backers From Jobs" that the Trump Accountability Project, "which targets supporters of President Donald Trump by adding them to a list and 'holding them accountable' after the election, has announced that it is 'no longer active.'" The announcement "was made on the project's website, which has been promoted by former Pete Buttigieg staffer Hari Sevugan."

Trump Reportedly Mulling Creation Of Digital Media Company To Compete With Fox News.

Axios (11/12, Allen, 521K) reports President Trump "has told friends he wants to start a digital media company to clobber Fox News and undermine the conservative-friendly network." One source told Axios, "He plans to wreck Fox. No doubt about it." Axios says "some Trump advisers think Fox News made a mistake with an early call (seconded by AP) of [Joe Biden's] win in Arizona. That enraged Trump, and gave him something tangible to use in his attacks on the network." While "getting carried on cable systems would be expensive and time-consuming," Trump is instead said to be "considering a digital media channel that would stream online, which would be cheaper and quicker to start."

Townhall (11/12, Barkoukis, 177K) reports that "hours after" the Axios report, Trump "retweeted a number of messages critical of the news organization. After at least 10 retweets of people's comments ranging from '#foxnews is dead' to saying they have switched to watching Newsmax or OANN, Trump wrote: '@FoxNews daytime ratings have completely collapsed. Weekend daytime even WORSE. Very sad to watch this happen, but they forgot what made them successful, what got them there. They forgot the Golden Goose. The biggest difference between the 2016 Election, and 2020, was @FoxNews!'"

CNN (11/12, Stelter, 83.16M) reports on its website, "In the days since Fox and the other major networks called the election" for Biden, Trump "has been stoking anger at Fox and promoting the much smaller and often more conspiratorial right-wing networks Newsmax and One America News. ... Trump and Fox patriarch Rupert Murdoch have had a corporate marriage of convenience for five years."

McCarthy Says Boebert And Greene Have Both "Denounced QAnon," But Greene Has Not.

The Washington Post (11/12, Hawkins, 14.2M) reports House Minority Leader McCarthy on Thursday "defended two incoming Republican lawmakers who have voiced support for QAnon, falsely asserting that Marjorie Taylor Greene and Lauren Boebert have both denounced the baseless conspiracy theory." Asked about them at a news conference, McCarthy said, "Our party is very diverse. You mentioned two people who are going to join our party, and both of them have denounced QAnon." While Colorado's Boebert "has sought to distance herself from the online movement," Georgia's Greene "has not denounced QAnon."

National Parties Step Up Operations In Georgia Senate Runoffs.

The AP (11/12, Barrow, Nadler) reports that ahead of January's two Senate runoffs in Georgia, "both sides are playing to core supporters, the most reliable voters among the 5 million who split their ballots roughly evenly between the two parties in the first round. But for Democrats, it's seemingly a more piecemeal, voter-by-voter approach, while Republicans are pushing a broad branding message through mass media." The Democratic campaigns "still are limiting the scope of their in-person events as coronavirus cases spike nationally," but "they are quietly ramping up voter contact and registration efforts." Republicans are "embracing unrestricted in-person events," and are "using the events to embrace fully the nationalization of the runoffs."

Fox News (11/12, Steinhauer, 27.59M) reports on its website that the National Republican Senatorial Committee "is emphasizing that it's making 'major investments' in communications, data, field and digital operations in the state's twin Senate runoff elections." The Wall Street Journal (11/12, Wise, Subscription Publication, 7.57M) reports the NRSC and the campaigns of Sens. Kelly Loeffler (R-GA) and David Perdue (R-GA) have raised $32 million over the past six days, while Stacey Abrams' voting-rights group Fair Fight has raised about $9.8 million for the runoffs since Friday evening. NBC Nightly News (11/12, story 6, 2:10, Holt, 4.9M) aired a feature on Abrams and her organization.

The Los Angeles Times (11/12, 4.64M) says Georgia "has unexpectedly become host to a one-state referendum on a national question – Which party should control the U.S. Senate? – and the outcome will likely shape the ambitions of Joe Biden's presidency as well as his party's future." The Daily Caller (11/12, 716K) similarly writes, "If Republicans maintain their Senate majority, they would retain control over the confirmation process for members" of Biden's Cabinet.

GOP Wants Trump To Play Larger Role In Runoff Races. Politico (11/12, McGraw, 4.29M) reports that though the state "is at the center of a battle for Senate control," President Trump, "America's omnipresent political commentator, has remained mum. ... Outside of a few scattered tweets and retweets about specious claims of voter fraud in Georgia, Trump has made no public remarks about the state or the Senate runoffs there." Politico says his silence "has left some Republicans around Trump frustrated that the GOP's preeminent figure is leaving his party in the lurch at a critical moment. Trump's rallies and appearances, they argue, are a guaranteed way to drive interest in the state's two GOP Senate candidates."

Loeffler Ads Say Warnock Celebrates “Anti-American Hatred,” Praises “Marxism.” Reuters (11/12) reports Loeffler on Thursday “unleashed her first full-scale TV attack ads” on Raphael Warnock (D), with “two 30-second spots that accused the Democrat of celebrating ‘anti-American hatred,’ praising ‘Marxism’ and calling police thugs and gangsters.” The Atlanta Journal-Constitution (11/12, 895K) reports Warnock “responded to Loeffler’s ads at a press conference that [he] originally called to discuss his health care platform. He also used the moment to level harsh words of his own against the senator.” Warnock said, “Kelly Loeffler...sits down for interviews with known white supremacists and accepts the endorsement of a candidate who traffics in the QAnon conspiracy theory that is rife with hatred and bigotry. It is shameful.”

Malliotakis Defeats Rose In NY11.

The New York Times (11/12, Hughes, 18.61M) reports Assemblywoman Nicole Malliotakis (R), “overcoming a swell of anti-Trump sentiment in New York City,” has defeated Rep. Max Rose (D-NY) in NY11 “to give her party a lone seat in the city’s House delegation.” The Times says Rose’s defeat “was not completely unexpected. The district, which covers Staten Island and a portion of South Brooklyn, is the most conservative in the city; it was the only New York City congressional district that President Trump won in 2016,” and Trump led Joe Biden in the borough “by roughly 24 percentage points after the machine count of ballots.” The Daily Caller (11/12, 716K) reports Rose said Thursday “that he had called to offer his congratulations and concede to Malliotakis.”

The Washington Post (11/12, DeBonis, Firozi, 14.2M) reports House Minority Leader McCarthy said in a Wednesday interview that “the GOP would win the [House] majority in the 2022 midterms, citing the surprisingly diverse coalition of candidates – women and minorities – that allowed Republicans to exceed expectations up and down the ballot” this year. McCarthy said, “We have never been stronger in the sense of what the future holds for us – we have never been in a stronger position. We won this by adding more people to the party. And we won this in an atmosphere where we were the one group that everyone guaranteed we would lose. And we’re the ones who won.” The Hill (11/12, 2.98M) says “history has shown that the party that doesn’t control the White House typically picks up seats during a midterm election.”

While al-Assad "appears to be secure and the big battles have subsided" since protests calling for his ouster, "Syria is a shattered country, with Mr. al-Assad ruling only part of its territory" and "on top of material concerns, most of the refugees fled violence committed by Mr. al-Assad's government, and they now fear that going home could mean arrest or forced conscription into his army." al-Assad largely ignored such concerns in this week's conference, blaming "an international conspiracy" for the war and accusing "Arab and Western countries of...preventing [refugees] from returning."

FHFA: GSEs To Keep Buying Loans In Forbearance Through December 31.

HousingWire (11/12, 23K) reports that the FHFA "announced on Thursday that Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac will continue to buy qualified loans in forbearance, extending the temporary policy until Dec. 31, 2020 in order to continue its support of homeowners and mortgage lenders." According to HousingWire, "The initial temporary policy was set to expire May 31, 2020. However, the FHFA has made several subsequent extensions as it monitors the impact of the coronavirus." In a press release, the FHFA said, "Eligible loans will continue to be priced to mitigate the heightened risk of loss to the Enterprises from said loans. These prudential measures also ensure fulfillment of the Enterprises' charter requirements to only purchase loans that meet the purchase standards imposed by private, institutional mortgage investors." DS News (11/12, Babb) reports the FHFA "says it will continue to monitor the coronavirus' impact on renters, borrowers, and the mortgage market and update policies as needed." Freddie Mac: 30-Year FRM Average Rises From 2.78% To 2.84% On Heels Of Vaccine Announcement.

The Washington Post (11/12, Lerner, 14.2M) reports mortgage rates "rose last week, according to a Freddie Mac survey released Thursday, amid a mixed stock market sparked by investors reacting to a breakthrough coronavirus vaccine and a growing caseload." The 30-year FRM's average rate rose from 2.78% to 2.84%, down from 3.75% a year ago. The 15-year FRM average rose from 2.32% to 2.34%, up from 2.32% a year ago. The 5/1 ARM average rose from 2.89% to 3.11%, down from 3.44% a year ago. Freddie Mac Chief Economist Sam Khater said, "Mortgage rates jumped this week as a result of positive news about a COVID-19 vaccine. Despite this rise, mortgage rates remain about a percentage point below a year ago and the low rate environment is supportive of both purchase and refinance demand. Heading into late fall, the housing market continues to grow and buttress the economy."

The AP (11/12) reports that "historically low borrowing rates have bolstered demand from prospective homebuyers. Demand for homes has remained strong despite a brief slowdown in the early days of the coronavirus pandemic, but at the same time the rise in home prices has stretched the limits of affordability for many would-be buyers." MarketWatch (11/12, Passy, 1.67M) reports, "Economists and mortgage industry experts told MarketWatch they generally expect mortgage rates to remain low, at least by historical standards, in the near-term. While news like the vaccine announcement may push rates up or down a bit from week-to-week, rates won't move higher in earnest until it's clear the Federal Reserve is planning to adjust interest rates higher." However, "even if rates are higher, most observers expect the housing market to remain strong."

Observers Uncertain As To Likely Scope And Scale Of GSEs' 2021 Activity.

National Mortgage News (11/12) reports that there is currently "a lot of uncertainty around public policy and the pandemic that will determine to what extent government-related agencies will compete with investors in the private market for loans next year." GSE policymakers may consider "price adjustments and proposals that would decrease the GSEs' involvement in certain types of loan purchases," NMN says. According to NMN, the GSEs "could possibly stop purchasing" investment property loans next year "if policymakers were to decide such purchases are outside Fannie and Freddie's affordable housing mission. However, it's by no means a given, because ceasing those purchases could hurt the GSEs' ability to cross-subsidize other mortgages that do directly finance affordable-home purchases," according to SitusAMC's Tim Rood.

NAR: Student Loans Biggest Obstacle To Potential Buyers Saving For Down Payments.

HousingWire (11/12, 23K) reports that 47% of "potential homebuyers" surveyed for NAR's 2020 Profile of Home Buyers and Sellers "said student loan debt was the biggest obstacle in saving for a downpayment," with 43% of respondents citing "high rent/mortgages" and 36% citing "credit card debt" as "factors getting in the way of saving for a downpayment." Price growth is also an obstacle; according to HousingWire, over the course of 2020, "home prices have continued to tick upward due to low inventory and high demand. NAR said that the median downpayment for all homebuyers this year was 12% – 7% for first-timers and 16% for repeat buyers." RISMedia (11/12, 2K) also covers NAR's report.

NAR: Home Prices Rose An Annual 12% In Q3.

The Wall Street Journal (11/12, Friedman, Subscription Publication, 7.57M) reports house prices climbed across the US in Q3, with the median existing home price in every metro higher than it was a year earlier, according to the National Association of Realtors. Potentially behind a paywall, Bloomberg (11/12, Gopal, 4.73M) reports, "Prices for single-family homes across the U.S. increased 12% in the third quarter, the biggest annual jump in seven years." According to Bloomberg, "Mortgage rates near record lows have fueled a surge in demand, pushing buyers to compete for a scarce supply of listings. Many are rushing to the suburbs, looking for extra space to quarantine in comfort – searches that are likely to intensify now as Covid-19 infections soar to the highest levels in months." NAR Chief Economist Lawrence Yun said, "Favorable mortgage rates will continue to bring fresh buyers to the market. However, the affordability situation will not improve even with low interest rates because housing prices are increasing much too fast." Realtor (11/12, 25.12M) provides additional coverage.

HousingWire (11/12, 23K) reports Better.com "selected Bank of America and Morgan Stanley to prepare an initial public offering slated for 2021, according to sources cited by Bloomberg." Rumors in October suggested that Better.com was "raising a big funding round ahead of an IPO." Around that time, CEO Vishal Garg "told FinLedger that Better.com went from losing money to achieving 'enviable profit margins,' largely reflecting "heavier loan volumes, which have been driven primarily by refinancings." According to HousingWire, "The firm, headquartered in New York, is looking to gobble up market share through its tech platform and the convenience it provides prospective borrowers. Better.com sells its mortgages to Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac and then partners with sub-servicers to handle loan servicing. Per data from Recursion Companies, Better.com originated about $4.6 billion in mortgages during the third quarter, making it the 32nd largest lender in the country."

Whalen: FOMC Is Artificially Boosting Loan Volume, But Credit And Operational Risk Issues

Will Emerge.

Writing for National Mortgage News (11/12), Whalen Global Advisors LLC Chairman Christopher Whalen says the Federal Open Market Committee is "stepping on the gas in terms of market intervention, meaning that prepayment rates are likely to remain elevated." In addition, "Back in October of 2019, Ginnie Mae 3% coupon MSR's were being capitalized at 5x annual cash flow or around 150 basis points (32 bps annually x 5). Today, those same Ginnie Mae 3% coupon MSR's are being capitalized at 3x annual cash flow – or 90 bps – and that level is still too high given visible prepayment speeds." According to Whalen, "the boom in mortgage lending is due to low interest rates and aggressive asset purchases by the FOMC," but lenders will see "declining profits and loan quality overall. And as and when new lending volumes start to recede, even with the FOMC's actions, the shoals of credit and operational risk lurking just beneath the surface will emerge."

Reuters \(UK\) (11/13, Westbrook) reports, "The Japanese yen edged higher on Friday as investors crept back to the safe-haven currency, worried about the economic damage of a trying winter in Europe and the United States as COVID-19 cases continue to surge." The yen "rose 0.2% to 104.90 per dollar in the Asia session, its highest since Monday when it tumbled after Pfizer announced that it had developed a working virus vaccine." The euro "rose marginally overnight to clamber back over $1.18, but it is down about 0.6% for the week so far, helping the dollar index to a 0.7% weekly rise."

Gold Rises.

Reuters \(IND\) (11/13, Soreng) reports, "Although fears over the economic fallout from mounting COVID-19 cases supported prices on Friday, gold was headed for its biggest weekly loss since September after positive news about a potential vaccine." Spot gold "rose 0.2% to $1,879.20 per ounce by 0814 GMT, but was down 3.7% for the week. U.S. gold futures gained 0.3% to $1,878.20."

Oil Falls.

Reuters (11/13, Obayashi) reports, "Oil prices fell on Friday, pressured by fears about a slow recovery in the global economy and fuel demand due to rising COVID-19 infections, but the market remained on track for a second straight weekly gain, helped by hopes for a vaccine." Brent crude "was down 51 cents, or 1.2%, at $43.02 a barrel as of 0741 GMT, after dropping 0.6% on Thursday." US West Texas Intermediate crude futures "fell 66 cents, or 1.6%, to $40.46 a barrel, having lost 0.8% on Thursday."

Israeli Cybersecurity Firm Finds New Type Of Iranian Ransomware.

Fox News (11/12, Friling, 27.59M) reports, "Check Point revealed Thursday a new type of ransomware that is traced back to Iran." The "Pay2Key" strain "targeted more than a dozen Israeli companies a few weeks ago," using the "Remote Desktop Protocol (RDP) of employees who worked from home." According to the Israeli cybersecurity company's investigation, "four Israeli victims of the attacks have decided to pay the ransom, which enabled its experts to track the payment transfers between crypto wallets." Check Point's manager of threat intelligence, Lotem Finkelstein, said, "Pay2Key is sophisticated and far more rapid compared to other ransomware strains. ... The recent Pay2Key ransomware attacks indicate a new threat actor has joined the trend of targeted ransomware attacks."

Finland Prepares Change To Code Law After Hacking Case.

The AP (11/12, Tanner) reports, "Finland said Thursday it was preparing legislation that would allow citizens to change their personal identity codes in cases of gross data breaches that carry a high risk of identity theft." The government's proposal "was designed primarily to assist thousands of people whose personal information was stolen during a hacking of patient records at a private Finnish psychotherapy center." Citizens "receive a personal identity code at birth to allow them to access most public and many private services," and the "criteria for changing one's code are strict." The government is drafting legislation that "would make the process slightly easier."

NSA Grant To Help Two Indiana Campuses Expand Cybersecurity Programs.

The Northwest Indiana Post-Tribune (11/13, Kiesling, 1.8M) reports, thanks to a $5.9 million NSA grant, "two local campuses of Ivy Tech Community College plan to expand their cybersecurity training partnerships in Northwest Indiana." The Lake County and Valparaiso campuses "are included in a consortium of four higher ed institutions that has been awarded a two-year, $5.9 million NSA grant to expand the pipeline for cybersecurity jobs both locally and nationally." Matthew Cloud, Information Technology chair for Ivy Tech's Lake County campus, said, "The NSA grant will help us build and expand our existing training program partnerships with the governor's office, financial institutions and law enforcement agencies in Northwest Indiana to fill their needs." Cloud added, "The grant will help more than 425 law enforcement personnel, military veterans, transitioning military, and other first responders obtain basic to advanced cybersecurity training for free."

Trump Order Prohibits Americans From Investing In Companies That Aid China's Military.

The Wall Street Journal (11/12, Lubold, Lim, Subscription Publication, 7.57M) reports President Trump has signed an executive order barring Americans from investing in a group of 31 Chinese companies the Administration says support the Chinese military. The order prohibits American companies and individuals from owning shares directly or through funds in any of the companies.

The New York Times (11/12, Swanson, 18.61M) reports the list of companies "includes prominent Chinese technology, manufacturing and infrastructure companies, such as China Mobile Communications Group, China Telecommunications Corporation, Huawei, Sinochem Group, Hangzhou Hikvision Digital Technology, China Railway Construction Corporation, Inspur Group and Aviation Industry Corporation of China." But, the Washington Post (11/12, Whalen, Lynch, 14.2M) says the order's impact "is unclear. The affected companies do not appear to include China's major publicly traded tech firms, and several of the companies said to be affected by the prohibition, including Huawei, don't trade on stock markets. Others are large state-owned defense contractors, such as China Electronics Technology Group Corp., that don't have foreign stockholders."

Reuters (11/12, Pamuk, Alper, Ali) says this is Trump's "first major policy initiative...since losing the Nov. 3 election to Democratic rival Joe Biden and indicates that he is seeking to take advantage of the waning months of his administration to crack down on China, even as he has appeared laser-focused on challenging the election result." Politico (11/12, Bade, 4.29M) reports, "It's unclear how Biden will deal with this and other last-minute Trump moves. His transition team declined to comment on the order."

Secretary of State Pompeo said on KPAM-AM . Portland, OR (11/12, 459), "Make no mistake about the work that we're doing to counter the threat from the Chinese Communist Party continues. So, there's still a fair amount of work to do. The State Department's got work to do. Treasury's still got some things that they're going to do. And I'm confident the White House will have decisions that it will make as well, each of which will be designed to continue the effort that is historic, that the President took on this recognition that bending a knee, appeasing China, giving them an exception to every international ruleset, puts American jobs and prosperity at risk."

"Health Heroes" Program Sends Seized Funds To Venezuela Covid-19 Workers In Rare Opposition Victory.

Reuters (11/12, Ellsworth, Sequera) reports the US "has imposed a series of sanctions on the socialist Venezuelan government of [President Nicholas] Maduro in an effort to dislodge him from power, accusing him of corruption, human rights violations, and rigging his 2018 re-election." The US "and dozens of other countries have recognized [Venezuelan opposition leader Juan] Guaido as the rightful head-of-state, but Maduro retains the support of the military and controls state functions." The "Health Heroes" program, an effort by Guaido to "channel seized offshore funds to those on the front lines" of the battle with Covid-19, "marks the first time Guaido's opposition has managed to directly transfer funds frozen by the United States as part of its sanctions." Health Heroes "taps into some $342 million held by Venezuela's central bank in offshore funds in the United States and seized under sanctions," with each recipient approved by Treasury's Office of Foreign Assets Control.

Federal Reserve

Senate Could Vote To Confirm Trump Nominee To Fed Board Of Governors Next Week.

The Washington Post (11/12, Siegel, 14.2M) reports a Senate vote to confirm Judy Shelton, President Trump's nominee to the Federal Reserve Board of Governors, could come as soon as next week, "giving the president another chance to shape the long-term direction of one of the government's most powerful entities." Senate Republicans indicated Thursday "that they planned to vote on her long-pending nomination during the lame-duck session of Congress next week." The Post says her confirmation "could mark Trump's final imprint on the Fed board before the Biden administration is inaugurated in January."

The Hill (11/12, Bolton, 2.98M) says Senate Majority Leader McConnell filed a cloture motion on Shelton's nomination moments after Sen. Lisa Murkowski (R-AK) announced she would support her. The Wall Street Journal (11/12, Timiraos, Subscription Publication, 7.57M) reports analysts say McConnell's move is an indication Shelton likely has the votes she needs for confirmation.

The AP (11/12, Rugaber) says Shelton's path to confirmation "may have been eased by Joe Biden's victory in the presidential election." When Trump announced her nomination, "many analysts noted that if she became a Fed governor and Trump won reelection, he could nominate her to replace Jerome Powell, the current chair, whose term expires in February 2022. Now that Trump has lost his reelection bid, there is no prospect for Shelton to become chair, which may have made it easier for GOP senators to support her nomination."

Bloomberg (11/12, Wasson, Condon, Litvan, 4.73M) says Shelton is "one of two of...Trump's Fed nominees pending in the Senate," and "if she and Trump's other pick, Christopher Waller, are confirmed, the outgoing president will have put five of seven members on the U.S. central bank's board."

Reuters (11/12, Saphir), MarketWatch (11/12, Nicholson, 1.67M), the Financial Times (11/12, Politi, Subscription Publication, 1.34M), and CNBC (11/12, Cox, 3.62M) also report.

Powell: Increase In Coronavirus Cases Could Impact Economic Recovery.

The Wall Street Journal (11/12, Timiraos, Subscription Publication, 7.57M) reports Fed Chair Powell said during a virtual panel discussion with ECB President Christine Lagarde and Bank of England Governor Andrew Bailey Thursday that it is too early to tell what impact the search for a coronavirus vaccine will have on the US economy, especially since recent increases in infections could undermine the economic recovery.

Bloomberg (11/12, Boesler, Skolimowski, 4.73M) quotes Powell as saying, "We do see the economy continuing on a solid path of recovery, but the main risk we see to that is clearly the further spread of the disease here in the United States. ... With the virus now spreading, the next few months could be challenging."

Reuters (11/12, Schneider, Saphir, Burns), Newsweek (11/12, Zhao, 1.53M), The Hill (11/12, Lane, 2.98M), and CNBC (11/12, Cox, 3.62M) also report.

Powell Says Pandemic Has Changed The US Economy. CNN (11/12, Tappe, 83.16M) reports Powell said that although the economy has started to recover, "We're recovering, but to a different economy." CNN adds, "The pandemic has accelerated existing trends in the economy and society, including the increasing use of technology, telework and automation, he said. This will have lasting effects on how people live and work." Powell said, "Even after the unemployment rate goes down and there's a vaccine, there's going to be a probably substantial group of workers who are going to need support as they're finding their way in the post-pandemic economy, because it's going to be different in some fundamental ways."

Powell Says Fed Incorporating Climate Change Risk "Into All That We Do."

Bloomberg (11/12, Condon, 4.73M) reports Fed Chair Jerome Powell "said the U.S. central bank has been cooperating with its counterparts around the world to address risks presented by climate change." Powell said during a virtual panel hosted by the ECB, "What we're really working on is: how do we incorporate climate change risk into all that we do. It has potential implications for monetary policy, for bank regulation, for financial stability, and I would say we're in the very early stages of trying to work through what that means for our goals." Powell "said the Fed is in the process of applying for membership in the Network for Central Banks and Supervisors for Greening the Financial System, an international group formed in 2017."

Financial Regulatory Agencies

CFPB's Consumer Data Rule To Be Another Long-Running Policy Battle.

American Banker (11/12, Berry, Subscription Publication, 31K) reports "analysts predict a new rulemaking still in its early phase" at the CFPB "could soon dominate" the agency's agenda. American Banker explains, "In seeking to write a rule around how much control consumers have over their own financial data, the agency is tackling one of the thorniest issues affecting banks, fintechs and data aggregators." American Banker adds, "Unlike other regulations affecting single industries, the consumer data rule could be all-encompassing," and the agency is working on the consumer data rule ahead of a possible change in leadership.

Office of the Comptroller of the Currency

OCC's Brooks: US Needs To Focus On Private Sector In Global Race Toward Digital Currencies.

The CoinTelegraph (11/12, Pirus, 14K) reports, "Amid a global race toward central bank digital currencies, or CBDCs, the United States needs to focus on the private sector, says Acting Comptroller of the Currency Brian Brooks." In a House Financial Services Committee hearing Thursday, Brooks said, "I don't think in this country we need to wait to build a command and control government solution. I think the private sector is on it, and I think the role of the regulators on this panel is to provide a framework to make sure there aren't bank runs or other problems that consumers would be affected by."

Waters Vows To Undo Easing Of Financial Regulations Under Trump.

Politico (11/12, Warmbrodt, 4.29M) reports that on Thursday, House Financial Services Chair Maxine Waters (D-CA) "said she will fight to reverse the easing of financial rules that has taken place under President Donald Trump, calling the election of Joe Biden 'the dawn of a new progressive America.'" According to Politico, Waters "made the pledge at a hearing with top Trump appointees from the Federal Reserve, Federal Deposit Insurance Corp., Office of the Comptroller of the Currency and the National Credit Union Administration." Politico says Waters "slammed the OCC's 'harmful' revisions to anti-redlining rules under the Community Reinvestment Act, the landmark 1977 law that was intended to stop discrimination in lending," and "also cited looser approaches by Trump appointees to speculative trading restrictions under the so-called Volcker Rule as well as capital requirements for the biggest banks."

The Hill (11/12, Budryk, 2.98M) and Fox News (11/12, Rambaran, 27.59M) provide similar coverage.

FDIC's McWilliams Tells House Panel She Intends To Finish Her Term.

American Banker (11/12, Haggerty, Subscription Publication, 31K) reports FDIC Chair Jelena McWilliams "told a House panel Thursday that she plans to remain in her position until her term expires in 2023." In response to Rep. Emanuel Cleaver (D-MO)'s question about whether the Trump-appointed regulator was preparing for a new administration, McWilliams "said that the FDIC has taken the appropriate steps to prepare for the new administration and that she will work with whoever is nominated to sit alongside her on the FDIC board," adding, "I intend to fulfill the remainder of my term." McWilliams appeared virtually before the House Financial Services Committee along with Acting Comptroller of the Currency Brian Brooks, Federal Reserve Vice Chair of Supervision Randal Quarles, and National Credit Union Administration Chair Rodney Hood.

OCC Aims To Address Wealth Inequality With Project REACH.

KOKI-TV (11/12, 20K) reported, "A House panel report says banks generally lacked diversity with their senior ranks and their corporate boards. So there are concerns about that impacting the approval of loans and financial options offered to minority communities in need of help because of the pandemic..." To address wealth inequality, the OCC started Project REACH over the summer. Through the project, the agency "is working to eliminate obstacles to credit for 45 million people with no usable credit score to expand affordable housing for those who cannot afford higher down payment requirements and to reinstate minority banks that serve often neglected communities."

Analysis: Potential Financial Regulators In A Biden Administration.

Reuters (11/12, Schroeder, Johnson) reports Joe Biden's team "has tapped a mix of progressives and centrist policy experts, including former derivatives market regulator Gary Gensler, to lead a transition plan for financial industry oversight." According to "nearly two dozen lobbyists and policy experts in Democratic circles," if Biden takes the White House in January, "there will be a handful of banking regulator roles to fill, with the first likely to be comptroller of the currency." Current Comptroller Brian Brooks "is serving in an acting capacity."

Experts Debate Whether Biden Administration Would Be Good For Crypto.

Finance Magnates (11/12, McIntosh) reports Joe Biden "has never taken any strong public stance on cryptocurrency policy," but as president, he would "almost definitely be required to speak and make decisions about cryptocurrencies at some point." Other arms of the government "have already begun to move forward with policies that affect the cryptocurrency industry in significant ways." For example, the OCC allows banks to custody crypto. Ulrik Lykke, Executive Director at cryptocurrency hedge fund ARK36, said, "Biden himself historically has favored stronger regulation on the digital world," but "it must be noted that several of Biden's [likely] advisers are more pro-crypto than was the case for Trump's cabinet."

Editorial Wrap-Up

Washington Post.

"Some Local Officials Are Resisting Trump's Big Lie. Sadly, GOP Senators Aren't As Principled." The Washington Post (11/12, 14.2M) says in an editorial that President Trump "is attempting to overturn the lawful results of a free election by spreading lies and suborning local officials to abet his conspiracy. He is not likely to succeed, but the toxic effects on U.S. democracy will not soon dissipate. ... Though conducted by partisan officials, the mechanisms of vote-counting and election-certifying have until now been understood to be formalities based on actual vote counts. Vote counting cannot depend on which party can more effectively manipulate the machinery of government."

"The Pandemic Is Galloping Ahead. The President Is AWOL." The Washington Post (11/12, 14.2M) editorializes, "The pandemic has reached runaway speed in the United States, and the president has vanished. ... On Wednesday, 1,549 people died from the virus in the United States. Would the leadership of the nation be on high alert if, say, that many people were killed in three jumbo jet crashes? If a terrorist group or foreign attacker drew such an awful toll on a single day? Yet there was not a word from President Trump, so self-absorbed with his election defeat and the mirage of voter fraud that he seems unable and unwilling to deal with a supreme national crisis."

"Voters Made Clear: The War On Drugs Isn't Working." The Washington Post (11/12, 14.2M) says that Election Day votes to legalize recreational marijuana in New Jersey, Arizona, South Dakota, and Montana, medical marijuana in Mississippi, and decriminalize "small quantities" of hard drugs in Oregon "mark a welcome shift in decades of destructive drug policy" beginning with "the Reagan-era escalation of the war on drugs." The Post says "severe criminal penalties have fueled a huge growth in the prison population" with an outsized impact on many Black communities, while soaring opioid overdose deaths have underscored "just how cruel and counterproductive it is to criminalize addiction." With new state legislation, The Post argues, researchers will now "be able to closely observe these laboratories of democracy, hopefully ushering in a new phase of drug policy based on evidence and the principles of public health."

Wall Street Journal.

"Joe Biden's Lockdown Lobby." The Wall Street Journal (11/12, Subscription Publication, 7.57M) says Joe Biden's coronavirus advisory committee members believe lockdowns are beneficial, but in fact they would have negative economic and public health consequences. The Journal advises Biden to diversify by calling the Great Barrington Declaration authors to join his committee.

"Covid And The Church In Delaware." The Wall Street Journal (11/12, Subscription Publication, 7.57M) says the decision by Delaware Gov. John Carney (D) to settle with a pastor alleging the state's emergency orders discriminate against churches means Carney has agreed to treat houses of worship neutrally.

"Harvard Vs. Asian-Americans." The Wall Street Journal (11/12, Subscription Publication, 7.57M) argues that cases around affirmative action like the Harvard case continue to surface because the Supreme Court has failed to offer clear definitions of how or how much race should be considered as a factor in admissions. The Journal says that an appeal presents an opportunity for the Supreme Court to offer clarification in accordance with the majority opinion of Americans who reject the consideration of race.

Last Laughs

Late Night Political Humor.

Conan O'Brien: "I'm trying to figure out which snack [Joe Biden] looks like. It was obvious that Trump looked like a Cheeto. The whole country was unified. We agreed he looked like an orange Cheeto. Everybody was in on it. OK? Now, we have a new president, and it's imperative that we determine what snack he looks like as soon as possible."

Trevor Noah: "Honestly I know it seems irresponsible, but I think it is great for people to gather during a pandemic to celebrate Thanksgiving because isn't that what Thanksgiving is all about, spreading a disease that wipes out a continent? I'm actually surprised Republicans still want Thanksgiving this year. After Joe Biden won, can you imagine what Thanksgiving is going to be like?"

Jimmy Kimmel: "Thanks for joining us for day nine of 'squattergate,' or 'reality is starting to peek through the windows of the White House.' The President might be going down with the ship, but many of the rats are putting their little bathing suits on amid increasing skepticism that their boss will be able to pull another rabbit out of his MAGA hat."

Jimmy Kimmel: "One reason Trump's advisors are so worried he might not be able to win is because he lost. And those don't go together."

Jimmy Kimmel: "The big orange guy is said to be feeling blue. [President Trump] is reportedly dejected and fuming. And soon he's going to understand what it feels like to be evicted from your home in the middle of a pandemic."

Jimmy Kimmel: "Trump has been floating the idea that he'd run again in 2024. And 2028. And 2032. Every election for the rest of our lives, we'll have a Donald Trump in it. We're never getting rid of this guy. Like herpes and the McRib, he'll just keep coming back."

Jimmy Kimmel: "The win in Alaska earned [Trump] three electoral votes. Not enough to win the presidency. I think I have an idea that can make everyone happy. ... Why don't we just make him President of Alaska? He'd love it. It even sounds like the names of his wives and daughters. Melania, Ivana, Ivanka, Alaska."

Jimmy Kimmel: "He'd for sure be the tannest person there. He'd like that. Think of plenty of wide-open spaces to build big ugly buildings and put their name on them. Donnie, Jr. would have a lot of endangered species to shoot. And he could marry Sarah Palin. She's like a Melania who likes you. ... You'd be surrounded by people who agree with you. You'll be able to see Russia from your house. It's everything you could dream. Let's make him first president of the last frontier, Alaska. It's big, it's white, it's melting down, and it has lots of crabs, just like Donald Trump."

Jimmy Kimmel: "Ivanka is said to be concerned a fight to stay in office could tarnish her father's legacy. ... Her father's legacy is going to be a rusted, half-finished section of wall on the border of Arizona."

Jimmy Kimmel: "We learned today that yet another member of Trump's inner circle has tested positive for the coronavirus. This time, Corey Lewandowski. And I'm told that Corey feels almost as awful as he is."

Jimmy Kimmel: "How has Rudy not gotten COVID? Somebody needs to find out which animal's blood he's drinking midnight on Halloween. It might have the vaccine in it."

Stephen Colbert: "No matter how much he screams about it, no one believes the President's claims of victory. Not even the President."

Because aides say he has no real plan to overturn the results. Same way he defeated COVID."

Stephen Colbert: "In fact, the President is so sure he lost that he is talking privately about running again in 2024. Whaa? He is going to be so old by then! Forget descending an escalator. He'll have to make his announcement from a staircase chair lift. I mean, the guy is 74 now. By 2024, he'll be 78! Which is-- exactly the right age for a president. It's just a number, Joe! You go get 'em, buddy!"

Stephen Colbert: "According to a Reuters/Ipsos...post-election poll, nearly 80 percent of Americans recognize Biden as the winner. Do you know how hard it is to get 80 percent of Americans to agree on anything that isn't smothered in melted cheese?"

Stephen Colbert: "Apparently, Joe Biden has yet to receive a presidential daily briefing, and it's unclear whether his team will have access to classified information. Well, sure, if Biden wants access to classified national security intel, he's got to go through the proper channels and buy a membership at Mar-a-Lago."

Stephen Colbert: "Seems like no one around the President has the nerve to tell him he lost. One GOP source said, 'It's like dealing with a lunatic on the subway. Everyone just kind of sits and stares ahead, pretends they can't hear him, and waits for him to eventually get off.'"

Stephen Colbert: "Despite clinging to the job desperately, he's not actually doing it. The last intelligence briefing on the President's schedule was for October 2nd. He really should take the briefings because I'm sure they're full of valuable information. For instance, he might find out that the US elected a new president."

Stephen Colbert: "Around the world, autocrats are watching. One expert on Eastern Europe told reporters, 'The President's refusal to concede would create a new model for like-minded populists in Europe.' Well, that's convenient timing. Because I'm pretty sure he's going to start looking for a new model from Eastern Europe."

Stephen Colbert: "The President might not have a plan, but he's still asking supporters to donate to his official election defense fund. And he's not being subtle about it. On the website, the buttons are dancing for cash. ... And there are perks. For a donation of $2,800, you can 'join the first family circle.' That's got to be so tempting for Eric. (As Eric) 'Please let me in! I'll get the money!'"

Stephen Colbert: "According to the website, at least half of each donation will go to paying off the campaign's debts. One last gift for the road. Before he finally leaves, someone better check under his MAGA hat for White House silverware."

Stephen Colbert: "Regardless of what's going on in the White House, Biden's already putting the wheels in motion. He's named a transition team including people like Kiran Ahujcha, Michelle Howard, Chris Lu, Pamela Melroy, Kevin Washburn, and Geovette Washington. Do you have any idea who those people are? Neither do I, and I love it! Not one of them has an infomercial, or a sports blog, or is related to Joe Biden."

Stephen Colbert: "Yesterday, Biden announced his chief of staff. It's veteran Democratic advisor...Ron Klain. Klain was Biden's chief of staff when he was vice president and, according to Washington insiders, this hiring is an early signal that Biden intends to rely heavily on experience, competence and political agility after this presidency. After four years of getting our dental work done by the ear-piercing teen at Claire's, America's ready to try a dentist. Though we'll still be spitting out plastic rhinestones for years."

Jimmy Fallon: "Well, guys, in public President Trump hasn't given up on the election, but the big story is in private, he's been telling people he wants to start his own right wing conservative media network to take on Fox News. Finally, a chance to hear what Trump has to say."

Jimmy Fallon: "That's right, Trump will base his new network in the media capital of the world: the Four Seasons Total Landscaping in Philadelphia."

Jimmy Fallon: "After four years, Trump only got 12 miles of new [border] wall built. ... I've shopped at Costcos bigger than that."

Jimmy Fallon: "Trump's like a dad who promises to build a tree house and now there's just a pile of wood in the back yard and three rungs of a ladder going up the tree. It's like, 'You're too old for a tree anyway.' 'I wasn't when you started.'"

Jimmy Fallon: "Trump's had four chiefs of staff. One quit, one was fired, one has COVID, and the fourth went out to get a pack of cigarettes and never came back."

Seth Meyers: "Well, it's day six of Trump watch. He is still refusing to leave the White House, but we do hear he's willing to speak to negotiators. 'I want $400 million, a copy of 'Swank,' and one of those Doritos locos tacos.'"

Seth Meyers: "President-elect Joe Biden has selected his long-time political advisor, Ron Klain, to be his White House chief of staff. ... Klain said the job would be, quote, 'the honor of a lifetime.' As opposed to the Trump Administration where the position of chief of staff was more like the honor of a month or two."

Seth Meyers: "President-elect Joe Biden is reportedly planning to reverse President Trump's immigration policies. That's right, he's going to tear down the blueprints for the wall!"

Seth Meyers: "Twitter confirmed this week that President Trump will be subject to their rules just like any other user once President-elect Joe Biden takes office on January 20th. 'Same,' said the southern district of New York."

James Corden: "President Trump has been angrily disputing the results of the election for the last week. ... [Aides] say he is fighting the election results mostly as a performance for his voters. Okay, good. As long as he is just doing it to waste an entire country's time, that's fine."

James Corden: "On top of that, Trump's public schedule shows that the President has little interest in actual work. He hasn't had an intelligence briefing since early October. Which is too bad, because if he had, he might actually know that he lost the election."

James Corden: "According to another new report, not only will Trump run for President again in 2024, he may announce it before Joe Biden is inaugurated, and possibly before the end of the year. So Merry Christmas, America."

James Corden: "But that's not all Trump has his eyes set on. He is apparently so unhappy with the way Fox News covered him that he is planning to start his own digital media company to compete against it. It's like he heard someone say no one is more biased than Fox News, and he took that as a personal challenge."

James Corden: "A Trump streaming network. They already have a few shows in development. There is 'Who Wants To Pretend To Be A Billionaire.' 'White-ish.' And 'Dictators In Cars Getting Coffee.' You know my favorite that he has come up with? 'Judge Rudy.'"

Treasury in the News

McConnell Says "Another Rescue Package" Needs To Be Passed This Year.

The Washington Post (11/4, Werner, 14.2M) reports during a news conference Wednesday, Senate Majority Leader McConnell "said...that an economic stimulus bill should be completed before the end of the year and will be the focus when the Senate resumes work next week" and "that state and local aid – a longtime Democratic demand – could be part of the legislation." McConnell said, "We need another rescue package. The Senate goes back into session next Monday. Hopefully the partisan passions that prevented us from doing another rescue package will subside with the election. And I think we need to do it and I think we need to do it before the end of the year. ... It's a possibility we will do more for state and local governments." The Post says the comments "could open the door to a new phase in economic relief talks that have sputtered off and on for months," and Reuters (11/4, Cornwell) says McConnell "put[ting] his weight behind passage by the end of this year" gave the push for a new aid bill "a post-election boost."

CNBC (11/4, Franck, 3.62M) reports on its website that McConnell's comments "could rekindle relief talks between the two parties after months of stalled negotiations" between Treasury Secretary Steven Mnuchin and House Speaker Nancy Pelosi. However, Politico (11/4, Levine, 4.29M) says in a "sign of the enormous political hurdle ahead, Democrats and Republicans still cannot agree on a price tag for the stimulus package, and it's unclear if a lame duck session will only contribute to the stalemate."

Bloomberg (11/4, Wasson, 4.73M) reports Democrats "face a loss of leverage in negotiations" after "a disappointing showing on Election Day that left...McConnell potentially with a renewed mandate as majority leader." Bloomberg says that if Pelosi "continues to insist on a package greater than the $1.9 trillion offered by the White House, she will face pressure to compromise quickly from the remaining moderate Democrats who are vital to the party's House majority."

Kudlow: Administration Will Continue Push For Gov't Funding, Covid-19 Stimulus Bills. Reuters (11/4, Heavey) reports NEC Director Larry Kudlow on Wednesday "said the Trump administration planned to push ahead with its agenda this year even as the election results remained unknown, including a continuing resolution to fund the government and a possible COVID-19 stimulus bill." Kudlow said in a CNBC interview he would "be meeting with the president regarding an agenda. We have a lame-duck Congress, but we have a lot of work to do." Kudlow "added that he would also meet with U.S. Treasury Secretary Steve Mnuchin later on Wednesday, adding that it was unclear if the coronavirus relief would be tied to the funding measure."

Treasury Plans Expanded Sales Of Long-Term Debt.

Bloomberg (11/4, McCormick, 4.73M) reports the Treasury Department "further expanded sales of longer-term debt in its issuance plan for coming months as it anticipates more fiscal stimulus to shore up the economic recovery." As the result of the US presidential election remains uncertain, Treasury on Wednesday "said it will issue $122 billion of notes and bonds at next week's so-called quarterly refunding auctions – the third straight quarterly record." Treasury "also detailed plans over the coming months to boost sales of 20-year bonds along with coupon-bearing debt across maturities from two-year through seven-year notes."

MarketWatch (11/4, Robb, 1.67M), Reuters (11/4, Kerber), and The Wall Street Journal (11/4, Davidson, Subscription Publication, 7.57M) also report.

Leading National News

Biden Just Shy Of Electoral Vote Majority As Trump Campaign Launches Legal Challenges.

Media reports cast Joe Biden as on the verge of being declared president-elect, with the AP giving Biden 264 electoral votes, Biden leading in Nevada, and President Trump's narrow leads in Georgia and Pennsylvania dwindling as legally cast by-mail ballots continue to be counted. In addition to his electoral vote advantage, Biden also leads Trump in the popular vote by about 3.5 million. Coverage is critical of the President's efforts to halt vote counting in some of the remaining states while urging counting to continue in others.

On Wednesday afternoon, Michigan was called for Biden, which David Muir on ABC World News Tonight (11/4, lead story, 4:45, 6.93M) called "a crucial part of Biden's strategy to try to rebuild that 'blue wall' for Democrats." Muir said Biden also won Wisconsin "by about the same margin President Trump won that state four years ago. Tonight, the President's campaign now saying it will demand a recount in Wisconsin." Norah O'Donnell said on the CBS Evening News (11/4, lead story, 2:50, 3.94M), "The President's path to victory has narrowed significantly with more votes now counted. Absentee and early ballots have dramatically shifted the lead in several battleground states from President Trump to Joe Biden. ... The President is already heading to court tonight, trying to stop the vote count in Pennsylvania." On NBC Nightly News (11/4, lead story, 2:10, Holt, 5.79M), Chuck Todd said Biden is "leading in Arizona right now and leading in Nevada, and if he holds on to both of those he is right at the number" needed to election and "doesn't need any of these three East Coast states" – Georgia, North Carolina, and Pennsylvania – that remain too close to call. As for Trump, "not only would he need Pennsylvania...but some place else. Alaska wouldn't give it to him. He needs two more electoral votes somewhere."

ABC World News Tonight (11/4, story 2, 2:40, Muir, 6.93M) reported Biden spoke Wednesday afternoon alongside running mate Sen. Kamala Harris (D-CA), "appearing cautious but confident, Biden saying every vote must be counted." ABC's Mary Bruce: "A confident Joe Biden with Kamala Harris by his side, declaring victory is within his reach." Biden: "I'm not here to declare that we've won, but I am here to report when the count is finished, we believe we will be the winners." Bruce: "Biden says he's ahead in Wisconsin, ahead in Michigan, confident he flipped Arizona and feeling good about Pennsylvania." Kristen Welker said on NBC Nightly News (11/4, story 5, 2:50, Holt, 5.79M) that Biden also took "a not-so-veiled swipe at President Trump, who falsely claimed he won overnight with millions of votes yet to be counted." Biden: "Now, every vote must be counted. No one's going to take our democracy away from us. Not now, not ever." The New York Daily News (11/4, Sommerfeldt, Shahrighian, 2.52M) reports Biden "appeared to brush aside" Trump's tactics, saying, "We won with the majority of the American people. Every indication is that the majority will grow."

The AP (11/4, Lemire, Miller, Colvin, Jaffe) reports Biden said at his afternoon news conference that "he now expected to win the presidency, though he stopped short of outright declaring victory." Biden said, "I will govern as an American president. There will be no red states and blue states when we win. Just the United States of America." The AP calls it "a stark contrast to Trump, who on Wednesday falsely proclaimed that he had won the election, even though millions of votes remained uncounted and the race was far from over." Reuters (11/4, Hunnicutt) says Trump "has spent months seeking to undermine the credibility of the voting process in case he lost and accusing Democrats, without evidence, of seeking to steal the election."

The New York Times (11/4, Cooper, Landler, 18.61M) says "the undecided presidential election entered a new phase on Wednesday" with Biden's wins in Michigan and Wisconsin. The Times says "the lingering uncertainty...was perhaps unsurprising in an election with record-breaking turnout where most ballots were cast before Election Day but many could not be counted until afterward." Fox News (11/4, Dorman, 27.59M) says on its website that Biden is "just one major swing state" away from victory, while Politico (11/4, Siders, 4.29M) says "Trump's path to reelection was nearly closed off" by Biden's Wednesday wins.

USA Today (11/4, Behrmann, 10.31M) reports that though Biden "did not secure the quick and decisive outcome some in the party had hoped for, he has edged closer to a result that many observers had predicted: A deficit on Election Day in battleground states that was slowly erased and turned into narrow leads when the crush of absentee ballots were counted. ... Pennsylvania remains a must-win for Trump, but mail-in ballots that make up the remaining votes are expected to continue heavily favor Biden and could give him an edge to carry the Keystone State." The Wall Street Journal (11/4, Ballhaus, Subscription Publication, 7.57M) reports Biden expressed confidence about winning Pennsylvania on Wednesday, noting that he has so far won 78% of the by-mail vote in the state.

The Philadelphia Inquirer (11/4, Lai) writes, "Of the many uncertainties this election, one thing was fairly predictable: [Trump] would look like he was coasting to victory in Pennsylvania on election night, but then there would be what's known as a 'blue shift' toward Joe Biden as votes were counted in the hours and days afterward. ... That's exactly what's happened – and is happening now." ABC World News Tonight (11/4, story 4, 2:55, Muir, 6.93M), the CBS Evening News (11/4, story 6, 1:20, O'Donnell, 3.94M), and NBC Nightly News (11/4, story 6, 1:30, Holt, 5.79M) all had reports on the ongoing vote count in Pennsylvania.

In Georgia, the Atlanta Journal-Constitution (11/4, 895K) reports, "the large number of remaining absentee ballots could delay final election results for several days." The Charlotte Observer (11/4, 470K) reports that North Carolina "is one of several battleground states where provisional and absentee ballots are still being counted. ... The process, spelled out in state law, means it's likely that the winner of North Carolina's 15 electoral votes for president won't be known until Nov. 12 or 13."

Trump Campaign Files Lawsuits In Several Key States. Jonathan Karl reported on ABC World News Tonight (11/4, story 3, 2:50, Muir, 6.93M) that the President "is huddled with aides inside the White House, getting ready for a fight. His team has already filed a lawsuit in Michigan, asked to join another in Pennsylvania, and demanded a recount in Wisconsin, all as votes are still being counted." But some Republicans distanced themselves from Trump's early Wednesday remarks, and "even the Senate Majority Leader, Republican Mitch McConnell, took issue with the President's words." McConnell: "Claiming you've won the election is different from finishing the counting." Karl: "Republican Sen. Marco Rubio was more blunt, tweeting, 'Taking days to count legally cast votes is not fraud.'"

Ed O'Keefe said on the CBS Evening News (11/4, story 2, 3:20, O'Donnell, 3.94M) that Trump on Wednesday "tweeted that he is claiming victories in Pennsylvania, Georgia, North Carolina, and Michigan. This despite evidence to the contrary in Michigan, and no official race calls yet in the other states." Hallie Jackson said on NBC Nightly News (11/4, story 4, 3:15, Holt, 5.79M), "There's no evidence of fraud in states that have not been called. The President's legal battle [is] beginning as his path to victory is narrowing, even as he tries to claim states he'd like to win, like Pennsylvania, Georgia, North Carolina, all races too early to call with many ballots yet to be tallied."

Dana Bash reported on CNN (11/4, 83.16M), "I talked to a source familiar with President Trump's thinking who said that the President is down, obviously tired, which is understandable, but not feeling all that great, despite the public bluster that we've seen and heard from his campaign, from his children, that the President is seeing what's happening. He's seeing that in some of these key states that will determine whether he is president or not, his lead is shrinking, or if Joe Biden is ahead...it's just not looking that good for the President. And the sense from the source that I spoke to is that the President is starting to see this slip away."

The AP (11/4, Sherman) reports, "Trump's campaign filed lawsuits Wednesday in Pennsylvania, Michigan and Georgia, laying the groundwork for contesting battleground states as he slipped behind [Biden] in the hunt for the 270 Electoral College votes needed to win. ... The new filings, joining existing Republican legal challenges in Pennsylvania and Nevada, demand better access for campaign observers to locations where ballots are being processed and counted, and raise absentee ballot concerns, the campaign said. However, at one Michigan location in question The Associated Press observed poll watchers from both sides monitoring on Wednesday."

Bloomberg (11/4, 4.73M) reports that in Michigan and Pennsylvania, the Trump campaign "claimed it hasn't been given meaningful access to counting locations to observe the process for opening and tabulating ballots as guaranteed under state law." The Detroit Free Press (11/4, 1.52M) reports the Michigan lawsuit "alleges that a poll challenger from Roscommon County – a small, rural county in northern Michigan – was excluded from viewing the counting of the absentee ballot counting board. ... The lawsuit does not specifically say where the man was when he was denied access to viewing the absentee ballot count."

USA Today (11/4, Boucher, McCoy, Johnson, 10.31M) reports, "Although thousands of Michigan votes remain to be counted, many are from absentee ballots in traditional Democratic strongholds. And although Trump leads in Pennsylvania's incomplete vote counts, his lead has narrowed as absentee and mail ballots continue to be tabulated." The Philadelphia Inquirer (11/4, Tamari, Lai) reports, "In Pennsylvania, Trump has more votes based on those counted so far. But with many votes still to be counted in some of the most Democratic areas of the state, including Philadelphia and its suburbs, the outcome remains unclear, at best."

The New York Times (11/4, Rutenberg, Corasaniti, 18.61M) says that "with his political path narrowing, [Trump] turned to the courts and procedural maneuvers on Wednesday in a last-ditch effort to stave off defeat." The moves "signaled Mr. Trump's determination to make good on his longstanding threats to carry out an aggressive post-Election Day campaign to upend any result not in his favor and pursue his baseless allegations that the outcome was rigged. But it was not clear how much effect any of his efforts would have." The Washington Post (11/4, Viebeck, Barnes, Hamburger, Helderman, 14.2M) reports Democrats "said they were unfazed by what they said was legal posturing by the president's campaign. They said they were well-prepared to fend off any lawsuits or appeals."

The New York Post (11/4, Bowden, 4.57M) reports, "A gaggle of President Trump's surrogates accused Joe Biden of trying to cheat them out of the state of Pennsylvania on Wednesday. ... At a hastily called together press conference in Philadelphia, the president's son Eric Trump and personal attorney Rudy Giuliani announced Trump 2020 was taking legal action to stop what they called 'rampant corruption.'" The Washington Times (11/4, 492K) reports Giuliani "said it was inconceivable that Mr. Trump could be 500,000 votes ahead with more than 80% of the votes counted and not be declared the winner in Pennsylvania."

The Daily Beast (11/4, 1.39M) reports Trump reportedly "told his advisers that, even if Biden were to claw the presidency away from him, he wanted them to 'go down fighting' harder than they ever had before, one of the sources with direct knowledge said. By Wednesday afternoon, some semblance of that approach began to materialize."

"Legal Experts" Skeptical About Role For Supreme Court In Deciding Election. Reuters (11/4, Hurley) reports that though Trump "wants the U.S. Supreme Court to weigh in on a presidential race that is still too close to call, it may not be the final arbiter in this election, legal experts said. They said it was doubtful that courts would entertain a bid by Trump to stop the counting of ballots that were received before or on Election Day, or that any dispute a court might handle would change the trajectory of the race in closely fought states such as Michigan and Pennsylvania." Axios (11/4, 521K) similarly reports that "experts say they simply don't yet see strong vehicles emerging for a scenario where Supreme Court justices decide the next president."

The Los Angeles Times (11/4, 4.64M) says Trump "may soon confront the problem that Al Gore faced in 2000 when he lost the crucial state of Florida by a tiny margin of about 500 votes: It is not easy to persuade judges to undo an election once the votes have been counted." Trump's lawyers "will try to find a legal basis for setting aside those votes, and most experts think their prospects are dim, even with the Supreme Court dominated by conservatives." Former White House counsel Donald McGahn said Wednesday, "You need a legal violation to go to court. It depends on state law and on the facts."

Facebook And Twitter Warn Users About Trump's Claims. Reuters (11/4, Culliford, Dave, Satter) reports that as Trump "and his allies flooded social media on Wednesday with false claims of victory and unsupported allegations of voter fraud, social media companies warned users that the presidential election had yet to be decided. The posts on Twitter, Facebook and other sites are imposing a real-time test of Silicon Valley's much-touted rules on handling election misinformation and premature claims of victory."

USA Today (11/4, Bomey, 10.31M) reports Facebook and Twitter on early Wednesday "warned social media users that [Trump's] claims regarding the election results are potentially misleading, including his claim that he had won the election." And on Wednesday, The Week (11/4, 1.94M) reports Twitter "flagged several tweets that Trump sent out...attaching labels saying they contain information that 'is disputed and might be misleading.' The first was Trump's baseless claim that Democrats are 'trying to steal the election,'" as well as "a post by Trump baselessly blaming 'surprise ballot dumps' for [Biden] pulling ahead in some battleground states, as well as another in which Trump wrote that 'they are working hard' to make his early lead in Pennsylvania and Michigan 'disappear,' baselessly suggesting fraud was at play rather than more votes being counted." The New York Times (11/4, Conger, Isaac, Wakabayashi, 18.61M) and the Wall Street Journal (11/4, Wells, Seetharaman, Subscription Publication, 7.57M) also look at efforts by social media firms to block false claims and misinformation about the election.

Blunt, Hogan, DeWine Say All Legally Cast Votes Must Be Counted. The Kansas City Star (11/4, 549K) reports Sen. Roy Blunt (R-MO), "in what amounts to an admonishment" of Trump, said Wednesday that states "should ensure they count every legal vote in the 2020 election." Blunt said, "We have set all-time records for voter participation. Every vote that was legally cast needs to be counted. America will once again serve as an example to the world." The Baltimore Sun (11/4, Wood, 1.33M) reports Maryland Gov. Larry Hogan (R) on Wednesday "criticized Trump's middle-of-the-night speech as 'outrageous and uncalled for and a terrible mistake.'" And Ohio Gov. Mike DeWine (R) said on Fox News, "We count the votes. We believe in the rule of law. I am for Trump, but if it ends up being Biden, all of us will accept that. ... Every vote has to be counted. We as a country accept election results. We believe in counting all the votes."

Media Reports: Trump And Advisers Were Furious Over Fox News Arizona Call. The New York Times (11/4, Karni, Haberman, 18.61M) reports, "With Florida looking red early on Tuesday night, President Trump and his advisers thought they were witnessing a repeat of election night 2016, when a victory in Florida foreshadowed a victory over all." But the "mirage of victory was pierced when Fox News called Arizona" for Biden at 11:20 p.m. The President "and his advisers erupted at the news." The Times says political aide Jason Miller "disputed the accuracy of the call on Twitter and frantically called Fox News, asking the network to retract it," and Jared Kushner was "in touch with Rupert Murdoch, the Fox News owner, as the night wore on." Vanity Fair (11/4, 9.08M) reports that "according to a source," Trump himself also "phoned Fox owner Rupert Murdoch to scream about the call and demand a retraction. Murdoch refused, and the call stood."

The Washington Post (11/4, Ellison, 14.2M) reports on Fox's call-making process, saying the Arizona call "was one of several times throughout the night that the president's favorite network declared results long before its competitors – and not necessarily in the president's favor." ABC World News Tonight (11/4, story 7, 1:05, Muir, 6.93M) and the CBS Evening News (11/4, story 8, 1:05, O'Donnell, 3.94M) had reports on continued counting in Arizona.

Biden Has Won Most Votes Of Any Presidential Candidate In History. USA Today (11/4, Peter, 10.31M) reports Biden "has broken the record for most votes received by a presidential candidate and now has amassed more than 70 million. The record was held by Barack Obama, who in the 2008 election received 69,498,516 votes." The Cleveland Plain Dealer (11/4, 895K) reports Democrats have now "won the popular vote seven of the last eight presidential elections," and his comfortable popular vote majority is renewing calls for the abolition of the Electoral College. The Washington Post (11/4, 14.2M) reports that turnout is on track to “be the highest since 1900, when 73.7 percent of eligible Americans cast ballots. That election had a much smaller voting pool, as women did not yet have the right to vote.”

Trump Won Largest Share Of Non-White Vote By GOP Nominee Since 1960. According to the Washington Examiner (11/4, 448K), “Polling data from Tuesday night suggests President Trump earned the highest share of the nonwhite vote for any Republican candidate since 1960.” National Review (11/4, 731K) reports, “Roughly one quarter of non-white voters cast their ballots for Trump, according to an Edison exit poll. If the poll is an accurate reflection of final results, Trump will have won over more non-white voters than any Republican since Richard Nixon, who won 32 percent of the non-white vote in 1960.”

Biden's Poor Showing Among Miami-Dade Latinos Cost Him Florida. The Washington Post (11/4, Reinhard, Rozsa, 14.2M) reports, “With about 636,000 registered Democrats and nearly half-a-million nonpartisan voters, Florida’s Miami-Dade County was supposed to be friendly terrain for Joe Biden – a bastion of ethnic diversity that might have helped propel him to victory in a must-win state for President Trump.” But Biden “drew far fewer Hispanic voters than Democrats expected, carrying Florida’s most populous county of Miami-Dade by only seven percentage points, compared to the 30-point margin boasted” by Hillary Clinton in 2016.

The AP (11/4, Webber, Fingerhut) reports, “In winning Florida, Trump was aided by Cuban voters, who are more likely than other Latinos to back Republicans. Cuban voters were 5% of the electorate in Florida, and 58% of them supported the president.” The New York Times (11/4, Collins, Fessenden, Gamio, Keefe, Lu, Lutz, Walker, Watkins, Yourish, 18.61M) reports “more than half of the counties in Florida... swung further right, allowing [Trump] to win the state with a margin that is nearly three times what he had four years ago.”

Michael Bloomberg Spent More Than $100M On Pro-Biden Ads In Three States Won By Trump. CNBC (11/4, Schwartz, 3.62M) reports on its website that Michael Bloomberg’s “more than $100 million investment into three key states fell flat” as Trump “appears to have captured all of them.” According to CNBC, “It was initially decided that most of a $100 million spend would go toward the pivotal state of Florida. Later he would add Ohio and Texas into the mix.” However, CNBC says Bloomberg’s advisers “believed that if they spent big in Florida, it would force Trump and his allies to shift resources away from other regions of the country and into the key battleground state.”

Media Analyses: Nation Remains Bitterly Divided. The New York Times (11/4, 18.61M) writes that “some truths were perfectly clear” on Wednesday. Trump “was not going to prove the experts wrong with a resounding win from the ‘silent majority,’” and the Democrats “were not going to deliver a decisive repudiation of Mr. Trump’s party with victories up and down the ballot. That meant that as the two political camps geared up for litigation and spin battles in the coming days, many voters of both parties were left with the troubling realization that perhaps they had misunderstood their country, their towns, perhaps even their neighbors.”

The Washington Post (11/4, Rucker, Costa, 14.2M) says that while Biden “is on track to comfortably win the popular vote,” he is set to become the president of “a bitterly divided country, having fallen short of the resounding repudiation of Trump that many political strategists believed was necessary to extinguish the political fires he has lit.” The Post says the nation is “potentially heading toward a period of entrenched partisan warfare, even as it is battered by crises.”

NYTimes Analysis: Trump “Will Remain A Powerful And Disruptive Force In American Life.” The New York Times (11/4, Baker, Haberman, 18.61M) writes, “If President Trump loses his bid for re-election, as looked increasingly likely on Wednesday, it would be the first defeat of an incumbent president in 28 years. But one thing seemed certain: Win or lose, he will not go quietly away.” Trump “has made clear that he would not shrink from the scene should he lose. At the very least, he has 76 days left in office to use his power as he sees fit and to seek revenge on some of his perceived adversaries. ... And if he is forced to vacate the White House on Jan. 20, Mr. Trump is likely to prove more resilient than expected and almost surely will remain a powerful and disruptive force in American life.”

Newspapers Call For Patience And A Full Count Of Ballots. USA Today (11/4, 10.31M) editorializes, “Americans by nature are not a patient people, particularly in a nail-biting presidential election. ... And it doesn’t help when an unrestrained president in a tight reelection race prematurely claims victory as Donald Trump did early Wednesday, even with several battleground states undecided and millions of votes uncounted. But the virtue of patience has never been more vital than in the fraught hours and likely days following Tuesday’s vote, as harried battleground states struggle to tally overwhelming numbers of presidential ballots.”

The New York Times (11/4, 18.61M) says in an editorial, “Count all the votes. This shouldn’t be a remotely controversial proposition in a representative democracy. A complete and accurate count is the only way to determine the will of the people who cast ballots.” The Times says Trump’s early Wednesday speech “was one of the lowest, most disgraceful moments in an administration filled to the brim with strong competition. It was also self-contradicting. In the same breath that he cast suspicion on counts in states that appeared to be turning against him, he welcomed more counting in states where his totals looked like they were growing.”

The Washington Post (11/4, 14.2M) editorializes, “In the end, the 2020 presidential election is unfolding much as had been foreseen by political analysts – and foreshadowed by President Trump. ... Biden built a substantial lead in the national popular vote that by late Wednesday had surpassed 50 percent, and will almost certainly grow as more votes are counted. ... Meanwhile, in the battleground states of the upper Midwest, an early lead for Trump on Tuesday melted away, at least in Wisconsin and Michigan.” The Post says the President’s “ugly rhetoric is a direct attack on American democracy. ... But, by late Wednesday, his antics had yet to prevent an orderly, peaceful and lawful conclusion of the presidential election.”

In a second editorial, the Washington Post (11/4, 14.2M) writes, “As the nation girds for what could be a tortuous process of vote-counting, recounts and legal challenges, it can breathe half a sigh of relief that Election Day voting itself was largely orderly, after such a heated, divisive campaign. Americans can thank the election officials and volunteers who worked to make that happen – and give themselves a pat on the back for turning out in record numbers to do their duty as citizens.”

The Wall Street Journal (11/4, Subscription Publication, 7.57M) says in an editorial that while Biden does have the lead, some states' results are extremely close, and care should be taken in counting them all. While counting legally cast ballots is not fraud as Trump has claimed, the Journal says, it is essential to count votes based on each state's election laws.

Reuters Analysis: Next President Will Confront "Monumental" Economic Challenges.

Reuters (11/4, Saphir, Marte) reports in an analysis that whoever wins the presidential election "will face monumental challenges on the economic front." The recession "has wiped away more than a year of economic output and more than five years of jobs growth. The workforce is now smaller than it was a year before [President] Trump first took office." Reuters adds that while consumer spending "is stronger than it was right after the pandemic exploded in March," it is "only back to where it was last June." In addition, "housing prices are on the rise," and although manufacturing activity "has rebounded," manufacturing employment "is in worse shape than employment overall." Moreover, "the coronavirus is still surging across most of the United States."

Report: US Businesses Added Fewer Jobs Than Forecast In October.

The Washington Post (11/4, Ren, 14.2M) reports data from ADP Research Institute showed US companies "added fewer jobs in October than forecast...indicating the absence of additional fiscal stimulus is prompting some firms to adjust payrolls as the pandemic continues to wear on the recovery." According to the ADP report, payrolls "increased by 365,000 last month after a revised 753,000 rise in September." That increase "was weaker than all but one estimate in a Bloomberg survey of economists and below the median projection for a 643,000 gain."

California Ballot Win Exempts Uber, Lyft, DoorDash From Reclassifying Drivers As Employees.

The New York Times (11/4, Conger, 18.61M) reports drivers for gig economy companies in California "will not become their employees" after voters approved Proposition 22, "a ballot measure that allows gig economy companies to continue treating drivers as independent contractors." Uber, Lyft and DoorDash "designed the measure to exempt the companies from a state labor law that would have forced them to employ drivers and pay for health care, unemployment insurance and other benefits." The AP (11/4, Bussewitz, Liedtke) calls the vote "a stinging rebuke to state lawmakers and labor leaders who were fighting for better working conditions for a growing number of people who drive for ride-hailing and food delivery services."

Bloomberg (11/4, Rosenblatt, Wilkens-Iafolla, Mulvaney, 4.73M) says the ballot measure "may have broader ramifications. If the rule works out well for both the workers and companies it could influence a push for legislation in other states or on the federal level, legal experts said." The Wall Street Journal (11/4, Rana, Subscription Publication, 7.57M) and the Washington Post (11/4, Siddiqui, Tiku, 14.2M) provide similar coverage.

A Los Angeles Times (11/4, 4.64M) editorial says California lawmakers' failure "to strike a deal with app-based companies to boost the benefits and protections that workers on their platforms would receive" was "a terrible mistake." App companies spent more than $200 million to win voters' support for the ballot measure and, the Times argues, "in doing so, the proposition's sponsors laid out a road map for how companies can write their own employment laws and regulations through the ballot box. Californians should take that as a warning."

FCC Fines T-Mobile $200M.

The Wall Street Journal (11/4, FitzGerald, Subscription Publication, 7.57M) reports the FCC has fined T-Mobile US $200 million after investigators found Assurance Wireless, the low-cost mobile brand it acquired through its takeover of Sprint, overcharged the federal Lifeline program, which provides affordable cell phone service to low-income consumers. The Washington Post (11/4, 14.2M) reports according to the FCC, "Sprint may have received government subsidies for more than 1 million customers who did not receive service under the Lifeline program."

Insurers Post Mixed Results Amid Ongoing Pandemic.

The Wall Street Journal (11/4, Scism, Subscription Publication, 7.57M) reports insurers posted mixed quarterly results amid the ongoing pandemic. Allstate saw its net income rise to $1.13 billion aided by fewer vehicle accident claims as miles driven by motorists are below pre-pandemic levels in much of the country. Meanwhile, MetLife's net income fell to $633 million, but its adjusted earnings increased to $1.58 billion from the year-earlier period.

The Wall Street Journal (11/4, Hannon, Subscription Publication, 7.57M) reports surveys of purchasing managers showed US service providers reported continued growth in activity in October. Private data firm IHS Markit said its US Services PMI Business Activity Index registered 56.9 in October, marking an increase from 54.6 in September. The Institute for Supply Management's nonmanufacturing index was 56.6 in October, a slight decline from 57.8 in September.

The company "said Wednesday that it will close its 358 locations and its office in Wayne, Pennsylvania. Liquidation sales are expected to begin 'in the coming days.'" USA Today says the chain blamed a "severe impact from COVID-19" for the decision.

The Journal says SpaceX secured civilian launch contracts totaling an estimated $5 billion. In addition, it has won an estimated $6 billion in contracts to supply the military with rocket launches and satellite prototypes as well as some $9 billion more in past and future NASA awards.

Exports increased 2.6% to $176.35 billion, while imports rose 0.5% to $240.22 billion.

US Sets New Record With Over 102,000 New Daily COVID Cases.

Reuters (11/4, Shumaker) reports that the US "set a one-day record for new coronavirus cases on Wednesday with at least 102,591 new infections and as hospitals in several states reported a rising tide of patients, according to a Reuters tally." In addition, "on Tuesday hospitalizations topped 50,000 for the first time in three months." The New York Times (11/4, Taylor, 18.61M) says case reports "continued to climb sharply across the Midwest and the Great Plains. Minnesota, Indiana, and Maine all reported single-day case records on Wednesday." Cases "were also mounting in the Mountain West and even in the Northeast, which over the summer seemed to be getting the virus under control." The Washington Post (11/4, Farzan, 14.2M) says that, "nationwide, more than 9,445,000 coronavirus cases and more than 232,500 covid-19 fatalities have been logged since February."

The CBS Evening News (11/4, story 11, 0:25, O'Donnell, 3.94M) reported that the US "reported more than 91,000 new COVID infections on Tuesday," and "four out of the five highest days for new cases have all been recorded since Friday." CNBC (11/4, Higgins-Dunn, 3.62M) says on its website that Tuesday was "the nation's second-highest daily total as millions of voters cast their ballots on Election Day." The "seven-day average of daily new cases reached record highs in 21 states on Tuesday, according to...data compiled by Johns Hopkins University. There are now almost 9.4 million reported Covid-19 cases in the U.S. and at least 232,635 deaths, according to Hopkins." USA Today (11/4, Schnell, Rice, Rodriguez, Flores, 10.31M) says "new case records were set in Colorado, Illinois, Indiana, Iowa, Kansas, Maine, Michigan, Minnesota, Missouri, Montana, Nebraska, New Mexico, North Dakota, Ohio, Oregon, Pennsylvania, Rhode Island, South Dakota, Utah, Virginia and Wyoming" on Tuesday.

Axios (11/4, Allassan, 521K) reports, "Public experts have warned of heightened risk for increased cases and deaths as the US heads into the winter months, and the pandemic intersects with the season flu."

NBC Nightly News (11/4, story 8, 1:40, Holt, 5.79M) reported, "As many focus on election results...first responders are still struggling to save lives, with COVID cases climbing in 43 states." According to the Washington Post (11/4, Farzan, 14.2M), "The dismal state of the economy beat out the coronavirus pandemic as the top concern of voters surveyed in early exit polls Tuesday, while public health experts warned that the outcome of the election was unlikely to change the trajectory of the difficult weeks and months ahead." The Post adds, "More than a dozen states shattered records for hospitalizations, and a new study showed an unprecedented surge in infections among children."

The AP (11/4, Tanner) asks whether the US will "be able to tame a perilous pandemic that is surging as holidays, winter and other challenges approach," and says "public health experts fear the answer is no, at least in the short term, with potentially dire consequences." President Trump's "current term doesn't end until Jan. 20," and "in the 86 days until then, 100,000 more Americans will likely die from the virus if the president doesn't shift course," said Robert Murphy of the Institute for Global Health at Northwestern University's Feinberg School of Medicine, "echoing estimates from other public health experts."

Health Officials Flag Shortage Of Face Masks Amid COVID Surge.

The Wall Street Journal (11/4, Hufford, Subscription Publication, 7.57M) reports that a combination of surging coronavirus cases and N95 mask stockpiling is straining the supply of key personal protective equipment, health officials and mask makers say. Many healthcare facilities are rationing and reusing masks, and some state health departments believe supplies will further tighten.

AP Analysis: Sports "Bubbles" Could Provide Lessons For Handling Virus.

In an analysis, the AP (11/4, Reynolds, Whyno) says that "many of the lessons learned" by professional sports teams "from being in some form of a bubble environment – where the NBA, NHL and Major League Baseball each crowned a champion after finding a way to finish their seasons in most unusual circumstances – could apply to whatever the new definition of normal is for those and other sports." A "new set of rules are coming in just about every sport, almost all with enhanced health and safety in mind." The AP says that "if they work, games could return to arenas and stadiums with some fans in attendance sometime soon," but, "perhaps more importantly, they could also provide some common-sense solutions to virus issues in the real world."

College Newspapers Reporting Stories Of Campus COVID Outbreaks.

The New York Times (11/4, Nierenberg, 18.61M) reports, "As American colleges have become a major source of outbreaks, with at least 214,000 cases linked to campuses, student journalists have found themselves playing a vital role in the pandemic, reporting stories of national importance and holding their administrators and fellow students accountable."

Philadelphia DA Calls Wallace Shooting A "Terrible Tragedy," Body Cam Footage Released.

The AP (11/4, Dale) reports Philadelphia District Attorney Larry Krasner "vowed Wednesday to make his own decision about whether to charge two young officers in the shooting death of Walter Wallace Jr. and not to rely solely on the police investigation." His comments "came just before the city released 911 calls, police body camera video and other evidence in Wallace's death last month." The "pair of police body cam videos shows police repeatedly yelling at Wallace to put a knife down and ordering bystanders to move. Wallace rushes between cars into a street where the two officers have their guns drawn. Several shots are fired, and Wallace falls on his front."

The New York Times (11/4, Levenson, 18.61M) reports Krasner "called the shooting 'a terrible tragedy' and said that it showed that officers had failed to properly respond to a mother in distress about her son's mental health crisis." Krasner said, "Government failed because her son was killed within a minute of government's arrival. ... As a part of government, I apologize for that." Still, the Times says, Krasner "said that if residents wanted to honor Mr. Wallace and respect his family's wishes, they should not 'disgrace his memory by tearing up the city.'"

Portland Mayor Elected To Second Term.

The The Oregonian (11/4, Bailey, 1M) reports Portland Mayor Ted Wheeler (D) "fought off a strong challenge from urban policy consultant Sarah Iannarone to claim a second term." Wheeler "led Iannarone 46% to 41% as of 8 am Wednesday" with more than 90% of the votes accounted for. He said on a Zoom call Wednesday, "We're going to need to come together as never before to address short-term issues and the long-term changes and investments needed to rebuild our economy, rebuild confidence in law enforcement and restore hope for our future."

Oregon Becomes First State To Decriminalize Hard Drugs.

The AP (11/4, Selsky) reports, "In a first in the nation, Oregon has rejected charging drug users with criminal offenses, with voters passing a ballot measure that decriminalizes possession of heroin, methamphetamine, LSD, oxycodone and other hard drugs." The measure "completely changes how Oregon's justice system" treats those "found with personal-use amounts" of drugs, providing "the option of paying a $100 fine or attending new 'addiction recovery centers' funded by millions of dollars of tax revenue from Oregon's legalized, regulated marijuana industry." According to the Oregon Criminal Justice Commission, the measure will mean 3,700 fewer citizens are convicted of felony or misdemeanor possession each year, in addition to helping reduce racial and ethnic disparities in convictions and arrests.

The Washington Post (11/4, Peiser, 14.2M) reports that Oregon's vote "was one of many noteworthy wins for advocates seeking to change drug laws," alongside the legalization of psychedelic mushrooms in the state and the District of Columbia, as well as marijuana decriminalization in four states. Marijuana advocates "said they hope the wide support for legalization seen on Tuesday will put pressure on Congress to change federal marijuana laws." In Oregon, where "marijuana has been legal...since 2015," critics of the newest measure, including the Oregon District Attorneys Association, "argued there aren't enough beds at drug treatment facilities in the state, and some claimed drug users confront addictions only under the threat of imprisonment."

The Oregonian (11/4, Crombie, 1M) reports that "voters overwhelmingly supported Measure 110," with partial returns on November 3 showing a 59% win for backers, including the New York-based Drug Policy Alliance, "the same criminal justice reform group that backed Oregon's successful marijuana legalization effort in 2014." Funders including DPA, Facebook CEO Mark Zuckerberg, the American Civil Liberties Union of Oregon, and national ACLU "believe U.S. drug policy has filled the country's jails with nonviolent offenders who need treatment instead of incarceration and has disproportionately affected generations of Black people."

Four More States Legalize Recreational Marijuana. USA Today (11/4, Cannon, 10.31M) reports that as Americans await "clarity on the presidential race," perhaps "lost in the frantic haze of election night was the legalization of recreational marijuana in four states." Arizona, New Jersey, South Dakota, and Montana "all passed legislation Tuesday permitting the possession of weed by adults, which means 15 states have legalized recreational weed or voted to legalize it." South Dakota and Mississippi also "passed initiatives to allow medical marijuana," bringing the total number of states to "permit the legal distribution of medical weed" to 36. Supporters of legalization "argue that the enforcement of bans does more harm than the drug itself, swallowing up community resources while disproportionately affecting people of color."

The New York Times (11/3, Tully, 18.61M) says the vote by New Jersey puts "pressure on neighboring states like New York" and Pennsylvania to follow suit "or risk losing the competitive edge to New Jersey in what is expected to be one of the largest marijuana markets in the country," generating $126 million a year. New York state Sen. Liz Krueger (D) "said the 'yes' vote could be the incentive Gov. Andrew M. Cuomo and lawmakers need to break a yearslong logjam."

Tropical Storm Eta Forecast To Hit Florida.

The CBS Evening News (11/4, story 12, 0:15, O'Donnell, 3.94M) reported, "Forecasters are warning millions in south Florida to keep an eye on Eta. What was once a major hurricane is now pulling away from Central America, where it killed at least three people. Eta is now expected to gain strength before hitting Cuba and south Florida as a tropical storm. That's possibly on Sunday."

The AP (11/4) reports, "Tropical Storm Eta drenched northern Nicaragua and Honduras Wednesday after devastating communities along the country's Caribbean coast and setting off deadly landslides that killed at least three people in Central America." While Eta "had weakened from the Category 4 hurricane that battered the coast Tuesday," the "long-term forecast shows Eta weakening to a tropical depression, taking a turn over Central America and then reforming in the Caribbean – possibly reaching Cuba on Sunday and southern Florida on Monday." The US National Hurricane Center "forecast that parts of Nicaragua and Honduras could receive 15 to 25 inches (380 to 635 millimeters) of rain, with 40 inches (1000 millimeters) possible in some isolated parts."

The Washington Post (11/4, Cappucci, 14.2M) reports that "a flood disaster is probably underway" in Central America "as a number of locations are set to see mudslides amid forecast rainfall totals of 2 to 3 feet," and "meanwhile, concern is growing in Cuba and the southeastern United States, including Florida, where Eta may head next." The Post says "uncertainty abounds" in forecasts surrounding the storm, "with models converging on the likelihood of Eta's redevelopment."

The Orlando (FL) Sentinel (11/4, Pedersen, 536K) reports that "the current track has Eta hugging Florida's southwest coast" after reforming on Monday. Forecasters said, "While it is too soon to determine the exact timing, magnitude, and location of possible impacts from wind and rainfall, interests in Cuba, southern Florida and the Florida Keys should monitor the progress of Eta through the week." The Tallahassee (FL) Democrat (11/4, 180K) reports that "in U.S. landfall terms, November is historically the quietest month of the hurricane season," yet "there are more storms in the Gulf and Caribbean than are dreamt of in climatology, and Florida faces a real risk of impacts from Tropical Storm Eta over the next week or more."

Weatherhead To Run National Climate Assessment.

The Washington Post (11/4, Samenow, Freedman, 14.2M) reports that the "next National Climate Assessment, the federal government's most definitive and comprehensive report on climate change and its consequences for the United States, will be directed by atmospheric scientist Betsy Weatherhead, currently a senior scientist at Jupiter Intelligence." Her appointment "was verified by one current and one former senior official at NOAA," both speaking "on the condition of anonymity." Selected by Kelvin Droegemeier, "director of the White House's Office of Science and Technology Policy and a Trump appointee, Weatherhead is to be formally brought into the government as part of the career civil service, based within the U.S. Geological Survey and placed on a detail to the U.S. Global Change Research Program."

Federal Judge Blasts USPS For Failing To Comply With Order To Sweep For Ballots.

The Washington Post (11/4, Bogage, Ingraham, 14.2M) reports that according to data from the US Postal Service, "nearly 7 percent of ballots in...sorting facilities on Tuesday were not processed on time for submission to election officials...potentially leaving tens of thousands of ballots caught in the mail system." According to the Post, the USPS "reported the timely processing...of 93.3 percent of ballots on Election Day, its best processing score in several days, but still well below the 97-percent target that postal and voting experts say the agency should hit." The Post adds that on Tuesday, the USPS "processed 115,630 ballots...a volume much lower than in recent days after weeks of warnings about chronic mail delays. Of that number, close to 8,000 ballots were not processed on time, a small proportion but one that could factor heavily in states such as Michigan and Wisconsin, which do not accept ballots after Election Day."

Politico (11/4, Cheney, 4.29M) reports that on Wednesday, Judge Emmet Sullivan of the US District Court in Washington "thrashed" the USPS and "suggested he might seek testimony from Postmaster General Louis DeJoy for declining to comply with a last-minute court order to deploy postal inspectors to sweep facilities for undelivered ballots." Sullivan said, "Someone may have a price to pay for that." According to Politico, Sullivan "expressed frustration that the Postal Service's decision to ignore his order – meant to ensure that undelivered ballots reached state officials on Election Day – and not to inform him about it until after the fact." Politico says the USPS "contended that the order would have required a substantial reconfiguration of its Election Day operations that proved unfeasible amid other responsibilities."

Reuters (11/4, Shepardson) reports Sullivan said, "The pressing issues are where are the ballots and how do we get them delivered so they can be counted." Bloomberg (11/4, Shields, 4.73M) reports he added, "The court has been very clear that it expects full compliance. ... It just leaves a bad taste in everyone's mouth for the clock to run out, game over. There was not compliance with a very important court order."

The New York Times (11/4, Broadwater, Fuchs, 18.61M) reports that on Tuesday, Sullivan "said he was particularly concerned about ballot delivery in key swing districts with low on-time delivery scores, including Central Pennsylvania, Philadelphia and Detroit." The Times adds, "The judge gave the agency until 3 pm to complete the sweeps, but the Postal Service said it would need until 8 pm to do the work without disrupting the processing of a flood of Election Day ballots." The Los Angeles Times (11/4, 4.64M) reports Sullivan "also ordered postal officials to instruct mail processing facilities in Texas to conduct two searches for mail ballots Wednesday afternoon and deliver any votes to local elections offices by 5 pm."

The AP (11/4, Izaguirre) reports USPS inspectors "found just 13 ballots – all in Pennsylvania – during an Election Day sweep of mail processing centers ordered by a federal judge." The ballots "were found in two separate mail processing facilities and were expedited for delivery to local election offices, according to court records filed Wednesday."

Among the outlets also reporting on the judge's statements are the New York Post (11/4, Moore, 4.57M), the Houston Chronicle (11/4, 730K), and USA Today (11/4, Johnson, Voyles Pulver, 10.31M).

WPost Analysis: Missing Votes Unlikely To Affect Election Outcome. A Washington Post (11/4, Bogage, Ingraham, 14.2M) analysis "of the locations of the misplaced ballots finds that even in a worst-case scenario where all potentially misplaced ballots in a state are permanently lost, those ballots amount to just a fraction of both current two-party vote margins and estimates of the number of outstanding ballots yet to be tallied." The Post says they are "unlikely to affect the outcome of the presidential race in key swing states."

SCOTUS Hears Arguments In Case Involving Catholic Adoption Agency.

CNBC (11/4, Higgins, 3.62M) reports on its website that on Wednesday, the Supreme Court's "conservative majority...seemed prepared to rule in favor of a Roman Catholic adoption agency in Philadelphia that argued that it is entitled to discriminate against potential foster parents on the basis of sexual orientation." The case, Fulton v. City of Philadelphia, was "the first major dispute to come before Justice Amy Coney Barrett," whose "views on LGBT rights and religion came under heavy scrutiny during her Senate confirmation process." According to CNBC, the case "arose after the city of Philadelphia learned in 2018 that Catholic Social Services, a foster care services provider affiliated with the Roman Catholic Church, would not certify same-sex couples as suitable parents for children in the city's foster care system." Philadelphia then "stopped referring the group new children, citing a city law prohibiting sexual orientation discrimination, and updated its 2019 contract with foster care services providers to explicitly forbid such discrimination against potential parents."

The Washington Post (11/4, Barnes, 14.2M) says the case "divided and even seemed to perturb some of the justices Wednesday." Calling the case "a big test of religious rights on a more conservative court," the AP (11/4, Gresko) says the justices, "seven of whom are Catholic or attended Catholic schools, also asked about other hypothetical contracts officials might make." Justice Breyer "asked what would happen if a religious organization bidding on a transportation contract wanted men and women to sit separately, or women to wear head scarves." Justice Kagan asked, "If there's an agency that refuses to employ women, would the state have to contract with that agency?" The New York Times (11/4, Liptak, 18.61M) reports that Barrett's "questions in the case...were evenhanded and did not reveal her position."

The Washington Times (11/4, Swoyer, 492K) says President Trump's "three appointments to the high court – Justices Neil M. Gorsuch, Brett M. Kavanaugh and Amy Coney Barrett – coupled with Justices Clarence Thomas and Samuel A. Alito Jr. were all sympathetic to Catholic Social Services' fight to be able to select married different-sex couples as foster parents in Philadelphia."

GOP Looks Set To Retain Senate Majority And Pick Up Seats In House.

On the CBS Evening News (11/4, story 9, 2:05, O'Donnell, 3.94M), Nancy Cordes reported that the Senate elections were "a real survival story for Republicans. At the start of the night, Democrats thought they had about 11 places that they could go to pick off the three or four seats they needed to take control of the Senate." Democrats were "successful in a couple of them," but "then they kind of got stuck." ABC World News Tonight (11/4, story 8, 0:10, Muir, 6.93M) similarly reported that Democrats "face a very steep path for any control of the Senate at this point."

The Washington Post (11/4, Kane, Kim, Bade, 14.2M) says congressional Democrats "awoke Wednesday to a political debacle despite big optimism heading into the elections, as Republicans continued to cling to their Senate majority and are on track to make unexpected gains in the House." The Post reports that "in the highly anticipated Senate matches, Republicans scored easier-than-expected victories in Iowa, Montana and South Carolina while establishing very large leads in Kansas and Texas." The Post adds, "In even more unexpected fashion," House Speaker Pelosi "is on track to lose seats in her caucus and come out of this election season with the smallest majority in about 20 years." According to the Post, "Republicans estimated that their overall House performance would shrink Pelosi's majority south of 230 votes, the first time the party in power had such a small margin since the 2002 elections."

According to Politico (11/4, Desiderio, Arkin, 4.29M), Democrats' "path to a Senate majority has narrowed dramatically as the party underperformed expectations in a handful of the most expensive races in the country." Politico says Democrats' "chance for retaking the upper chamber slipped further Wednesday afternoon after GOP Sen. Susan Collins defeated Democrat Sara Gideon in the Maine Senate race." Politico adds, "Though Democrats expanded the battleground map in the fall and ran closer than expected to GOP incumbents, they fell short in their second- and third-tier targeted races like South Carolina, Texas and Kansas – states where the party raised and spent nine-figure sums."

The AP (11/4, Mascaro, Jalonick) reports that "key races in North Carolina and Michigan remained undecided, and at least one in Georgia was headed to a January runoff." The AP adds, "While Democrats picked up must-win seats in Colorado and Arizona, they suffered a setback in Alabama, and Republicans held their own in one race after another – in South Carolina, Iowa, Texas, Kansas, and Montana, dramatically limiting Democrats' hopes to make inroads. ... 'You wasted a lot of money,' said White House ally Sen. Lindsey Graham in Columbia, South Carolina, after defeating Jamie Harrison, despite the Democrat's stunning $100 million haul for his upstart campaign." Graham quipped, "This is the worst return on investment in the history of American politics."

Bloomberg (11/4, Sink, 4.73M) says the disappointing election results for Democrats "will once again prompt soul-searching for a party that is still struggling to grapple with the populist fervor Trump gifted the Republican Party." According to Bloomberg, "But Biden's decision to largely withdraw from the campaign trail and his inability to inspire enthusiasm among the Democratic base – beyond the potential of defeating Trump – offered little help to down-ballot members of his party."

Politico (11/4, Caygle, Ferris, Mutnick, 4.29M) reports that on Wednesday morning, "even with tens of thousands of ballots still to be counted, shell-shocked Democratic lawmakers, strategists and aides privately began trying to pin the blame: The unreliable polls. The GOP's law-and-order message amid a summer of unrest. The 'hidden Trump voters.' The impeachment hangover. The lack of a coronavirus stimulus deal." According to Politico, "Some corners of the party were also beginning to question the message and tactics at the top, with several Democrats predicting – and some even demanding – a significant overhaul within the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, including possibly even ousting chairwoman Cheri Bustos, whose Illinois race has yet to be called."

The Washington Examiner (11/4, Ferrechio, 448K) reports that on Wednesday, House Minority Leader McCarthy "took a victory lap...trashing polls and predictions that there would be heavy losses for Republicans, who are currently poised to pick up House seats. 'They were all wrong,' McCarthy, a California Republican, told reporters." The Examiner adds, "Instead of losing from five to 20 seats some polls were forecasting, Republicans have so far picked up seven seats from incumbent Democrats." The Examiner says McCarthy emphasized that "the GOP wins will include up to 19 women, which would set a record for the party."

In an editorial, the Wall Street Journal (11/4, Subscription Publication, 7.57M) highlights disappointing results for Democrats in Senate and House races, saying that it was Republicans who expanded their appeal among non-white voters as Democrats did poorly beyond their coastal bases.

Former Auburn Football Coach Among New Senators. The Washington Post (11/4, Firozi, 14.2M) carries a primer on Sens.-elect Bill Hagerty (R-TN), John Hickenlooper (D-CO), Ben Ray Lujan (D-NM), Cynthia Lummis (R-WY), Roger Marshall (R-KS), and Tommy Tuberville (R-AL), writing that the class includes "a former college football coach and a onetime governor who opened the first craft brewery in Denver."

Election Failure Leading House Democrats To Consider Leadership Changes. The Hill (11/4, Lillis, 2.98M) reports that two unidentified House Democrats "say they and other centrists are privately discussing a plan that was unthinkable just 24 hours earlier: throwing their support behind a challenger" to Pelosi. The sources "told The Hill on Wednesday that they were reaching out to their colleagues about backing one of Pelosi's top lieutenants," Democratic Caucus Chairman Rep. Hakeem Jeffries (D-NY), for speaker, saying, "He bridges moderates and progressives better than anyone. And most importantly, he's not Nancy Pelosi."

GOP House Leadership Moves To Secure Positions In Next Congress. Politico (11/4, Zanona, Bresnahan, 4.29M) reports McCarthy, House Minority Whip Scalise, GOP Conference Chair Rep. Liz Cheney (R-WY), and National Republican Congressional Committee Chairman Rep. Tom Emmer (R-MN) "are moving quickly to lock down their posts next year, after an unexpectedly successful election night." McCarthy "announced his candidacy in a letter Wednesday afternoon," Scalise "confirmed in an interview he also intends to seek reelection," Cheney "has been calling members in the conference and lining up support to run again," and Emmer "has been dialing up members and locking down votes."

Collins Wins Reelection In Maine.

The New York Times (11/4, Cochrane, 18.61M) reports that Sen. Susan Collins (R-ME) "claimed victory on Wednesday in her bid to secure a fifth term, beating back an avalanche of Democratic money and liberal anger in the most difficult race of her career to defeat Sara Gideon, a Democrat, and strengthen the party's hold on the Senate." Her victory, preserved Collins' "status as the only remaining New England Republican in Congress." Speaking to a crowd of supporters shortly after Gideon conceded the race, Collins said, "I feel that this is an affirmation of the work that I'm doing in Washington to fight hard every day, to fight hard every day for the people of Maine. I will serve you with all my heart, I will work hard for you, each and every day, and together we will come together to work on the problems and challenges that are facing our state and our country.”

The Portland (ME) Press Herald (11/4, 244K) reports that Collins defeated Gideon “in an intensely negative contest that saw unprecedented spending as part of the national battle for control in Washington.” In addition “to defying months of polling showing Gideon leading the race, Collins’ victory appears likely to complicate or outright foil national Democrats’ hopes of winning control of the U.S. Senate.”

The Bangor (ME) Daily News (11/4, Shepherd, 198K) reports that Collins “won a historic fifth term in Tuesday’s election after a bruising race that began as a referendum on President Donald Trump but ended in a resounding win for the incumbent as voters across Maine split their tickets.” Collins had trailed Gideon “in every independent public poll in 2020. Several showed a tight race in recent weeks, though surveys showed undecided voters breaking for Collins.”

WMEA-FM Portland, ME (11/4, Feinberg) reports on its website that “on election night, [Collins] received far more votes in many rural areas and even defeated Gideon in traditional Democratic cities such as Lewiston. And despite efforts by opponents to tie Collins to President Trump, she significantly outperformed the president statewide, securing about 51 percent of the vote as of Wednesday afternoon.”

Peters Holds On To Senate Seat In Michigan.

Fox News (11/4, Schultz, 27.59M) reports on its website that Sen. Gary Peters (D-MI) has “fended off a serious challenge from two-time GOP Senate hopeful John James in the swing state of Michigan.” Peters “pulled off a nail-biter of a victory late Wednesday, Fox News projected.” His win, Fox News observes, comes as “a relief for Democrats trying to erode the GOP majority in the Senate. Democrats already lost a Senate seat in Alabama, as expected, but failed to flip competitive seats in Maine, Montana, Iowa and elsewhere.”

The Detroit Free Press (11/4, 1.52M) reports that “multiple media outlets, including CNN, [have] called the race for Peters.” As of “7:45 p.m., Peters had taken a 59,587-vote lead on James, beating him 49.6% to 48.5% with 98% of the vote counted. It wasn’t clear, however, how many, if any, votes were left and whether Peters could build on that lead, given that earlier in the evening he had a much smaller 11,380-vote lead but with about the same amount of the vote counted.”

The New York Times (11/4, Cochrane, 18.61M) observes that with Peters’ victory, Democrats “held onto one of their most hotly contested seats.” The contest “became one of the most competitive in the nation in the past few weeks and was a priority for Republicans. Mr. James, an Army combat veteran and businessman, would have become only the third Black Republican elected to the upper chamber since Reconstruction.” Politico (11/4, Ehley, 4.29M) also reports.

Kelly To Join Senate Faster Than Others Elected Tuesday.

The Arizona Republic (11/4, 869K) reports that Sen.-elect Mark Kelly (D-AZ) “could be seated later this month, weeks ahead of other senators elected Tuesday” because he defeated an appointed senator in a special election. Kelly “is expected to be sworn in as soon as Nov. 30, after the state certifies its election results.”

Boebert Wins In CO3.

The New York Times (11/4, Hulse, 18.61M) reports Lauren Boebert (R) “won the race for Colorado’s sprawling Third Congressional District on Wednesday, holding the seat for Republicans as they tried to limit their House losses.” She “defeated Diane Mitsch Bush, a former state legislator, in the race for the seat held by” Rep. Scott Tipton (R-CO), who lost to Boebert in the Republican primary.

Spartz Wins In IN5.

The New York Times (11/4, Edmondson, 18.61M) reports Indiana state Sen. Victoria Spartz (R) won election in IN5 on Wednesday “to a reliably conservative House seat outside Indianapolis, quashing Democratic hopes of flipping the seat to expand their majority.” She “prevailed against Christina Hale, a Democratic former state legislator who branded herself as a problem-solving centrist.”

Peterson’s MN7 Loss Could Alter Agriculture Policy.

Reuters (11/4, Huffstutter, Polansek) reports House Agriculture Chairman Collin Peterson “failed to win re-election in Minnesota on Tuesday, a loss some agriculture leaders said could hurt the Midwest grain belt.” Minnesota Grain & Feed Association Executive Director Laura Lemke said of the result, “The clout that he had on the ag committee is lost to us.” Ex-Sen. Heidi Heitkamp (D-ND) “said Peterson’s defeat was ‘devastating’ because he understood intricacies of the [Farm Bill],” saying, “Colin knew more about the Farm Bill than anyone else in Congress.”

The Grand Forks (ND) Herald (11/4, 116K) reports Michelle Fischbach (R) “garnered 53.4% of the vote, to Peterson’s 39.9%, with 87% of the precincts reporting.” She “was heavily endorsed by President Donald Trump, who won the district by 30 percentage points.”

Van Drew Leading In NJ2 Election.

The New York Times (11/4, Tully, 18.61M) reports Rep. Jeff Van Drew (R-NJ) continues to maintain a minor lead in his race against former schoolteacher Amy Kennedy for his congressional seat. He “[leads] Ms. Kennedy by about four percentage points with about 75 percent of the estimated vote counted.”

New Mexico Elects First All-Women Of Color House Delegation.

USA Today (11/4, Grantham-Philips, 10.31M) reports that New Mexico "has become the first state in history to elect all women of color to the U.S. House of Representatives." The state "confirmed victories for incumbent Rep. Deb Haaland, Yvette Herrell and Teresa Leger Fernandez in New Mexico's three congressional districts."

New York House Democrats Struggle With Challenging Election Results.

The New York Times (11/4, Fitzsimmons, 18.61M) reports that New York congressional Democrats "were delivered sobering news this week, with two first-term Democratic congressmen in danger of losing and candidates far behind in three other districts the party had hoped to flip." While the Democratic Party "fared well in urban areas with heavy Democratic representation," the party's suburban results "seemed to validate the message of Republican candidates who campaigned on 'law and order' and who tied Democrats to progressive radicalism and efforts to defund the police."

Stefanik Wins Reelection In NY21. The New York Times (11/4, McKinley, 18.61M) reports Rep. Elise Stefanik (R-NY) "was re-elected to a fourth term on Tuesday, riding President Trump's popularity in a rural conservative region in northern New York, his former home state." She "ran a campaign in which she borrowed some of Mr. Trump's tactics, including using nicknames like 'Taxin' Tedra' to mock her opponent."

Spanberger Wins Reelection In VA7.

The Washington Post (11/4, Flynn, 14.2M) reports Rep. Abigail Spanberger (D-VA) "declared victory early Wednesday evening over Republican challenger and state Del. Nick Freitas, after a burst of absentee-vote tallies gave her the lead." She "was trailing Freitas when in-person voting results were reported Tuesday night" in VA7, but she "led by several thousand votes after Spotsylvania County reported its final absentee ballots and Henrico County had tallied additional absentee ballots as well." Spanberger "thanked Freitas for the 'hard-fought campaign'" in her victory speech, and she "extended an olive branch to his supporters, saying, 'I hope over time I will earn your trust.'"

GOP Maintains Control Of Battleground Statehouses.

USA Today (11/4, Penzenstadler, Kwiatkowski, Nadolny, 10.31M) reports that while the Democratic Party "hoped to flip statehouse control in battleground states," they "fell short of their goals on Election Day" and Republicans are expected to maintain control of Arizona, Iowa, Michigan, Minnesota, North Carolina, Pennsylvania and Texas. These statehouses will "play a crucial role next year in the once-a-decade redrawing of congressional maps based on the census." The National Conference of State Legislatures "said the election may have produced the fewest party control changes since 1944, when only four chambers changed hands."

The New York Times (11/4, Tavernise, 18.61M) reports National Democratic Redistricting Committee Communications Director Patrick Rodenbush said of the results, "Our electoral targets in this election were in difficult states that remain gerrymandered from a decade ago." He continued, "It was always going to take a 'blue wave' for us to get deeper into the map in states like Texas and North Carolina, and that didn't happen for Democrats."

The Washington Post (11/4, Craig, 14.2M) reports Republican State Leadership Committee President Austin Chambers said of the results, "I can't think of a worse failure for Democrats." He continued, "When this year started, they were talking about how they were going to flip everything, and we had as cocky of an opponent as we've ever been up against. ... But it was an absolutely great night for state Republicans."

LGBTQ Candidates Achieved Milestone Wins Tuesday.

The AP (11/4, Crary) reports that across the US, LGBTQ candidates "achieved milestone victories in Tuesday's election, including the first transgender person elected to a state Senate, and the first openly gay Black men to win seats in Congress." The "landmark wins came not in only blue but also red states such as Tennessee, where Republican Eddie Mannis, who is gay, and Democrat Torrey Harris, who identifies as bisexual, won seats in the state House to become the first openly LGBTQ members of that legislature." In New York, "attorney Mondaire Jones won in a district of New York City suburbs and Ritchie Torres, a member of the New York City Council, won in the Bronx to make history as the first gay Black men elected to the U.S. House." Both men are Democrats.

The New York Times (11/4, Rubinstein, 18.61M) reports that Torres and Jones "grew up poor in single-parent households, 31 miles apart, both spending years grappling with their identities." The Times observes that with their victories, "gay Black Americans may finally have representation in Congress that mirrors their representation in the broader population." Assuming "that Americans who are gay, bisexual or transgender represent 4.5 percent of the population, and Black Americans represent 12 percent of the L.G.B.T.Q. community, Congress would need three Black L.B.G.T.Q. members to mirror the nation's demographics."

Delaware's McBride Will Be First Transgender State Senator. CNN (11/4, Stracqualursi, 83.16M) reports on its website that Democratic activist Sarah McBride "will become the nation's first person who publicly identifies as transgender to serve as a state senator, after winning Tuesday's election in Delaware."

California Affirmative Action Proposition Rejected By Electorate.

The AP (11/4, Har) reports that Proposition 16, which aimed to "reinstate affirmative action in overwhelmingly Democratic California," failed to pass on Tuesday. University of San Francisco Political Science Professor James Taylor "said the proposition suffered from several factors: the coronavirus pandemic and racial justice protests that have left voters stressed and uncertain; the lack of a high-profile champion such as Democratic vice presidential nominee Kamala Harris, and younger voters who may not know much about the issue."

The Los Angeles Times (11/4, 4.64M) reports that if the measure passed, then public universities and state governments "would have been allowed to consider race, sex, color, ethnicity or national origin to address diversity." The Wall Street Journal (11/4, Mai-Duc, Subscription Publication, 7.57M) reports that 56% of Californians voted against the proposed ballot measure with 44% supporting passage. The San Francisco Chronicle (11/4, 2.67M) also reports.

The Wall Street Journal (11/4, Subscription Publication, 7.57M) says in an editorial that California voters' rejection of an effort to reintroduce affirmative action in state education, hiring, and contracts was welcome, and could even influence how the Supreme Court looks at such preferences in two upcoming cases.

Mississippi Votes To Replace State Flag.

The AP (11/4, Pettus) reports that Mississippi voters approved Tuesday a new state flag design to replace the historic flag with Confederate imagery. Former Mississippi Supreme Court Justice Reuben Anderson "led a nine-member commission that recommended the new flag design," and the new flag "received more than 70% support" from Mississippi voters. Anderson said in a statement, "I have a renewed sense of hope for my grandchildren and great-grandchildren, and I know this new symbol creates better prospects for the entire state of Mississippi."

The Jackson \(MS\) Clarion Ledger (11/4, 275K) reports that the Mississippi state Legislature "must formally enact that design into law during the 2021 legislative session which starts in January."

Ranked Voting Ballot Measure Fails In Massachusetts.

The Boston Globe (11/4, 972K) reports that the Massachusetts electorate "rejected a ballot measure that would have implemented ranked-choice voting, known as Question 2, by a 10-point margin...dealing a blow to a campaign that spent at least $8 million, counted a slew of high-profile Democrats as supporters, and was vying in an election with record turnout." Attleboro Mayor Paul Heroux, who supported the measure, said of the result, "There's a progressive consciousness, a collective consciousness, in Massachusetts. But there's also a reluctance to change."

Election Day Passed Without Violent Protests.

The AP (11/4, Khalil) reports that while 1,000 protesters "converged on Black Lives Matter Plaza on Tuesday night, just a block from the White House," there "were no signs of serious violence or widespread unrest in the hours immediately after the polls closed" in the US. The District of Columbia demonstrations "were largely peaceful, with people shouting, 'Whose streets? Our streets!' and 'If we don't get no justice, they don't get no peace!'" Yet, Oregon Gov. Kate Brown (D) "had put the National Guard on standby, since Portland has seen almost nightly protests since the death of George Floyd."

Bloomberg (11/4, Adams-Heard, Kopit, Bhasin, 4.73M) reports that anti-Trump protesters "gathered Tuesday night in cities including Washington, Portland and Los Angeles, leading to scattered arrests," but election night "stood in stark contrast to the planning, with more than a dozen states activating National Guard troops, retailers boarding up windows and anxious Americans loading up on body armor and guns."

Polling Sector Confronting Another Legitimacy Crisis Following Election Results.

The New York Times (11/4, Russonello, 18.61M) reports that the polling sector failed to accurately capture President Trump's electoral strength for the second time in the 2020 presidential elections, and it "raises the question of whether the polling industry, which has become a national fixation in an era of data journalism and statistical forecasting, can survive yet another crisis of confidence." Monmouth University Polling Director Patrick Murray attributed the error to unquantifiable factors, such as Republican efforts to limit accessibility of mail-in voting and the failure of the US Postal Service to deliver completed ballots on time.

Blumenthal To Seek Reelection In Connecticut In 2022.

The Connecticut Post (11/4, Munson, 347K) reports that Sen. Richard Blumenthal (D-CT) announced Tuesday he will seek re-election in two years. Speaking with reporters Tuesday, Blumenthal said, "I do expect to be on the ballot in 2022. I'll do my announcement in a few weeks, a few months."

WPost: Virginia Makes Correct Choice In Overhauling Redistricting.

The Washington Post (11/4, 14.2M) argues in an editorial that Virginia's successful ballot measure to overhaul redistricting is important because the historic process is "actual vote-rigging," and it "has been the norm in too many states for too long." While the new rules governing redistricting "are admittedly imperfect," the change will "improve the odds that voters can choose their elected representatives rather than the other way around."

NYTimes: Cuomo Should Sign Anti-SLAPP Bill.

In an editorial, the New York Times (11/4, 18.61M) praises a bill in New York State intended to weaken the type of legal filing known as the Strategic Lawsuit Against Public Participation (SLAPP). According to the Times, the SLAPP is a way for "the rich and powerful [to] intimidate and silence critics" and "harass and bankrupt opponents." Unsurprisingly, the Times continues, SLAPPs "are a favorite weapon of President Trump." As an example, the Times cites a suit Trump brought against Timothy O'Brien, "then a business reporter for The Times and author of a book that said the real estate mogul was worth substantially less than he claimed." The Times urges New York Gov. Andrew Cuomo (D) to sign the bill, saying that it is "urgently needed to block bullies from weaponizing the courts against free speech," and also "to prevent New York from being used for 'forum shopping,' whereby abusive plaintiffs file suits in states with weak or nonexistent anti-SLAPP laws."

WSJournal Praises Illinois Rejection Of Flat Tax Repeal.

In an editorial, the Wall Street Journal (11/4, Subscription Publication, 7.57M) praises Illinois voters for rejecting a proposal by Gov. J.B. Pritzker (D) to repeal the flat state income tax and replace it with a system allowing higher top rates for wealthier residents.

Law360 (11/4, Subscription Publication, 8K) reports behind a paywall, "The European Banking Authority urged financial regulators on Wednesday to exchange information about how banks handle money laundering risks as it works to strengthen the fight against the flow of dirty money. Money laundering and terrorist financing can damage the financial stability of a bank and the integrity of the financial system in which it operates, the EBA said as it published in an opinion."

Malpass: Developing World Needs Debt Relief.

In an op-ed for the Wall Street Journal (11/4, Malpass, Subscription Publication, 7.57M), World Bank President David Malpass says developing countries facing heavy debt burdens need financial relief during the pandemic. For Malpass, such relief should include debt-service suspension, debt-burden reduction, creditor participation in relief efforts, and debt transparency. Developing countries themselves must also reorient toward sustainable fiscal policies.

The New York Times (11/4, Zraick, Castle, Povoledo, Bubola, Cumming-Bruce, Pronczuk, 18.61M) reports that on Wednesday, British Prime Minister Boris Johnson spoke before Parliament, "saying that there was no alternative to a monthlong lockdown if a 'medical and moral disaster' was to be avoided." According to the Times, "For weeks, Mr. Johnson had resisted such drastic measures, rejecting calls from scientists who advise the government, and from the opposition Labour Party, for an earlier but shorter lockdown." The Times says "lawmakers voted 516-38 to approve the rules on Wednesday, despite a rebellion from within Mr. Johnson's Conservative Party."

Prime Minister Giuseppe Conte "announced that the measures, the most drastic since the nationwide lockdown in March, will take effect on Friday and will seal off six regions in the country's deeply infected north and highly vulnerable, and poorer, south."

According to the AP (11/4, D'Emilio), "Barring very few exceptions, no one will be able to leave or enter the 'red zone' regions." People living there are required to stay home unless they are going to work or to the store for essential items; "they can also exercise near their homes and while wearing masks." Health Minister Roberto Speranza, having consulted with regional governors, made the decision about which regions would be "red zones." Speranza said, "I know that these choices will mean sacrifices and difficulties, but they are the only way to bend the (contagion) curve. ... United, we can do it."

Biden Jr. and appalled by Mr. Trump's demand to stop counting votes." Across the globe, "the results trickling in from across the American electoral map made for confounding, fascinating must-watch drama." According to the Times, "The stakes are global, and so was the audience, illustrating the truism that presidential elections in the United States affect everyone, even those ineligible to vote in them."

European Election Watchers Criticize "Baseless Allegations" Of Fraud In US. The Washington Post (11/4, Morello, 14.2M) reports, "A group of international election observers on Wednesday praised the US vote as orderly but condemned President Trump's 'baseless allegations' of fraudulent ballot counts and suggestion the tally be stopped in midstream, saying he had undermined public confidence in democratic institutions." German parliament member Michael Georg Link said, "Nobody – no politician, no elected official, nobody – should limit the people's right to vote." At the State Department's invitation, Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe "sent over 100 observers to more than 30 states to watch the vote," and "the observers expressed a measure of admiration for the administration of the election, and a heavy dose of criticism." They "portrayed election day and the early voting in preceding weeks as 'competitive and well-managed' amid the coronavirus pandemic, despite the more than 400 lawsuits already filed and in 44 states."

US Officially Withdraws From Paris Climate Treaty.

The AP (11/4, Jordans, Borenstein) reports that on Wednesday, the US "formally left the Paris Agreement, a global pact it helped forge five years ago to avert the threat of catastrophic climate change." According to the AP, "The move...further isolates Washington in the world but has no immediate impact on international efforts to curb global warming." Joe Biden "has said he favors signing the US back up to the Paris accord." The New York Times (11/4, Friedman, Sengupta, 18.61M) says, however, that "rejoining the Paris Agreement will be the easy part. The United States would find that it has a lot of catching up to do to both reduce emissions and rebuild trust with its international allies." In addition, the Washington Post (11/4, Dennis, Eilperin, Grandoni, 14.2M) says that even if Biden wins the presidency, "his plan to invest trillions of dollars toward making the United States a greener nation will face a deeply divided Congress."

Separately, the New York Times (11/4, Friedman, 18.61M) reports that "on Nov. 4, 2019, the earliest possible day under United Nations rules that a country could begin the final withdrawal process," Secretary of State Pompeo filed paperwork to do so, and "it automatically finalized a year later." The Times adds that "so far, no other country has followed the United States in renouncing the Paris Agreement."

Before briefing the member states' envoys, Barnier said, "At this stage, there are still too many difficulties remaining on important topics." Later, on Twitter, Barnier said, "Despite EU efforts to find solutions, very serious divergences remain." According to the AP, his comments "threw a dampener on optimistic reports that progress was being made at a rapid pace on issues such as fisheries rights, one of three remaining major topics that need a compromise solution if a deal is to be found before Jan. 1, when a transition period in the Brexit divorce proceedings ends."

The New York Times (11/4, Pronczuk, 18.61M) reports that the Polish government has "delayed implementation of a court ruling that would impose a near-total ban on abortions after two weeks of the largest protests the country has experienced since the 1989 collapse of communism." Poland "already had one of Europe's most restrictive abortion laws before its Constitutional Tribunal ruled on Oct. 22 that terminating pregnancies for fetal abnormalities – one of three justifications for legal abortions and virtually the only type performed in the country – violated the Constitution." However, on Tuesday, the government "indefinitely delayed the publication of the court's ruling, which prevents it from going into legal force, in an apparent response to the protests."

Ethiopia Nearing War After Prime Minister Sends Military To Tigray Region.

The AP (11/4, Meseret) reports, "Ethiopia's Nobel Peace Prize-winning prime minister," Abiy Ahmed, "on Wednesday ordered the military to confront the country's Tigray regional government after he accused it of a deadly attack on a military base." According to the AP, his "move against the well-armed Tigray People's Liberation Front raised concerns that one of Africa's most populous and powerful countries could plunge into civil war," which "would send a shock wave through one of the world's most turbulent regions, the Horn of Africa." In an indication of how grave the threat is, the US "in the midst of its election drama issued a statement urging 'an immediate de-escalation.'"

The New York Times (11/4, Walsh, 18.61M) reports that in a statement, Abiy "accused the Tigray People's Liberation Front...of attempting to provoke a war by orchestrating a militia assault on a major Ethiopian Army base in Tigray in the early hours of Wednesday." He said, "The last red line has been crossed with this morning's attacks, and the federal government is therefore forced into a military confrontation." The Washington Post (11/4, Daba, Wroughton, 14.2M) says "Aby's office accused" the TPLF "of attempting to steal artillery and other military equipment during the attack."

Many "saw the arrest as a vendetta against Mr. Goswami for his criticism of the Mumbai police over a recent homicide investigation, as well as the latest example of an assault on press freedoms in India that has come from many directions." However, Mumbai "is controlled by an opposition political party," and "some commentators said that what the Mumbai authorities were doing was similar to the pressure that the Modi administration has put on progressive journalists elsewhere."

CA Rent Control Measure, Prop. 21, Fails.

National Mortgage News (11/4, Sinnock) reports California's "ballot measure to expand rent control, Proposition 21, looks as though it will not pass, leaving commercial financing entities to claim victory over one of the two state ballot measures they opposed in the state." According to NMN, mortgage lenders "have been concerned about the measure because expanded rent control could result in a patchwork of different policies that could complicate underwriting and discourage lending. An industry trade group responded to early results with cautious optimism." NMN says that with "99% or 20,290 of 20,497 precincts partially reporting Wednesday morning, the measure that would have put state rent-control policies back in the hands of local authorities was opposed 60%/40%, according to unofficial election results posted by the state. Certified results are due Dec. 11." Commercial Observer \(NY\) (11/4) and a paywalled piece from GlobeSt. (11/5, Borland) provide additional coverage.

The rate dropped from 3.913% the year before and from 3.105% in August." Meanwhile, the size of the average millennial's loan "rose $5,904 annually to $213,285 since buyers attaining 90 basis point gains in interest rates could afford more house." NMN says purchase loans made up "the majority of originations," but "shrunk to 56% from 66% year-over-year and 59% month-over-month." The refi share rose to 43% as millennials, particularly older ones, "continue taking advantage of low mortgage rates. That's up from 33% a year ago and 40% the month prior."

M Report (11/4, Espinosa) says, "During September, refinances accounted for 51% of Conventional loans – the highest since June. It was up from 48% just the month prior." Foreclosures increased slightly month-over month from 0.72 percent to 0.83 percent." Looking at sectors, "the hardest-hit property types – lodging and retail – recorded drops in delinquency rates, with lodging seeing the greatest decrease, going from 22.94 percent in September to 19.43 percent in October. M&A Activity Muted With Origination Profits So Strong.

Behind a paywall, Inside Mortgage Finance (11/4, Muolo, Subscription Publication) says, "Mortgage M&A advisors must be feeling a bit like the Maytag repairman these days: The machine is working impeccably well at full throttle and there's no reason to get a new one." Put differently, IMF says not to "expect to see any significant activity in mortgage company sales until (likely) the second half of 2021." Some of the advisors IMF spoke to over the past few weeks have been repeating "that origination profits are the best they've ever been and there's no reason, or pressure, to sell." IMF says, "The only recent whole-company deals that come to mind are Freedom Mortgage's August purchase of RoundPoint Mortgage (a trade that dragged on for 15 months) and Western Alliance's recent acquisition of non-QM lender Galton Funding, notable because it's a rare example of a federally insured depository buying a non-agency originator."

The Washington Times (11/4, Lovelace, 492K) reports that U.S. District Judge Carl Nichols "grilled lawyers for TikTok" and ByteDance on Wednesday about whether the "social media app would accept any restrictions on how it maintains American users' data." The federal judge "questioned lawyers challenging the Trump administration's intended block of TikTok about whether federal law allows the administration to prevent U.S. data from residing outside the country." DOJ lawyer Daniel Stephen Garrett Schwei "said the federal government also has concerns about how the app is moderating Americans' speech online." Last week, US District Judge Wendy Beetlestone "separately issued a preliminary injunction against the Trump administration's restrictions on TikTok set to take effect next week." Both challenges "are running alongside separate action" by CFIUS. Judge Nichols asked to be kept updated "on developments from the CFIUS proceedings and said he may ask the lawyers to provide short supplemental briefs before Friday about how he should consider Judge Beetlestone's order in making his own ruling."

TikTok's lawyers argued the ban is an overreach because it would stop personal communications and informational materials to protect US data, which is an impermissible use of the International Economic Emergency Powers Act. Attorneys for the government said the shutdown orders was intended to prevent China from getting information on Americans through the app, not to block communications. Nichols did not rule immediately on TikTok's motion.

As more shoppers moved online, criminals switched to phishing: pretending to be a real company or government agency."

as news outlets to spread disinformation,” according to a Wednesday announcement. The sites seized “were targeted at American audiences, though some of the sites listed in the affidavit are entirely in Arabic or focused on news in the Middle East.” They “appear to recycle articles and claim them as their own.” For instance, “criticalstudies.org claimed U.S. Senator Bernie Sanders among its ‘writers,’ but the article supposedly written by Sanders was cut and pasted from an op-ed he had written in USA Today in 2018.” FBI Special Agent in Charge Craig D. Fair said, “Thanks to our ongoing collaboration with Google, Facebook, and Twitter, the FBI was able to disrupt this Iranian propaganda campaign and we will continue to pursue any attempts by foreign actors to spread disinformation in our country.”

ZDNet (11/4, Cimpanu, 299K) reports that Russian authorities “arrested a malware author at the end of September, an action that is extremely rare in a country known to usually be soft on hackers.” Authorities arrested a “20-year-old from the region of North Ossetia–Alania.” Between November 2017 and March 2018, he “created several malware strains, which he later used to infect more than 2,100 computers across Russia.” Though Russia has not named the suspect, “Benoit Ancel, a malware analyst at the CSIS Security Group, said last week and today on Twitter that the suspect is a Russian hacker he and other security researchers have been tracking under the nickname of ‘1ms0rry.’”

Federal Reserve

Fed Unlikely To Announce New Economic Aid After This Week’s Meeting.

Bloomberg (11/4, Boesler, McCormick, 4.73M) reports the “tightly contested” election puts pressure on the Fed “to deploy even more monetary stimulus to support the economy under a divided government.” While the Fed “is not expected to announce a shift in stance Thursday when Fed officials conclude a two-day meeting in Washington,” Fed Chair Jerome Powell “may hint at coming changes to the Fed’s bond-buying program, after chances of aggressive fiscal spending for households and businesses faded along with prospects of a Democratic government sweep.”

The AP (11/4, Crutsinger) reports the Fed “will likely end its latest policy meeting Thursday by deciding to wait before determining whether or how to expand the economic support it has been supplying through ultra-low interest rates.” The AP adds, “Most economists say that unlike Congress, the central bank may already have provided almost all the help it can for the economy through its low-rate policies. Fed officials themselves, including...Powell, have sounded a similar message.”

The New York Times (11/3, Smialek, 18.61M), CNBC (11/4, Domm, 3.62M), Fox Business (11/4, O’Halloran, 1.73M), and MarketWatch (11/4, Robb, 1.67M) also report.

Banks Worried About Data Rights In Partnerships With Fintech Data Aggregators.

Business Insider (11/4, Balogh, 3.67M) reports fintechs "need to be able to connect and share information with their much larger peers," and data aggregators such as Plaid or Yodlee perform this function, but banks are starting to worry that they could ultimately be held responsible for customers' data held within these firms' platform in the event of a cyber breach. Dodd-Frank requires consumers have access to their financial data, but a debate is ongoing about which data belong to the bank. Regulators have stepped in, with the CFPB releasing a proposal "to clearly define the scope of consumer data access rights laid out in Dodd-Frank." and it's "not the first time in recent memory regulators have weighed in on competition in the space. In early October, Business Insider reported on tensions surrounding a special-purpose banking charter from the OCC that would grant fintechs more power to process payments independently."

Delayed Election Causing Anxiety For Banks.

American Banker (11/4, Haggerty, Subscription Publication, 31K) reports, "Banks have spent the past year preparing for the impact of either Donald Trump's reelection or a victory by Joe Biden. Paul Merski, group executive vice president for congressional relations and strategy at the Independent Community Bankers of America, "said banks are not only concerned about how the election could impact a future stimulus package, but also about possible changes to agencies like the Small Business Administration that have been administering coronavirus economic relief." Said Merski: "A lot of the programs that the bankers are still heavily engaged with right now, the [Paycheck Protection Program], to a lesser extent the Main Street Lending Program, these were started and implemented by Republicans in various administrative agencies...so you'd even have a change in policy if people suddenly are leaving. You'd have brand new people in those political positions overseeing those major programs that were started under a Republican administration."

Editorial Wrap-Up

New York Times.

“Let The Votes Be Counted.” The New York Times (11/4, 18.61M) says, “Count all the votes. This shouldn’t be a remotely controversial proposition in a representative democracy. A complete and accurate count is the only way to determine the will of the people who cast ballots.” The Times says President Trump’s early Wednesday speech “was one of the lowest, most disgraceful moments in an administration filled to the brim with strong competition. It was also self-contradicting. In the same breath that he cast suspicion on counts in states that appeared to be turning against him, he welcomed more counting in states where his totals looked like they were growing.”

“New York’s Chance To Combat Frivolous Lawsuits.” The New York Times (11/4, 18.61M) praises a bill in New York State intended to weaken the type of legal filing known as the Strategic Lawsuit Against Public Participation (SLAPP). According to the Times, the SLAPP is a way for “the rich and powerful [to] intimidate and silence critics” and “harass and bankrupt opponents.” Unsurprisingly, the Times continues, SLAPPs “are a favorite weapon of President Trump.” As an example, the Times cites a suit Trump brought against Timothy O’Brien, “then a business reporter for The Times and author of a book that said the real estate mogul was worth substantially less than he claimed.” The Times urges New York Gov. Andrew Cuomo (D) to sign the bill, saying that it is “urgently needed to block bullies from weaponizing the courts against free speech,” and also “to prevent New York from being used for ‘forum shopping,’ whereby abusive plaintiffs file suits in states with weak or nonexistent anti-SLAPP laws.”

Washington Post.

“Surprise! The Election Is Unfolding As Predicted.” The Washington Post (11/4, 14.2M) editorializes, “In the end, the 2020 presidential election is unfolding much as had been foreseen by political analysts – and foreshadowed by President Trump. ... [Joe] Biden built a substantial lead in the national popular vote that by late Wednesday had surpassed 50 percent, and will almost certainly grow as more votes are counted. ... Meanwhile, in the battleground states of the upper Midwest, an early lead for Trump on Tuesday melted away, at least in Wisconsin and Michigan.” The Post says the President’s “ugly rhetoric is a direct attack on American democracy. ... But, by late Wednesday, his antics had yet to prevent an orderly, peaceful and lawful conclusion of the presidential election.”

“Election Day Could Have Been Much Worse.” The Washington Post (11/4, 14.2M) writes, “As the nation girds for what could be a tortuous process of vote-counting, recounts and legal challenges, it can breathe half a sigh of relief that Election Day voting itself was largely orderly, after such a heated, divisive campaign. Americans can thank the election officials and volunteers who worked to make that happen – and give themselves a pat on the back for turning out in record numbers to do their duty as citizens.”

“Virginia Voters Decide Unambiguously: No More Rigged Redistricting.” The Washington Post (11/4, 14.2M) argues in an editorial that Virginia’s successful ballot measure to overhaul redistricting is important because the historic process is “actual vote-rigging,” and it “has been the norm in too many states for too long.” While the new rules governing redistricting “are admittedly imperfect,” the change will “improve the odds that voters can choose their elected representatives rather than the other way around.”

Wall Street Journal.

“Trump And Biden Go To Election Overtime.” The Wall Street Journal (11/4, Subscription Publication, 7.57M) says that while Joe Biden does have the lead in the presidential election, some states’ results are extremely close, and care should be taken in counting them all. While counting legally cast ballots is not fraud as President Trump has claimed, the Journal says, it is essential to count votes based on each state’s election laws.

“Illinois Tax Repudiation.” The Wall Street Journal (11/4, Subscription Publication, 7.57M) praises Illinois voters for rejecting a proposal by Gov. J.B. Pritzker (D) to repeal the flat state income tax and replace it with a system allowing higher top rates for wealthier residents.

“A Pelosi-Schumer Defeat.” The Wall Street Journal (11/4, Subscription Publication, 7.57M) highlights disappointing results for Democrats in Senate and House races, saying that it was Republicans who expanded their appeal among non-white voters as Democrats did poorly beyond their coastal bases.

“Racial Thunder Out Of California.” The Wall Street Journal (11/4, Subscription Publication, 7.57M) says that California voters’ rejection of an effort to reintroduce affirmative action in state education, hiring, and contracts was welcome, and could even influence how the Supreme Court looks at such preferences in two upcoming cases.

Last Laughs

Late Night Political Humor.

Samantha Bee: "Hi, welcome to who the hell knows what's going on? I don't know anymore. Ladies and gentlemen, our long national nightmare is still going? I don't know, or maybe not. Check back later."

Samantha Bee: [On Trump declaring victory while states are still counting votes] "That's...terrifying, and exactly what experts have been predicting for months. Trump is going to try to steal this thing. ... No wonder so many stores have boarded up their windows."

Samantha Bee: [On the US Postal Service not adhering to a federal judge's order to sweep the offices for ballots] "Wait, what? You can just turn down a judge's order? I sure wish I'd known that after I got my second DUI."

Samantha Bee: "Like many of you, we were hoping that tonight's show would be a celebration of a huge victory, but we also feared that it would be a funeral for democracy. Instead, we're kind of in a horrifying middle. Which sucks."

Trevor Noah: "Today is Wednesday, the 4th of November, which means we are on day two of election day. It's almost like a Hanukkah miracle that no one wanted!"

Trevor Noah: "So, election day is over, but because it's 2020, election week has just begun. ... Trump jumped ahead early in a lot of states because Republicans mostly voted in person, and those votes got counted first. And then, as the Democratic mail-in ballots came in, Biden jumped ahead, which is what everyone has known would happen for weeks. Everyone except the President. ... Yeah, dude, because first they counted your votes, and now they're counting the other guy's votes. I mean, I knew that Trump didn't like science, but I didn't realize he had disavowed numbers. I mean, maybe this explains why he's always in debt?"

Trevor Noah: "This is just a level of stupidity from Trump I did not expect. He exceeds levels of stupid. I didn't know you could go higher. Sometimes it really feels like Trump is a toddler."

Trevor Noah: "Trump could just be playing four-dimensional chess here. Yeah, maybe he's laying the groundwork for his legal defense over his taxes. (As Trump) 'Your honor, as you can see, I have no idea how numbers work. Therefore, I cannot be held accountable. Case dismissed!' (As Judge) 'You can't dismiss your own case.' (As Trump) 'I also don't know how the law works. Double case dismissed! #winning!'"

Trevor Noah: "Needless to say, Trump was upset. The more votes got counted, the more Biden pulled ahead of him. And for Donald Trump, there could only be one solution: Stop counting the votes. ... Wow. I know everyone was expecting it, but still, can we just take a moment to admit it is insane that an American President is just demanding that they stop counting votes while he's ahead? This is such a textbook authoritarian move, which is impressive coming from a guy who has never read a textbook."

Trevor Noah: "I gotta to say, for a guy who hates [bad] countries, Trump likes to jack their style. I mean, I never thought I'd see the day when somebody yelling at me to 'go back to Africa' sounded more like a concern for my rights instead of a threat."

Trevor Noah: "All I'm saying is, be careful, America. If you let Trump do this, then voting could soon become one of those things people do to feel better, but doesn't actually do anything – like taking CBD oil or recycling plastic."

Trevor Noah: "It looks like Republicans will very likely be holding on to the Senate. And some high-profile races really did not turn out the way Democrats wanted, even when they spent a lot of money. ... I don't know who the bigger losers here are: the Democratic candidates, or the donors who gave them $170 million to lose their races. I mean, those donors gave them the best possible chance, and they still lost. That's like your parents being billionaires, but you still end up as Don Jr."

Trevor Noah: "The Democrats had super-high expectations last night, and they badly underperformed. Basically, the Democrats are the Cinnabon of politics. It smells amazing, you get excited, but once you're eating it, you're like, 'Oh, yeah, Cinnabon.'"

Jimmy Kimmel: "For me, and I'm sure for many of you, the past 24 hours have been a 'pollercoaster' of emotions and nausea. I thought if your election lasted more than 48 hours, you were supposed to seek medical attention."

Jimmy Kimmel: "We didn't get a winner last night, and it was a long night. One good thing about the pandemic, we're used to waiting a few days for results."

Jimmy Kimmel: "This was not the landslide Democrats were hoping for. This race was closer than Donald and Ivanka at a father-daughter dance."

Jimmy Kimmel: "The ballots are still being counted. Joe Biden definitely did better than Hillary Clinton. He was able to pick up the sexist vote, but he didn't do as well among racists."

Jimmy Kimmel: "Even though the deal appears to be sealed, there's still a lot of attention being paid to the state of Pennsylvania. The Amish haven't wielded this much power since they figured out how to hook a plow to an ox."

Jimmy Kimmel: "For me, the biggest question is, why did we believe the polls again? You'd think we'd have learned our lesson. But I guess that's not how humans function. We're on season 25 of 'The Bachelor' and we're like, 'I know it didn't work out the first 24 times, but this one feels like love.'"

Jimmy Kimmel: [On Trump declaring victory while states are still counting votes] "It isn't official yet, but all signs are pointing to a Joe Biden win. Everyone seems to know it. Everyone except for Donald Trump. ... Right, right. If they hadn't canceled the Olympics this year, he would have won that too."

Jimmy Kimmel: "Basically, [Trump's] message last night in a nutshell was, 'We won a completely fraudulent election.' ... He's claiming the votes in four states he didn't win. You can't claim the votes. This is the electoral college. It's not baggage at an airport carousel."

Jimmy Kimmel: "I'm also shocked that it was this close. ... It is unimaginable to me that close to half of American voters saw what this man has done to this country over the last four years. ... Half of us want to keep it going for four more years. Which, listen, I don't care what you think of Joe Biden. If Joe Biden stopped by my house every morning to key my car and pee in my pool? Still be no question which one of them I'd vote for."

Stephen Colbert: "It is 11:35 east coast time, and CBS is ready to project that I am your host, Stephen Colbert. Though there's a good chance Donald Trump is going to challenge that in court."

Stephen Colbert: "It's going to take a while to count all the votes! And it's all coming down to a few states where they're still counting votes in North Carolina, Georgia, Nevada, and Pennsylvania, a hybrid mix of the Sun Belt and the Rust Belt that I'm calling the 'Does anyone have a Xanax belt.'"

Stephen Colbert: "Today, we got a call on one of the swing states, Wisconsin, a state Trump beat Hillary Clinton in by a mere 22,000 votes back in 2016. Oh, my, how times have changed, because we can now confirm, Joe Biden has won Wisconsin. Woooo! The cheeseheads are now officially blue-cheeseheads. So they smell weird, but they taste great crumbled on a salad, maybe with a poached pear, a little candied walnut.”

Stephen Colbert: “Biden is ahead by over 20,000 votes, or one Wyoming. That’s really got to sting, because Trump has continued to make such a deal about winning Wisconsin back in 2016. ... And, just like that, Wisconsin is gone, just like a candle in the wind, or a chicken nugget in your general vicinity.”

Stephen Colbert: “Trump’s mishandling of the virus may have played a large part in Biden’s win, because recently, Wisconsin has become a COVID-19 hot spot. But with this win, Democrats across the country can breathe a little easier – except for the ones in Wisconsin because, again, it’s a COVID-19 hot spot.”

Stephen Colbert: [On Biden saying every vote will be counted and that the American people will not surrender] “Yes! We, the people, will not surrender! We, the people, will just doomscroll on Twitter until we freak out and stress-eat all our kids’ Halloween candy!”

Stephen Colbert: “After all that good news for Biden, in a move that just reeks of desperation and cheap cologne, with a million votes still uncounted, Trump’s campaign manager came out of the blue to announce, ‘We are declaring a victory in Pennsylvania.’ Bold! And I fully expect his victory in Pennsylvania to be just as successful as his victory over coronavirus. Gosh, I hope his announcement doesn’t overshadow me declaring myself People magazine’s ‘Sexiest Man Alive.’”

Stephen Colbert: “Early on, things had looked pretty good for Trump. We had been warned this would happen, in what experts called a ‘red mirage’ – which is either the character Elizabeth Olsen plays in the Marvel movies, or Putin’s code name for Trump.”

Stephen Colbert: “If COVID has taught us nothing, it’s that patience is valuable. Remember when the pandemic started, a trip to the grocery store would last eight hours because you had to wipe down every single grape before you put them in the refrigerator? This is the same thing. We’re wiping down every single ballot before we put them in America’s fridge. And hopefully, while we’re at it, we’ll end up throwing out that spoiled ham we bought four years ago.”

Stephen Colbert: “Of course, one person who always fails the marshmallow test is Donald Trump. ... A power grab by a terrified strongman in the dead of night. Classic. If there’s anything 2:00 a.m. is known for, it’s desperate moves by sad little men who are afraid to go home feeling like a loser.”

Stephen Colbert: “The President of the United States can’t ask for voting to stop. He’s only the President because of voting. Voting is America’s whole thing. That’s like Arby’s changing their slogan to ‘We must stop the meats!’”

Stephen Colbert: “After going full frontal fascist, Trump went full whiny baby. ... So if you’re keeping track, Trump is now trying to obstruct the count in... I’m sorry, I’m being told the Trump campaign is suing to stop us counting the number of states they are suing to stop the count in.”

Stephen Colbert: “As usual, the state that got us into this mess was Florida. Every four years, Democrats hope they’ll take it. But once again, last night, Florida was called for Donald Trump. Florida is officially America’s cheating boyfriend. Why do we always think we can change him?”

Stephen Colbert: “Democrats also had high hopes for flipping Texas, which would have been quite a feat. Texas hasn’t gone for the Democrat since Jimmy Carter back in 1976. And they didn’t even really want to vote for him, but they had to after he ate that 72-ounce steak.”

That's the rules."

Stephen Colbert: "Well, last night, Texas remained Texas, because it was called for Donald Trump. Even after he bungled the coronavirus. Texas may 'remember the Alamo,' but apparently, they have 'forgotten the 230,000.'"

Stephen Colbert: "Speaking of big electoral wins: Rhode Island isn't one of them. But nevertheless, Vice President Biden has won the state of Rhode Island, just narrowly beating out the state's third-party candidate: Calamari marinara."

Stephen Colbert: "Social distancing at the polls was particularly difficult in Rhode Island, because if you stand six feet away from the next guy, you're in Connecticut."

Stephen Colbert: "As expected, Hawaii has gone for Joe Biden. The Trump campaign is expected to contest the results, claiming most of those votes were actually cast in Kenya."

Jimmy Fallon: "Come on, it's 2020. Did you really think last night would end up wrapped with a neat bow?"

Jimmy Fallon: "Today felt like waking up with a hangover and realizing you're still at the bar."

Jimmy Fallon: "You think you're stressed? Imagine how President Trump feels. In two months, he's either getting inaugurated or incarcerated."

Jimmy Fallon: "As we speak, some states are still tallying the votes. Somehow, Chuck E. Cheese can count a million tickets on the spot, yet we still can't count votes in three days."

Jimmy Fallon: "Well very early this morning, Biden spoke to a drive-in crowd in Delaware and told us we need patience. I'm not sure if that is America's strength. If a TikTok is not up in 33 seconds, we're like, 'Eh, next.'"

Jimmy Fallon: [On Trump lamenting that he was planning a victory celebration when states started going for Biden] "Meanwhile, Trump spoke from the White House this morning and seemed upset the results weren't immediately called in his favor. ... It's too bad, I'd hate for the election to get in the way of his party."

Jimmy Fallon: "If you're keeping track, in the same speech [Trump] claimed the election was a fraud and an embarrassment, and then declared victory. I don't think we should correct Trump; we should just nod along, put him in a fake White House, and let him think for the next four years he's in charge."

James Corden: "Last night with everything still up in the air, Biden addressed a drive-in crowd and urged his supporters to be patient with the process. ... Biden may be optimistic, but did you hear all that honking from the cars? That is not support, that is Democrats trying to drive into Canada."

James Corden: "Then at 2:00 a.m., President Trump gave a speech urging his supporters to remain calm while every single vote is officially counted. I'm kidding, he didn't. ... He tried to undermine the election and claim that he won. The country was shocked. In a completely unexpected turn of events, Donald Trump did exactly what he said he was going to do."

James Corden: "I mean let's see, fraud on the American people, embarrassment to our country. This seems like a weird time for Trump to just start listing his Administration's accomplishments."

James Corden: "But this could be a long contentious fight between the Trump and Biden teams. There will probably be recounts. Both sides are already preparing lawsuits. One pollster predicted that this could get ugly. Could it? I would hate for this to suddenly turn ugly."

James Corden: "How is Joe Biden even awake right now? I went to bed at like 3 a.m., and I am exhausted. And I'm not in the race. Like what happened to, I mean, you call him 'Sleepy Joe' – the man has been awake for like 72 hours now."

Seth Meyers: "As of this taping, the winner of the presidential election has not been determined and votes are still being counted in several key states. Of course, you're watching this at 12:35 tonight or maybe some time Thursday afternoon, so if Trump won, will you please get in a time machine and come back to find and kill me?"

Seth Meyers: "Last night was the first night of election Hanukkah."

Seth Meyers: "According to the New York Times, former Vice President Joe Biden remains the favorite to win the presidency despite the fact that President Trump single-handedly brought back the plywood industry."

Seth Meyers: "New Jersey, South Dakota, and Arizona voted yesterday to legalize recreational marijuana, though right now, all marijuana is medicinal."

Seth Meyers: "President Trump yesterday called in to 'Fox & Friends,' or as he appeared on their caller ID, 'scam likely.'"

Mnuchin, Pelosi Trade Blame For Stimulus Talks Breakdown.

The Washington Post (10/29, Werner, 14.2M) reports the "once-promising relationship between" Treasury Secretary Steven Mnuchin and House Speaker Nancy Pelosi "flamed out publicly Thursday just days before the election, as the two disavowed economic relief talks – and each other." The dispute "started before dawn when Pelosi...dispatched a letter to Mnuchin detailing multiple outstanding issues in their on-again, off-again talks around a $2 trillion stimulus bill." According to the Post, Mnuchin "was offended that the first he saw of the letter was in the media, when Politico's morning newsletter Playbook published it shortly after 6 a.m. – although Pelosi aides said they'd sent it to the Treasury secretary shortly after midnight."

Politico (10/29, Caygle, Ferris, 4.29M) says Pelosi, in her letter, "outlined many of those remaining disagreements, including language related to a national strategic testing plan, funding for state and local governments and liability protections for workers, businesses and schools."

CNBC (10/29, Pramuk, 3.62M) reports Pelosi's letter "signaled to Mnuchin that she wants to continue discussions after the country votes." Pelosi wrote, "Your responses are critical for our negotiations to continue. ... The President's words that 'after the election, we will get the best stimulus package you have ever seen' only have meaning if he can get Mitch McConnell to take his hand off the pause button and get Senate Republican Chairmen moving toward agreement with their House counterparts."

The AP (10/29, Taylor) reports Mnuchin "shot back that Pelosi's letter was a 'political stunt' for the media's benefit," and "said in a response letter that Pelosi's 'ALL OR NONE approach is hurting hard-working families NOW' by holding up more narrowly targeted legislation that could pass with little controversy."

The New York Times (10/29, Cochrane, Fandos, Rappeport, 18.61M) reports Mnuchin wrote, "I woke up this morning and read your letter to me in the press. Because you sent it to my office at midnight and simultaneously released it to the press, I can unfortunately conclude that it is a political stunt." Mnuchin "noted that he had spoken to Ms. Pelosi almost daily for the last 45 days and accused her of mischaracterizing the status of their negotiations." However, Pelosi "has continued to insist that Mr. Mnuchin, the lead negotiator for the White House, agree to final language on a number of issues and respond to Democratic demands." Pelosi "said Mr. Mnuchin had yet to agree to final testing language, despite his declaration this month that 'we'll fundamentally agree with their testing language.'"

Newsweek (10/29, Touchberry, 1.53M) reports Mnuchin "rejected the notion from Pelosi that he'd yet to provide feedback on unsettled policies and that she was to blame for Democrats blocking piecemeal assistance from reaching the American people while they continued to negotiate more relief." The "problem, Mnuchin wrote, was because Pelosi has 'refused to compromise,' noting that she's labeled the bipartisan House Problem Solvers Caucus as having 'no relevance.'"

The Hill (10/29, Williams, 2.98M) reports Mnuchin "also said he's worked with other agencies and committee chairs on responses on several areas of coronavirus relief, including rental assistance, small businesses and funding for the Postal Service." Mnuchin wrote, "While you accuse the Administration of holding up negotiations, you refuse to bring to the floor of the House stand-alone legislation to support Airline workers, additional Paycheck Protection Program payments to small businesses, and additional Direct Payments that we can fund using already approved money that we have not spent."

CNN (10/29, Byrd, 83.16M) reports Pelosi spokesperson Drew Hammill, in a statement responding to Mnuchin's letter, "said the White House has still not given Democrats 'meaningful responses in the areas the Speaker outlined.'" Hammill said, "These responses are needed so that talks can advance to deliver coronavirus relief as soon as possible. ... It is disappointing that the White House wasted time on this letter instead of meaningful responses to meet the needs of the American people."

Assistant Treasury Secretary for Public Affairs Monica Crowley said on KUSI-TV San Diego (10/29, 9:19 a.m. PDT, 9K), "I just want to make it clear that this President and his economic team are fully committed to making sure that every American gets back to work so while we're seeing the strength in this recovery there's still work to be done. And we're still operating in good faith in the stimulus negotiations and we do hope to get something done relatively soon."

CBS News (10/29, Quinn, Segers, 3.68M) also reports.

US Announces New Round Of Sanctions Against Iran.

The Washington Post (10/29, Morello, 14.2M) reports the Administration "on Thursday unveiled a set of punitive measures against Iran, including sanctions for petrochemical sales." The Treasury and State departments "sanctioned a total of 11 people and entities in Iran, China and Singapore for buying and selling Iranian petrochemical products." In addition, "the Justice Department announced that it had filed a civil forfeiture action for Iranian-made weapons bound for Yemen that were seized by U.S. warships in the Persian Gulf." the Department "also said it had already sold 1.1 million barrels of Iranian oil confiscated from four ships headed to Venezuela and would put most of the $40 million in proceeds into a fund for terrorism victims."

The Wall Street Journal (10/29, Talley, Subscription Publication, 7.57M) says the actions come in the final days of the campaign as the President and his surrogates are arguing he has taken an aggressive foreign policy posture toward America's adversaries.

Reuters (10/29, Hosenball) reports that the move comes "after U.S. intelligence officials earlier this month alleged that Iranian hackers sought to threaten some U.S. voters by sending them spoofed emails that were made to appear as though they were from the pro-Trump Proud Boys group." US Attorney for the District of Columbia Michael Sherwin "said on Thursday that the unsealing" of DOJ's complaints was "divorced from politics." Assistant Attorney General for the National Security Division John Demers "said on Thursday that the U.S. government had sold and delivered 1.1 million barrels of Iranian fuel that had been destined for Venezuela, which it had seized earlier this year."

Bloomberg (10/29, Mohsin, Wadhams, Strohm, 4.73M) reports Treasury Secretary Steven Mnuchin said in a statement, "The United States remains committed to targeting any revenue source the Iranian regime uses to fund terrorist groups and oppress the Iranian people."

Mnuchin "Personally" Ensured Treasury Returned FDNY 9/11 Health Funds.

The New York Daily News (10/29, McAuliff, 2.52M) reports the FDNY's "World Trade Center Treatment Program just got its pilfered millions back from the Federal Government – $3,363,931.72, to be exact." This was revealed in "a letter sent to Long Island's Rep. Pete King (R-N.Y.) from Treasury Secretary Steve Mnuchin Wednesday night, finally ending a saga that began years ago with the federal government mysteriously docking payments meant to fund health care for firefighters and EMTs who got sick from serving at Ground Zero." Mnuchin "wrote he was 'very pleased to inform' King that the money was wired to the program's bank account in two payments that very day."

CNN (10/29, Valle, LeBlanc, 83.16M) reports Mnuchin "said Thursday he was 'personally engaged' in the move to refund nearly $4 million previously withheld from the health care program assisting September 11 first responders who suffer lasting health effects from the attack and ensuing cleanup efforts." Mnuchin said in a statement, "For over a decade, the FDNY has been forced to shoulder the burden of debts owed by the NYC government. Since this issue was brought to my attention, I have been personally engaged in ensuring that New York's Bravest receive everything that they are due from the U.S. government." Mnuchin continued: "I am delighted that (The Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services) has wired payments to the FDNY refunding the past offsets applied to cover unpaid NYC debts. ... I am also pleased that this issue has been successfully resolved, and that World Trade Center Health Program payments are now protected from future offsets."

Private Equity, Once A Collins Target, Now Backing Her Reelection In Maine.

Politico (10/29, Meyer, Elliott, 4.29M) runs a critical piece in partnership with ProPublica that says Sen. Susan Collins (R-ME) in 2017 killed her own legislation that would slash "a tax break cherished by the private equity industry," a last-minute decision that "has been one of the mysteries surrounding the $1.5 trillion tax bill." The day after she introduced that legislation, "as the Senate voted on the bill, a Republican Senate aide told a Treasury Department official that Collins was 'no longer offering her amendment,' according to emails obtained by ProPublica through a Freedom of Information Act lawsuit." Three years later, Collins "is facing a tough reelection battle and the private equity industry has become her most reliable source of donations."

Warren Reportedly Wants Treasury Secretary Post In Biden Administration.

The Wall Street Journal (10/29, Collins, Restuccia, Subscription Publication, 7.57M) reports on early campaigning for Cabinet posts in a Biden Administration. The Journal says Sen. Elizabeth Warren (D-MA) has reportedly expressed interest in serving as treasury secretary, but the Journal says that is unlikely because Massachusetts Gov. Charlie Baker (R) would appoint her Senate replacement. Politico (10/29, Thompson, Cassella, 4.29M) also examines Warren's reported Treasury ambitions, with one Democratic official saying, "She wants it."

The Hill (10/29, Pitofsky, 2.98M) and Fox News (10/29, Lea, 27.59M) also report.

Treasury, DOT Voice Concern About FCC's 5.9 GHz Plan.

Reuters (10/29, Shepardson) reports the Treasury Department and the Department of Transportation have "raised strong objections" to a proposal from the Federal Communications Commission that would give a portion of the 5.9 GHz spectrum currently reserved for connected vehicles to be used for Wi-Fi. FCC Chairman Ajit Pai announced that the FCC will vote on November 18 on a plan that would give 45 megahertz of the 75 megahertz currently allocated for Dedicated Short-Range Communications to Wi-Fi use and allow the remaining 30 megahertz to be used for Cellular vehicle-to-Everything (C-V2X). Treasury, in an Oct. 19 letter, "said shifting spectrum would be 'insignificant to the Wi-Fi industry in the long run, but puts the United States at a distinct disadvantage, especially vis-à-vis China, from market, innovation, and security perspectives.'" Treasury added "by reducing the transportation spectrum to 30 MHz, the United States would forfeit its lead in vehicle connectivity and smart infrastructure to China" and said C-V2X has "vulnerabilities that could be exploited by the Chinese."

Trump Campaigns In Tampa.

The Tampa Bay Times (10/29, 742K) reports President Trump "parachut[ed] in" to Tampa Thursday "for a late pitch to recruit as many much-needed Florida votes as possible." The President's message "was similar to the one he's been delivering in Florida for weeks: That the election is a choice between an economic recovery that he will lead, or a depression" Joe Biden will "usher in. Trump touted Thursday's news that the economy in the third quarter grew at a record annual rate of 33.1 percent. ... The nation's economic output still lags pre-pandemic levels."

The Bradenton Herald (10/29, 123K) reports Trump, addressing "a crowd of thousands of people" outside Raymond James Stadium, said, "This election is a choice between the American dream and a socialist nightmare. This would be a very, very large version of Venezuela and this can happen if they get in." Bay News 9 Tampa, FL (10/29, 25K) reported Trump "promised the crowd that the tourism industry will come back soon." Trump: "Under my leadership the Florida tourism industry and hospitality industry will come roaring back. Very soon. It's ready to happen. We are making the turn."

The South Florida Sun Sentinel (10/29, Swisher, Man, 545K) reports "a MAGA-clad and mostly maskless crowd stood shoulder-to-shoulder. They chanted 'lock him up' and 'where is Hunter?,' when Trump referenced Biden's son. Trump has used Hunter Biden's past to attack his opponent on the campaign trail. Trump promised the United States would 'never lock down again,' a public health tactic he says leads to economic misery, suicides and drug overdoses." The AP (10/29, Riechmann) reports, "Trump rallies are among the nation's biggest events being held in defiance of crowd restrictions designed to stop the virus from spreading. This at a time when public health experts are advising people to think twice even about inviting many guests for Thanksgiving dinner."

Ed O'Keefe said on the CBS Evening News (10/29, story 2, 2:30, O'Donnell, 4.35M), "The President's rally was packed with thousands of people, shoulder to shoulder with few masks." Trump: "You know the bottom line, you are going to get better, you are going to get better. If I can get better, anybody can get better." O'Keefe: "And as the President again downplayed the virus, some members of the audience fell sick and were escorted out because of 87 temperatures and high humidity. Hoses cooled the crowd." On NBC Nightly News (10/29, lead story, 3:05, Holt, 5.7M), Kristen Welker similarly said the rally "drew thousands with little social distancing and few masks. And in a separate challenge, in the 87 degree heat, multiple people passed out, 12 taken to the hospital."

David Muir said on ABC World News Tonight (10/29, lead story, 5:05, 7.02M) that Trump "point[ed] to record GDP growth, signs of a recovery. ... Trump, with First Lady Melania Trump today at a rally in Tampa, pointing to the new GDP number, downplaying the state of the virus." ABC's Jonathan Karl: "To get reelected, President Trump must win Florida. There's no state he has visited more. Heck, he even became a Florida resident."

WTSP-TV St. Petersburg, FL (10/29, 29K) reported Trump was "unapologetic for his style, which the crowd here in Tampa couldn't get enough of." Trump: "And if I don't sound like a typical Washington politician, it's because I'm not a politician and I don't always play by the rules of Washington and the Washington establishment." WKMG-TV Orlando, FL (10/29, 69K) reported Trump "also court[ed] Latinos, saying he will win a record share of the Hispanic-American vote."

The New York Times (10/29, Glueck, Mazzei, 18.61M) says Trump "returned to one of the tougher parts of the state for him four years ago, Tampa, one of the few areas he lost to Hillary Clinton in the vote-rich I-4 corridor. Now behind in the polls, the president sought again to win over independents and moderates with a message about corrupt Democrats." Trump "boast[ed] about third-quarter economic gains." The Wall Street Journal (10/29, Jamerson, Ballhaus, Subscription Publication, 7.57M) says past presidents facing defeat in the final days of reelection campaigns, like George H.W. Bush in 1992, argued that a sluggish economy was improving, to no avail.

The Washington Times (10/29, 492K) reports Trump "contrasted his position" on pandemic shutdowns with that of Biden, "who once suggested he would consider new restrictions if scientists recommended them." Fox News (10/29, 27.59M) reports on its website, "'All Biden does is talks about COVID,' Trump said. ... 'He doesn't call it the China virus. You know why? Because China pays him off,' Trump charged, without citing any evidence, as the crowd broke out in a 'lock him up' chant."

The Hill (10/29, Samuels, 2.98M) says the First Lady "made a rare joint appearance" with the President at the rally, and "gave extended remarks in Tampa, where she echoed many of the president's grievances against the media and tech companies and hailed the results of the Trump administration's first term." The Daily Caller (10/29, 716K) writes about what she was wearing. WTVT-TV Tampa, FL (10/29, Cascio, 51K) reports on its website that "thousands waited hours outside of Raymond James Stadium" to attend the rally.

On Fox News' Fox & Friends (10/29, 831K), White House Press Secretary Kayleigh McEnany said, "The President and the rest of the team, we're about to take off across Florida. But in Miami-Dade County, as of yesterday, we are six percentage points ahead of Democrats. That is historic." WSVN-TV Miami-Dade, FL (10/29, 48K) reported McEnany, in an interview, "accus[ed] Democrats of pushing a socialist agenda." On WINK-TV Fort Myers, FL (10/29, 4:08 p.m. EDT, 23K), McEnany said, "The silent majority is real, and they're showing up on November 3."

CNN (10/29, Bradner, 83.16M) says on its website that Trump "would have virtually no path to 270 electoral votes without winning the state." The CBS Evening News (10/29, story 4, 2:00, O'Donnell, 4.35M) aired a feature on some of the Florida voters who could be decisive.

WPost Analysis: Trump Publicly Musing About Losing Election. Toluse Olorunnipa of the Washington Post (10/29, 14.2M) writes under the headline "As Election Day Nears, Trump Ponders Becoming One Thing He So Despises: A Loser" that Trump "has spent the final days of the campaign complaining that the coronavirus crisis is getting too much coverage – and openly musing about losing." The President "has publicly lamented about what a loss would mean, spoken longingly of riding off into the sunset and made unsubstantiated claims that voter fraud could cost him the election." He has told rally attendees that "he had the presidential race won until the pandemic hit."

Economy Grew At 33% Rate In Q3.

The AP (10/29) reports the economy "grew at a record 33.1% annual rate" in the third quarter "but has yet to fully rebound from its plunge in the first half of the year." The Commerce Department's estimate Thursday "showed that the nation has regained only about two-thirds of the output that was lost early this year when the eruption of the virus closed businesses, threw tens of millions out of work and caused the deepest recession since the Great Depression."

The Federalist (10/29, 126K) calls the number "a drastic contrast to the 31.4 percent decrease in real GDP during the second quarter," but Politico (10/29, White, 4.29M) says "beneath the eye-popping headline," it "would take a far bigger jump to get the economy back to where it would have been had Covid-19 not slammed the country at all." USA Today (10/29, Davidson, 10.31M) reports "activity has slowed recently as the pandemic surges and Congress remains deadlocked over new a relief package."

The Wall Street Journal (10/29, Torry, Subscription Publication, 7.57M) says the report is the last snapshot of the economy ahead of next week's election. While the New York Times (10/29, Ewing, 18.61M) says the gain "was by far the biggest since reliable statistics began after World War II," and the Washington Times (10/29, Boyer, 492K) that the report "gives President Trump a positive closing argument in the final days of the presidential campaign," Reuters (10/29, Marte) says the economy is "3.5% below where it was at the end of 2019," and "behind that shortfall is a large number of jobless Americans whose struggles may factor into their decision whether to support" Trump or Joe Biden. Axios (10/29, Brown, Salmon, 521K) reports says "with just five days until Election Day, the report is unlikely to move the electoral needle."

In a separate story, Reuters (10/29, Mutikani) reports "the deep scars from the COVID-19 recession could take a year or more to heal." However, the Washington Post (10/29, Telford, 14.2M) reports NEC Director Kudlow predicted Thursday "that the United States would recover all economic output lost to the pandemic by early spring, even as a second wave of coronavirus infections swells around the globe." Kudlow told Fox News' America's Newsroom, "By late next winter or early spring of 2021, policies permitting, we will regain all the lost output that we suffered during the terrible pandemic contraction." Kudlow was also interviewed on MSNBC's MTP Daily (10/29, 1:19 p.m. EDT, 1.69M), Fox Business' Varney & Co. (10/29, 64K), Fox News' Ingraham Angle (10/29), and Washington Post Live (10/29).

CEA Acting Director Goodspeed said on Fox Business' After The Bell (10/29, 55K) third-quarter GDP not only "exceed[ed] market expectations... but it also exceeded by a factor of two what the nonpartisan Congressional Budget Office was forecasting just a few months ago. And if we cast our minds back to the spring, consensus forecasts were for the US economy to contract during the four quarters of 2020 by 8% or more. So we have pared that loss by more than half." Goodspeed was also interviewed on CNBC's Squawk On The Street (10/29, 10:29 a.m. ET, 277K).

A Wall Street Journal (10/29, Subscription Publication, 7.57M) editorial says Thursday's report is an indication of the V-shaped recovery that has been predicted. A Washington Post (10/29, 14.2M) editorial says Trump "is, not surprisingly, taking credit for the good economic news," but "discerning voters will see through that last-minute political spin to the reality, which is that there is no way out of the crisis without a reliable, steady commitment of federal resources and attention – that is, exactly the kind of leadership that Mr. Trump has failed to provide."

Navarro: To Grow Economy, Manufacturing Jobs Must Be Brought To US. On MSNBC Live (10/29, 9:42 a.m. EDT, 1.58M), Director of Trade and Manufacturing Policy Navarro said, "What we need to do is just think about how we're going to deal with these structural headwinds that's going to be caused" by the coronavirus "that's hitting, for example, our metropolitan areas, our energy sector, transportation sector. What we need, in my view, the magic bullet here, for me, is to bring our manufacturing jobs on shore so that we make more of what we use. That will provide good paying jobs to our people. And they would be able to create the kind of demand we need to grow our economy. That's where the future lies."

Media Analyses: Continued Strong Recovery Threatened By Increase In New Coronavirus Cases. In an article headlined "U.S. Economy's Path Less Certain After Record Quarterly Growth," Bloomberg (10/29, Pickert, 4.73M) reports the economy's "record third-quarter surge has already given way to a more moderate pace of growth, with a fresh jump in coronavirus infections and an extended deadlock over further stimulus threatening to weigh on activity." Analysts are "betting the economy will continue to grow, amid solid gains in consumer spending, strong housing demand and businesses restocking inventories." But "risks are rising...that the pickup in Covid-19's spread to record speed will hit businesses and jobs through renewed distancing and shutdowns, as it already has in Germany and France." CNBC (10/29, Cox, 3.62M) says on its website that the US "faces a tougher road ahead as coronavirus cases increase and worries grow over the health and economic impacts."

Kudlow: Additional Lockdowns Would "Destroy The Economy." NEC Director Kudlow said on Fox Business' Varney & Co. (10/29, 64K) that Trump "does not want lockdowns. He's said this a million times. ... Lockdowns will make the cure worse than the problem. We do know how to mitigate in order to contain the virus. We know this. ... So, let's mitigate in order to contain the virus. A thorough-going shutdown will make matters worse, it would destroy the economy. ... Mitigation is a lot better than shutdown." Kudlow was also interviewed on MSNBC's MTP Daily (10/29, 1:19 p.m. EDT, 1.69M), Fox News' America's Newsroom (10/29, 896K), Fox News' Ingraham Angle (10/29), and Washington Post Live (10/29).

SBA Administrator Carranza "defend[ed] the program in July," writing in a letter that Rapid Decision loan processing used "sophisticated technology" with "robust" internal controls.

Tech Giants Report Strong Earnings, Mixed Outlooks.

The AP (10/29) reports "technology giants" Amazon, Google parent Alphabet, Facebook, Apple and Twitter "reported strong earnings but mixed outlooks Thursday, a sign of varying fortunes as they work to rebound from a pandemic-related economic slowdown earlier this year." All five "exceeded analyst expectations," but "gloomy forecasts and other uncertainties led to share-price declines for all but Alphabet in after-market trading." Bloomberg (10/29, Hajric, 4.73M) says the "solid quarterly earnings from America's biggest tech firms weren't enough to keep investors from selling late Thursday, the latest sign sentiment is turning against ultra-expensive digital megacaps." Reuters (10/29, Randewich), the New York Times (10/29, Wakabayashi, Weise, Nicas, Isaac, 18.61M) and the Wall Street Journal (10/29, Subscription Publication, 7.57M) provide similar coverage.

sales in Europe and decreased revenue from bars and restaurants.

Lawmakers placed the question on the Nov. 3 and "it has widespread support: a recent poll found that two-thirds of likely voters are in favor of it." The Post says legalization would "promise more than $100 million of new tax revenue to New Jersey, which was hit hard by the coronavirus pandemic and is planning to borrow billions to cover the shortfalls left in the government's budget."

ABC World News Tonight (10/29, story 2, 2:55, Muir, 7.02M) reported that the United States hit a new COVID record on Thursday: "More than 85,000 new cases in 24 hours." NIAID Director Fauci "has said...that we needed to be at 10,000 new cases a day heading into the colder weather in order to get a handle on this." NBC Nightly News (10/29, story 4, 3:20, Holt, 5.7M) reported, "The coronavirus has now surged past nine million cases in the US, with at least six states breaking daily records for new cases. And in many remote areas, hospitals are at a breaking point." The Washington Post (10/29, Farzan, Noack, Iati, Villegas Vargas, Taylor, Telford, Kornfield, Sands, Dupree, 14.2M) reports the country "also tallied more than 1,000 deaths related to the virus for the second consecutive day."

The CBS Evening News (10/29, story 5, 2:05, O'Donnell, 4.35M) reported, "We are seeing an alarming rise in new coronavirus cases from coast to coast. New infections are up in 45 states over the past two weeks. Nearly 95% of the US population lives in a state where cases are rising." CBS' Janet Shamlian said, "El Paso County now has more hospitalized coronavirus patients, 934, than 33 states. An additional doctors and nurses sent by the state aren't enough." Utah is "also facing an increasingly desperate situation." In Wisconsin, hospitals "say they could run out of ICU beds in two weeks."

The New York Times (10/29, 18.61M) reports, "Across the country, alarming signs suggested the worst was yet to come: More than 20 states reported more cases over the past week than at any time during the pandemic. Patients were sent to field hospitals in El Paso and the Milwaukee suburbs. Growing outbreaks led to new restrictions on businesses in Chicago. Exactly zero states reported sustained declines in cases."

Administration's Response To COVID Criticized. The AP (10/29, Sedensky, Stobbe) reports, "As a powerful new wave of infections sweeps the US just ahead of Election Day, the nation's handling of the nearly 8-month-old crisis has been marked by what health experts see as grave missteps, wasted time and squandered opportunities by leaders at all levels of government. The result: The country could be looking at a terrible winter." Irwin Redlener of the National Center for Disaster Preparedness at Columbia University said, "The inconsistency of the response is what's been so frustrating. ... If we had just been disciplined about employing all these public health methods early and aggressively, we would not be in the situation we are in now." Fauci "likewise pointed to states' varied responses to reopening for the rocketing case numbers. 'It was like a free-for-all,' Fauci said in an online forum Wednesday."

The Hill (10/29, Bolton, 2.98M) reports Senate Minority Leader Schumer on Thursday "said the federal government is failing to react appropriately to surging coronavirus cases around the country because President Trump is 'a moron.'" On SiriusXM's Joe Madison Show, Schumer said, "More people are in hospitals, more people are dying. This third wave in the cold weather with the combination of the flu, and we're sitting on our hands and that's because Donald Trump is such a – pardon my saying, I know you have a very nice show – such a moron." Schumer "argued that the federal government needs to tackle many pressing needs, such as hospitals getting overwhelmed with new patients and nurses and other workers needing protective equipment." According to The Hill, Schumer's comment "was one of the most explicit shots Schumer has taken at Trump's intelligence and a reflection of how bitter the political atmosphere has become in Washington."

In an editorial, USA Today (10/29, 10.31M) says that "beyond consigning Americans to a wretched winter of sickness before a vaccine becomes widely available," the Trump Administration's "surrendering in the face of a viral enemy" is a "tragically fitting capstone to perhaps the worst crisis-management performance for a president in US history." USA Today says, "The coronavirus presented Trump with a historic leadership test. To give him a second term, after hundreds of thousands of Americans lost their lives, would be to reward a surrendering commander in chief."

White House Praises Trump's Response To COVID. On Fox News' Fox & Friends (10/29, 831K), White House Press Secretary Kayleigh McEnany said that the President's approach to COVID is therapeutics, which "have given us the lowest case fatality rate in the world. Far lower than Europe's. Right now, when you look across the hospitals in the United States, the percentage of COVID patients in hospital beds is 6%. It's because this President did things right. You have 99% survival rate under 70 and above 70 because of our therapeutics it's very close to that because of what this President did, tearing down bureaucratic barriers, tearing down regulations and paving the way for therapeutics."

On Fox News' Outnumbered (10/29, 764K), White House Domestic Policy Council Acting Director Rollins said of Fauci voicing support for a mask mandate, "While the COVID certainly is spiking and that's the main news story right now, mortality death rates are down 85%. Six percent of our hospital beds in the country today, 6%, are being used for COVID patients. There are a couple of outliers – hot spots like El Paso – but America is resilient. ... The idea that the President would issue a national mask mandate, I don't see any scenario where that happens. This President believes in the power of the states. He trusts the governors."

Analysis: Trump Continues To Receive Support On COVID Response From Many White Men. In an analysis, The Atlantic (10/29, Khazan, 3.47M) says that while "most experts think the absence of a national strategy for tackling the coronavirus has been a disaster," about "82 percent of Republicans approve of Trump's coronavirus response – a higher percentage than before the president was diagnosed with the virus." Experts "offer a few different explanations for the spell that Trump has cast over his supporters," but "the simplest is that Trump voters like Trump, and as is often the case with people we like, he can do no wrong in their eyes." Sociologist Arlie Russell Hochschild, a "prominent scholar of the American right, believes Trump support among men, in particular, is rooted in something more psychological. Many white men feel that their gender and race have been vilified. ... Their economic prospects are bad, and American culture tells them that their gender is too. So they've turned to Trump as a type of folk hero."

White House Task Force, Advisers Warn Of Additional COVID Spread.

Reuters (10/29, Chiacu, Michalska) reports the White House coronavirus task force on Thursday "warned of a persistent and broad spread of COVID-19 in the western half of the United States, and its members urged aggressive mitigation measures to curb infections." NIAID Director Fauci, a member of the task force, said in a CNBC interview Wednesday night, "We are on a very difficult trajectory. We're going in the wrong direction." Fauci added, "If things do not change, if they continue on the course we're on, there's gonna be a whole lot of pain in this country with regard to additional cases and hospitalizations, and deaths."

CNN Analysis: Birx Abandons White House To Atlas.

CNN (10/29, Cohen, 83.16M) reports on its website that Deborah Birx "emerged from a meeting at the White House one day in late summer with a new resolution: Never again would she sit in a meeting with Dr. Scott Atlas and listen to him pontificate on the pandemic." That's when she "went all-in on a plan to essentially abandon the White House and avoid the growing influence of Atlas, a radiologist with no expertise in epidemiology who was nevertheless rising in influence" with President Trump. Birx, "a physician with decades of experience in global health, told a friend that she would take her message directly to the people and simply sidestep the kind of misleading messages she'd just heard from Atlas in that meeting."

Public Health Experts Back Biden's Call For National Mask Mandate.

The New York Times (10/29, Stolberg, 18.61M) reports that "public health experts" are "coalescing around" Joe Biden's "call for a 'national mask mandate,' even as they concede such an effort would require much more than the stroke of a presidential pen." According to the Times, "Over the past week, a string of prominent public health experts – notably [NIAID Director Fauci] and Dr. Scott Gottlieb, a former commissioner of the Food and Drug Administration under President Trump – have said it is time to seriously consider a national mandate to curb the spread of the virus." The Times notes that earlier this week, Russian President Vladimir Putin "became the latest foreign leader to impose a national mandate for citizens to wear masks."

The New York Times (10/29, Stolberg, 18.61M) says "twenty-one states added more cases in the seven-day period ending Wednesday than in any other seven-day stretch of the pandemic. And yet President Trump is closing his re-election bid by continuing to declare that the virus is vanishing, brushing aside the devastation it has wrought and making fun of people who take precautions – including measures his own health advisers recommend – to slow the spread of the disease."

Democrats Seek More Information On $265M HHS PR Campaign.

The New York Times (10/29, Weiland, LaFraniere, 18.61M) reports that "a $265 million public campaign to 'defeat despair' around the coronavirus was planned partly around the politically tinged theme that 'helping the president will help the country,' according to documents released on Thursday by House investigators." The Times says HHS Assistant Secretary for Public Affairs Michael Caputo "and others involved envisioned a star-studded campaign to lift American spirits, but the lawmakers said they sought to exclude celebrities who had supported gay rights or same-sex marriage or who had publicly disparaged President Trump." The Times adds, "Ultimately, the campaign collapsed in late September amid recriminations and investigation."

The Washington Post (10/29, Abutaleb, 14.2M) reports that in a letter to HHS Secretary Azar, "three high-ranking Democrats wrote that documents showed that...Caputo sought to use a taxpayer-funded campaign to boost the president only weeks ahead of his reelection bid." According to the Post, "The documents show that Trump political appointees and the contractors they hired also vetted celebrities for the public health campaign based on whether they had ever criticized the president, or supported former president Barack Obama, gay rights or same-sex marriage. Of at least 274 celebrities under consideration, only 10 appear to have been approved, according to a document the lawmakers obtained."

Politico (10/29, Diamond, 4.29M) reports that "one promised public service announcement, which would have also featured infectious disease expert Anthony Fauci, was nixed because the celebrity who was set to participate with Fauci had been critical of" Trump. Politico says Caputo "also sought to overrule the career civil servants assigned to the campaign, directly urging contractors to rush production of ads with celebrities like Trump-supporting actor Antonio Sabato, Jr. 'We must film them ASAP – we need content in the can now,' Caputo wrote in an email to contractors on Sept. 13, three days before he took a medical leave from the health department." According to Politico, Azar "has since ordered a review of the campaign."

Five States, Black Medical Group Form Independent Review Boards For COVID Vaccines.

USA Today (10/29, Weise, 10.31M) reports, "At least five states – California, Nevada, New York, Oregon and Washington – and a Black medical group say they'll conduct independent verification of any COVID-19 vaccines approved by Food and Drug Administration." These review panels, "which began popping up last month, are meant to instill public confidence and counter the political pall cast over COVID-19 vaccine development and approval." Recently, "faith has improved in the FDA's commitment to base COVID-19 vaccines decisions in science, but the growing number of oversight groups seek to add another layer of trust." Though "some worry the independent review boards may hurt the effort, all agree establishing that trust is vitally important."

Healthcare Workers Worry About Medical Gloves Shortage.

NBC Nightly News (10/29, story 5, 2:10, Holt, 5.7M) reported, "As the country is consumed by a new wave in the pandemic, there is rising a concern about a shortage of medical gloves now. That's crucial for keeping healthcare workers and patients safe." NBC's Stephanie Gosk said these gloves are "critical for healthcare workers fighting COVID and there are fears of a looming shortage across the country. In South Dakota where the virus is surging, gloves are now five times more expensive." She added, "Medical gloves are manufactured almost entirely in Asia. The only US-owned factory is in northern New Hampshire."

WPost Investigation: Regulators Cleared Most Nursing Homes Of Infection Control Violations.

In a 4,500-word piece, the Washington Post (10/29, A1, Cenziper, Jacobs, Mulcahy, 14.2M) reports that after the deadly outbreak of COVID-19 cases in the Life Care Center of Kirkland nursing home in Seattle, at least "146 other nursing homes across the country had confirmed coronavirus cases in late March" when CMS Administrator Verma "vowed to help 'keep what happened in Kirkland from happening again.'" However, a Post investigation found government inspectors "deployed by CMS...cleared nearly 8 in 10 nursing homes of any infection-control violations." The American Health Care Association and National Center for Assisted Living said in a statement: "Prioritizing longterm care facilities in emergency situations is key, and we need to focus on a collaborative, not punitive, approach in helping nursing homes respond to this once-in-a-century pandemic."

Staten Island Nursing Home First Saw 40 Deaths, Then 40 Layoffs. The New York Times (10/29, Leland, Occhicone, 18.61M) looks at the difficulties workers of the Clove Lakes Health Care and Rehabilitation Center in Staten Island are facing. Six months ago, "the nursing home was one of the deadliest places in the city, with 40 residents dying in the course of a month." Now, "the workers who cared for them, sometimes holding their hands as they died, face a second crisis: The home recently laid off more than 40 employees, and others fear they will be next." According to the Times, "Theirs are the untold stories of the pandemic: the nursing home workers who reported daily to the viral hot zones, often in facilities without proper protective equipment, and who now face a fiscal crisis beyond their control."

Transportation Officials, Airlines Clash With Public Health Officials Over Quarantines.

The Wall Street Journal (10/29, Sider, Hackman, Tangel, Subscription Publication, 7.57M) reports US transportation officials and airlines disagree with public health officials about requiring people who test negative for coronavirus before they travel to quarantine when they arrive in the US. The divide comes as US officials have been seeking to reach agreement with their foreign counterparts to create safe travel corridors between major US and international cities.

San Francisco's Efforts To Curb Virus Successful, But Leave Downtown Empty.

The San Francisco Chronicle (10/29, 2.67M) reports, "One measure of San Francisco's sustained success in suppressing the coronavirus pandemic has recently stood out: The city's positive coronavirus test rate is just 0.8%, according to California's latest official data." This is "the lowest rate of the 20 most populous cities across the U.S. and the only one to dip below 1%." UCSF infectious disease expert Charles Chiu said that coordination among local experts and city health officials helped curb the extensive community spread that likely would have occurred if the measures were not implemented.

The AP (10/29, Har, Gecker) reports, however, that San Francisco's restrictions "also played a role in shutting down critical elements of San Francisco's vibrant economy – tourism, tech and the city's main business and financial districts, packed with high-rise condos, office towers and headquarters for the likes of Twitter, Pinterest and Slack."

Voting Options For COVID-Positive People Slimmer As Election Draws Closer.

The Washington Post (10/29, Satija, 14.2M) reports, "Hundreds of thousands of Americans will be diagnosed with covid-19 between now and Election Day, leaving many scrambling for alternatives to in-person voting and injecting another dimension of uncertainty into an election already shadowed by the coronavirus pandemic." Those voters "will need to navigate an unfamiliar and varied landscape to cast their ballots." Some "will be required to get doctor's notes or enlist family members to help," while others "will need to have a witness present while they vote." According to the Post, "Planned accommodations – such as officials hand-delivering ballots – may prove inadequate or could be strained beyond limits."

NYTimes: Holidays Need To Be Different As Virus Continues To Spread.

In an editorial, the New York Times (10/29, 18.61M) says that because the coronavirus "spreads most rampantly between people who gather indoors, in close quarters, to talk or laugh or sing, without wearing masks," one of "the most obvious ways to mitigate further viral spread will be for as many people as possible to stay home this holiday season." The Times says that "taking unnecessary risks now would be an affront to all those sacrifices "we have made through the year: "What will have been the point of closing schools, hobbling industries or swapping so many human interactions for so many virtual ones? So much of it will have been for naught if a surge of holiday travel gives way to a tsunami of outbreaks and, ultimately, more death."

Philadelphia Protests Continue Without Curfew As Officials Call For Reform.

The Philadelphia Inquirer (10/29, McCrystal, Dean, Palmer, Park, 347K) reports that while there was no curfew issued Thursday night in Philadelphia, Mayor Jim Kenney (D) and Police Commissioner Danielle Outlaw "urged residents to remain at home unless travel is absolutely necessary, such as for work." The Inquirer says the city "reported that there were 40 arrests from Wednesday night into early Thursday morning related to civil unrest, including four for assaulting police officers, five for curfew violations, 29 for burglaries, and two for stolen automobiles." Four police officers "were injured overnight and have been treated and released." The parents of Walter Wallace Jr., whose killing sparked the Philadelphia protests, asked for justice after viewing body-cam footage of the shooting. The Washington Post (10/29, Ewing, Klemko, Berman, 14.2M) reports Shaka Johnson, the family's attorney, "said Thursday that Wallace was clearly suffering mental distress when Philadelphia police officers fatally shot him this week," but "he said Wallace's relatives are not demanding murder charges in the case, saying the police officers lacked the training to handle the encounter."

The Wall Street Journal (10/29, Calvert, Subscription Publication, 7.57M) reports Outlaw said Thursday she will create a behavioral health unit and urged officers to create a director of available mental health resources. Kenney urged the city to expand a program in which police take people in mental health crises to treatment centers.

The New York Times (10/29, Gross, 18.61M) reports that for "several nights after the shooting, hundreds of protesters took to the streets to demonstrate against what they saw as the excessive use of force by the police against people of color." Nearly "a dozen miles from where crowds were protesting on Wednesday night, businesses including a Walmart, a Lowe's and a Five Below were looted," and "from Monday night through Thursday, 57 officers were injured in clashes with protesters and 212 people were arrested on charges including assault on police and burglary, the authorities said."

White House Officials Denounce Violence In Philadelphia. Asked on Fox News' Fox & Friends (10/29, 831K) about the unrest in Philadelphia, White House Press Secretary Kayleigh McEnany said Thursday, "These are small businesses, people who have worked their entire lives to open these shops, these businesses. And on top of that you have 30 police officers who were injured on the first night of the riots, one run over by a car, a chance to stuff police officers in trunks. A vehicle with explosive devices. Let me be crystal clear why this is happening: it's because Democrats enabled the mob, when they attack our police officers verbally, it ends up they are being attacked physically."

On Fox News' Outnumbered (10/29, 764K), White House Domestic Policy Council Acting Director Rollins said the President "remains resolute in his absolute dedication to ensuring the safety and the security and ultimately the prosperity of all Americans. What is happening and Philadelphia is absolutely inexcusable. He has moved National Guard troops in earlier this week. We are standing by to help in whatever way we can. Our heart goes out to the Wallace family."

DOJ Quietly Shut Down Rice Killing Investigation, Sources Say.

The New York Times (10/29, Savage, Benner, 18.61M) reports that the Justice Department "decided more than a year ago to effectively shut down its civil-rights investigation into the high-profile killing of Tamir Rice, a 12-year-old Black boy carrying a pellet gun who was shot by a Cleveland police officer in 2014, according to people familiar with the matter." Career prosecutors "had asked in 2017 to use a grand jury to gather evidence in their investigation, setting off tensions inside the department." The Times says that, "in an unusual move, department supervisors let the request languish for two years before finally denying permission in August 2019, essentially ending the inquiry without fully conducting it." However, over a year later, "the department has yet to take the bureaucratic steps to close the case, like completing a draft memo explaining why it declined to indict anyone." Moreover, "it has not told the Rice family or the public that it will not charge the police officer."

Citing the Times story, the Cleveland Plain Dealer (10/29, 895K) reports observers "have said the Justice Department rarely pursues civil-rights charges because they are hard to prove." However, "Tamir's mother Samaria Rice had held on to hope that there may be some semblance of accountability" for the officers who shot him.

Taylor Grand Jurors Said There Was "Uproar" When Learning No Officers Charged In Her Death.

CNN (10/29, Joseph, 83.16M) reports on its website, "Two grand jurors who heard the Kentucky Attorney General's Office presentation of the Breonna Taylor case say prosecutors were dismissive of their questions and that there was an 'uproar' when jurors realized Louisville police officers wouldn't be charged with Taylor's death." The anonymous grand jurors "spoke to journalists by phone Wednesday evening...about how their service on the Taylor case was unlike dozens of other cases they heard throughout their month of service." Jefferson County Circuit Court Judge Annie O'Connell "earlier this month allowed grand jurors to speak about their service after Grand Juror 1 filed court documents suggesting public comments by Kentucky Attorney General Daniel Cameron about the proceedings were misleading."

Officers Using Marsy's Law To Hide Identifies Of Police Officers Accused Of Unlawful Force.

USA Today (10/29, 10.31M) reports, "Introduced in memory of a young woman murdered by her ex-boyfriend, Marsy's Law was created to offer crime victims a slate of rights, including protecting them and their families from harassment by their attackers." However, "as police across the nation face cries for accountability amid mounting evidence of brutality and systemic racism, law enforcement agencies in Florida are using Marsy's Law to shield officers after they use force, sometimes under questionable circumstances." USA Today says Florida agencies "have used it to hide the names of officers who sent a 15-year-old boy to the hospital, officers who fired bullets into moving cars and officers who released their K9 dogs on drunk and mentally ill people."

Report On Hunter Biden Reportedly Created By Fake Intelligence Firm.

NBC News (10/29, 6.14M) reports on its website, "One month before a purported leak of files from Hunter Biden's laptop, a fake 'intelligence' report about him went viral on the right-wing internet, asserting an elaborate conspiracy theory" involving business ties to China. The "64-page document that was later disseminated by close associates" of President Trump "appears to be the work of a fake 'intelligence firm' called Typhoon Investigations, according to researchers and public documents," and its author "is a fabricated identity, according to analysis by disinformation researchers."

Trump, Giuliani Reportedly Blame Barr For Lack Of Penetration Of Hunter Biden Story. The Daily Beast (10/29, 1.39M) reports that "weeks after" Rudy Giuliani "first pushed the Hunter Biden files and a collection of sordid dirt to the New York Post...both he and the president, as well as several of Trump's political lieutenants, have grown frustrated at the lack of impact it's had. But rather than conceding that the broader public might not be interested, Trump and Giuliani have instead put the blame for the failure to break through" on Attorney General Barr, discussing "their mutual frustrations with the lack of action from Barr and FBI Director Chris Wray saying that the emails and Hunter files have provided legal ammunition to probe the Bidens," according to "a White House official and a source close to Giuliani."

On Fox News' Fox & Friends (10/29, 831K), White House Press Secretary Kayleigh McEnany said, "Joe Biden still has not denied the substance of this allegation. We have emails, we have text messages, we have a firsthand witness in Tony Bobulinski that says that Joe Biden is compromised by China, he profited off China during his time in government, he profited from foreign governments on taxpayers' dime."

Documents On Hunter Biden Sent To Carlson Have Been Found. The New York Post (10/29, Jacobs, 4.57M) reports a package containing documents relating to Hunter Biden "that went missing while being shipped to Fox News host Tucker Carlson in California has been located." The Daily Caller (10/29, 716K) reports Carlson says the documents "that were shipped to him and his producer while they were in California mysteriously disappeared." Townhall (10/29, Frankel, 177K) reports UPS says the contents of the package have been found and will be returned.

Giuliani Associate Pleads Guilty To Campaign Finance And Wire Fraud Charges.

Politico (10/29, Gerstein, 4.29M) reports that Florida entrepreneur David Correia has become "the first defendant to plead guilty in a campaign finance and business fraud case involving associates of Rudy Giuliani." On Thursday, Correia "pleaded guilty...to two felony counts: one of making false statements to the Federal Election Commission and one of conspiracy to commit wire fraud." According to Politico, "The case against Correia and three other men – Lev Parnas, Igor Fruman and David Kukushkin – has drawn widespread attention because Parnas and Fruman worked closely with Giuliani on various issues related to Ukraine, including an attempt to oust then-U.S. Ambassador to Ukraine Marie Yovanovitch." Reuters (10/29, Stempel) and the CNBC (10/29, Mangan, 3.62M) website have more on Correia's guilty plea.

Wolf Draws Attention To Progress On Constructing Border Wall.

The AP (10/29, Merchant) reports that Acting DHS Secretary Wolf was among "top Trump administration officials" who "visited Texas five days before Election Day to announce they have nearly completed 400 miles of U.S.-Mexico border wall, trying to show progress on perhaps the president's best-known campaign promise four years ago." According to the AP, "while most of the wall went up in areas that had smaller barriers, the government built hundreds of miles of fencing as high as 30 feet (9 meters) in a short amount of time – most of it this year." The AP goes on to report that DHS "waived environmental and other reviews to expedite construction. And despite...Trump's repeated promises that Mexico would pay for the wall, the construction has been funded by U.S. taxpayers for at least $15 billion, two-thirds coming from military funding."

CBP's Morgan Criticizes Twitter For Locking His Account.

Politico (10/29, Oprysko, 4.29M) reports Acting CBP Commissioner Morgan "railed against Twitter on Thursday after he said the social media platform locked his account for violating its policies on hate speech when he tweeted about the US-Mexico border wall." At a "news conference marking the 400th mile of completed wall," Morgan "argued that the tweet that prompted his account to be frozen was meant to praise the work of workers at his agency and the efficacy of the wall in general." Morgan said, "My tweet intended to educate the American people that borders matter, and the great things done by the men and women of CBP and DHS as a whole." However, he said, "Americans across this great country didn't get to see that tweet or the very critical information that was contained in that tweet because Twitter, they removed that tweet and they locked my account yesterday."

Morgan Discusses Operation Mega Flex. Discussing "Operation Mega Flex," CBP's crackdown on illegal international packages, on WGN America (10/29, 12:46 a.m. EDT), Morgan said, "Here's what a lot of people don't realize is they think 'It's no big deal, it's a shirt, it's a pair of shoes, it's a bag.' ... The problem is, that's devastating to US businesses and US importers who are trying to do it in the right way, in legal way. We're losing billions of dollars every single year to this country because of counterfeit products. But what we started to see in recent years is really an explosion of e-commerce. And so, because of that, we knew that we had to have a concentrated effort to really focus on. I'll give you a good example: You know, China alone – we receive 700,000 pieces of international mail and express consignment parcels every single day, and that's just from China."

NYTimes Analysis: Trump Immigration Policies To Be Decided On By Voters.

In an analysis, the New York Times (10/29, Kanno-Youngs, 18.61M) says the Department of Homeland Security "has been racing to deliver" on President Trump's "promise of 450 miles of border wall before the end of the year," and the agency "is still about a week away from the 400-mile marker, according to Customs and Border Protection officials, and nearly all of the construction has been in areas where dilapidated fencing or vehicle barriers already stood." However, "the steel structure on the border, built without congressional approval, is something of a monument to the president's determination" and "has affected the environment, private property owners and, homeland security officials say, the job of border agents." DHS officials "in recent days have traversed the nation, including in battleground states, to emphasize routine arrests by Immigration and Customs Enforcement, criticize Democrats and blast so-called sanctuary city policies." However, the Times says, the future of the President's policies will be determined by voters on Election Day.

Biden Pledges To Create Task Force To Reunite Children With Deported Parents.

Reuters (10/29) reports that Joe Biden has "vowed to create a task force to reunite more than 500 children who were separated from their families at the U.S.-Mexico border by the Trump administration and whose parents have not been located." The Biden campaign released a statement reading, "On his first day as President, Joe Biden will issue an Executive Order creating a federal task force to reunite these children with their parents." According to Reuters, "Thousands of children were separated from their parents at the border, mostly in 2017 and 2018, because their parents were being prosecuted for illegal entry or over concerns about their identities or criminal histories." Reuters says that "there are around 4,000 children who could fall under the reunification order, but as of Oct. 20 parents of 545 children could not be reached by attorneys and non-profits searching for them, according to a court filing."

The AP (10/29, Merchant) says that according to a report released on Thursday by House Democrats, "months before the Trump administration separated thousands of families at the U.S.-Mexico border, a 'pilot program' in Texas left child-welfare officials scrambling to find empty beds for babies taken from their parents in a preview of bigger problems to come." The AP adds, "Documents in the report suggest Health and Human Services officials weren't told by the Department of Homeland Security why shelters were receiving more children taken from their parents in late 2017."

The Washington Post (10/29, Sacchetti, 14.2M) reports that "the Democratic majority staff of the House Judiciary Committee released the findings in a lengthy report Thursday morning, days before the presidential election, following a nearly two-year investigation. It said it found 'reckless incompetence and intentional cruelty' within the program." According to the Post, "The report found what largely already has been revealed publicly: That the Trump administration secretly planned the family separations as a tactic aimed at deterring migrants from seeking asylum in the United States amid fears that their children might be taken from them." The New York Daily News (10/29, Sommerfeldt, 2.52M) says that in emails released by the House Judiciary Committee, Border Patrol agents "privately worried they could face jail time for their roles" in the child separation policy.

Rollins Touts America First Healthcare Plan.

On One America News Network (10/29, 12:04 p.m. EDT, 28K), White House Domestic Policy Council Acting Director Rollins said, "The America First Healthcare Plan looked at all 336 million Americans, and are they getting the healthcare they deserve at the cost they can afford with the choices that they need? And that's what the America First Healthcare Plan is. ... When you look at the preexisting condition question and you look at it within the context of the Affordable Care Act, it's a very, very small slice of Americans. Having said that, this President has been resolute in his dedication and in his absolute conviction that we will ensure that every American with a preexisting will be covered."

HHS Finalizes Transparency Rule For Medical Tests And Procedures.

The AP (10/29, Alonso-Zaldivar) reports that on Thursday, the Trump Administration, "trying to pull back the veil on health care costs to encourage competition...finalized a requirement for insurers to tell consumers up front the actual prices for common tests and procedures." HHS Secretary Azar said, "It will be impossible to walk backwards on this. How do you fight transparency on prices? How do you actually articulate the argument that you should conceal what something costs from the person trying to purchase it?" However, according to the AP, "a major health insurance industry group said the regulation would have the opposite effect, raising premiums."

White Supremacist Group Members Arrested In Michigan.

Trump Evangelical Advisers Involved In Holocaust Survivor Scam Lawsuit.

The Washington Post (10/29, Boorstein, 14.2M) reports author Mike Evans and activist Christian Zionist, "two members of President Trump's evangelical advisory group," are "locked in a nasty legal dispute involving allegations of a multimillion-dollar Holocaust fundraising scam." This summer, they "filed a federal lawsuit against Jentezen Franklin, a Georgia megachurch pastor who has been featured at Trump campaign events." In 2017, the men "had launched a fundraising project to benefit Holocaust survivors in Israel and raised millions for the cause, but Evans's suit alleges Franklin turned over only $1.2 million – withholding more than $3.3 million he'd raised." The lawsuit, "filed in US District Court for the Northern District of Georgia, accuses Franklin of fraud and conspiracy, and alleges Franklin was 'trading on Evans' personal reputation and credibility in Israel' and using him to meet influential Israelis."

The New York Times (10/29, Fuller, Arango, 18.61M) reports that "major cities from Minneapolis to Milwaukee to New York, and even smaller communities like Lubbock, Texas, and Lexington, Ky., are all confronting the same grim pattern" – a surge in gun violence and homicides. Some places, "like Kansas City, Mo., and Indianapolis," are "setting records for the number of killings in a single year." Philadelphia, "which was gripped by unrest this week after the police shooting of a Black man, is among the cities with the highest increase in homicides – its 404 killings this year are a more than 40 percent increase compared with the same period last year." Criminologists "studying the rise in the murder rate point to the effects the pandemic has had on everything from mental health to policing in a time of social distancing, with fewer officers able to perform the up-close-and-personal community outreach work that in normal times has helped mitigate violence."

ABC World News Tonight (10/29, story 3, 2:30, Muir, 7.02M) reported that "the remnants of Hurricane Zeta [are] speeding north, taking at least five lives so far, slamming into Louisiana as a Cat 2, [with] 110-mile-an-hour winds shredding buildings in Biloxi, Mississippi." Morgan Chesky said on NBC Nightly News (10/29, story 2, 1:30, Holt, 5.7M) that "Gulf states [are] bruised and battered, reeling from Zeta. ... The worst of the surge hit Mississippi." The Atlanta Journal-Constitution (10/29, 895K) reports, "Heavy rain and damaging winds from Tropical Storm Zeta swept through North Georgia on Thursday morning, leaving at least three people dead and nearly 1 million in the dark." Emails Said To Show Pompeo Family Mixed Official Business With Personal Requests.

On its website, NBC News (10/29, 6.14M) reports that "hundreds of pages of emails" show how the family of Secretary of State Pompeo "have repeatedly blurred the lines between official government business and domestic or personal matters." According to NBC, the emails "show that Susan Pompeo routinely gives instructions to State Department officials from her personal email address about everything from travel plans and restaurant reservations to the elite Madison Dinners that NBC News reported on in May." Many of the requests "involve routine matters like logistics and scheduling for official events that would involve coordination with the secretary's spouse in any administration," but "other requests, such as seeking assistance with planning a multiday visit for an elite group of young executives from Kansas, appear to be less directly connected to advancing the State Department's core mission."

The AP (10/29, Fox) reports members of President Trump's Cabinet "are logging extra miles as mostly unofficial campaign surrogates in

The Administration, "which came under fire for using the White House as a backdrop for the president's acceptance speech at the Republican National Convention, insists it is adhering to the law known as the Hatch Act."

In the interview, McEnany "did not say she was speaking in a position as a campaign adviser," nor "did the campaign or the White House ever announce that she was serving in both roles." According to the Times, McEnany's "recent appearances have become an encapsulation of the administration's willingness to blur lines."

Notably, President Trump has "targeted high-profile figures" such as NIAID Director Fauci, "whose dire warnings about the coronavirus pandemic angered him." And beyond "recognizable faces, employees across the government were banished to basement offices, denied promotions and excluded from decision-making."

A Wall Street Journal (10/29, Subscription Publication, 7.57M) editorial describes the Administration's threat to sue Walmart for filling legal opioid prescriptions written by licensed doctors registered with the DEA as an abuse of its enforcement authority. The Journal argues that with some state regulators saying refusal to fill valid prescriptions interferes in the doctor-patient relationship, Walmart pharmacists are torn between contradictory orders from federal and state governments.

More Than 80M Have Voted, Some States Have Already Exceeded Total 2016 Turnout.

Reuters (10/29) reports, "More than 80 million Americans have cast ballots in the U.S. presidential election, according to a tally on Thursday from the U.S. Elections Project at the University of Florida, setting the stage for the highest participation rate in over a century. The record-breaking pace, more than 58% of total 2016 turnout, reflects intense interest in the vote. ... Experts have predicted turnout will easily surpass the 138 million who voted" in 2016. Ed O'Keefe said on the CBS Evening News (10/29, story 3, 0:35, O'Donnell, 4.35M), "Several states are now on pace to exceed their 2016 turnout totals. Hawaii has already done it, perhaps that is not surprising, they do all their voting by mail in Hawaii. But Texas is a far bigger surprise. Already at possibly as soon as tomorrow, they could exceed their 2016 turnout, with 8.2 million votes already cast." CNN (10/29, Cohen, Stark, 83.16M) reports on its website, "In four key states – Florida, North Carolina, Nevada and Iowa – Republicans are beginning to narrow the Democratic advantage in pre-Election Day voting. Reuters (10/29) reports the Supreme Court on Thursday "rejected another bid by North Carolina Republicans to block the extension of a deadline for receiving mail-in ballots for next Tuesday's election." The Hill (10/29, Kruzell, 2.98M) reports, "The court's three most conservative justices – Clarence Thomas, Neil Gorsuch and Samuel Alito – would have granted the Republican request." Justice Amy Coney Barrett "took no part in considering the case." However, the Washington Post (10/29, Davis, 14.2M) reports a three-judge panel of the Eighth Circuit Court of Appeals ruled Thursday that Minnesota "must reject ballots received after polls close on Election Day, upending the state's plan to count absentee ballots received up to seven days after the election so long as they were postmarked on Election Day."

The New York Times (10/29, Liptak, 18.61M) says that in "five sets of orders in election cases" this week, Chief Justice John Roberts "staked out a middle ground, one that was consistent with conservative ideas about federalism even as the court's other members seemed to take all-or-nothing approaches."

The Washington Post (10/29, 14.2M) editorializes, "The Supreme Court is in dangerous territory. Republicans jammed [Barrett] onto the court days before next week's election. President Trump explained the reason for the haste: to ensure he has a friendly justice to rule his way when he alleges voting fraud." While "we can all hope that the Supreme Court will be irrelevant to the election going forward," an intervention with Barrett in a 5-4 majority would do "incalculable" damage "to the court's credibility." But the Wall Street Journal (10/29, Subscription Publication, 7.57M) says in an editorial that the Court has been right to intervene to uphold state election laws, and that its rulings contrary to that in the mixed set of decisions this week have made post-election turmoil more, not less, likely.

A USPS spokesman "said the agency was unaware of the problems in Butler County."

The New York Times (10/29, Corasaniti, Hakim, 18.61M) says that in Pennsylvania, the Trump campaign is "pursuing a three-pronged strategy that would effectively suppress mail-in votes in the state, moving to stop the processing of absentee votes before Election Day, pushing to limit how late mail-in ballots can be accepted and intimidating Pennsylvanians trying to vote early." According to the Times, "Election officials and Democrats in Pennsylvania say that the Trump effort is now in full swing after a monthslong push by the president's campaign and Republican allies to undermine faith in the electoral process in a state seen as one of the election's most pivotal."

Politico (10/29, Siders, Montellaro, 4.29M) says "never before in modern presidential politics has a candidate been so reliant on wide-scale efforts to depress the vote as Trump." The Reno Gazette-Journal (10/29, DeHaven, 183K) reports Pence later addressed "a mostly masked and socially distanced crowd of a few hundred supporters at the Reno-Tahoe International Airport," where he "spent the bulk of his roughly one-hour speech taking aim at" Joe Biden.

Biden Campaigns In Florida.

The Miami Herald (10/29) reports Joe Biden campaigned "in Florida's Democratic stronghold of Broward County" on Thursday, "paint[ing] a picture for voters of what he thinks a Donald Trump victory will do for America – and it wasn't pretty. Increasing COVID deaths. No more Obamacare. Tax cuts for the wealthy while working class people bear the burden." Biden said of Trump, "He knows if you vote, he can't win. He knows when America votes, they reject people like him. We choose hope over fear. We choose unity over division, and we choose science over fiction. And, yes, we choose truth over lies."

The AP (10/29) reports Biden made "a direct pitch to Florida's Latino voters by attacking [Trump's] handling of Cuba and Venezuela." The AP says Biden, "speaking at a drive-in rally...said Trump is 'the worst possible standard-bearer for democracy' in places like Cuba and Venezuela." The Washington Post (10/29, 14.2M) reports, "In Florida, a Democratic strategist who spoke on the condition of anonymity to speak candidly shared data showing that the ballot return rate for voters who requested mail ballots is slightly higher among Republican Hispanics than Democrats – 38 percent to 35 percent as of Sunday evening. The raw number of Democratic Hispanics who have voted, however, is higher. And unaffiliated Hispanics have turned out robustly as well."

The Los Angeles Times (10/29, 4.64M) reports Biden "pilloried Trump for the White House management of the pandemic and refusal to take responsibility for soaring infection rates." The Washington Times (10/29, Boyer, 492K) reports Biden said "he won't shut down the economy if he wins the presidency." Biden said, "I'm not going to shut down the country. He called Trump's rally at Raymond James Stadium early in the day a 'super-spreader' event that further demonstrated how little the president cared about controlling the virus."

Both Trump And Biden Will Campaign In Minnesota On Friday.

The Minneapolis Star Tribune (10/29, 1.04M) reports President Trump and Joe Biden "will hold competing Minnesota rallies Friday as the race for the White House intensifies in what has become a potential battleground state in next Tuesday's election. Biden's campaign announced Thursday that he would hold a drive-in car rally in St. Paul at 3:45 p.m., just ahead of a previously scheduled Trump rally at 5 p.m. in the Rochester area." The Washington Post (10/29, Wagner, Sonmez, 14.2M) says the Biden stop is "a rare trip of late by the Democratic nominee to a state that Trump lost four years ago. ... Most of Biden's travel has been concentrated on states where Democrats are trying to improve upon the performance of Hillary Clinton in 2016."

So Why Won't Trump Or Biden Campaign There?" the New York Times (10/29, 18.61M) says that "even as leading figures in both parties urge their respective presidential nominees to take Texas seriously, the campaigns are still reluctant to spend precious remaining time and money there."

Chris Coons (D-DE) and ex-UN Ambassador Susan Rice are said to be interested in serving as secretary of state, while Obama Administration Defense Department official Michele Flournoy is seen as a top contender for defense secretary. Pete Buttigieg has been mentioned as a possible VA secretary or UN ambassador. New Mexico Gov. Michelle Lujan Grisham (D) and Atlanta Mayor Keisha Lance Bottoms (D) have also been mentioned for Cabinet posts.

The New York Times (10/29, Kaplan, 18.61M) reports that Biden is "leaning on veteran advisers with high-level governmental experience rather than outsiders and ideological rivals," who "shaped the center-left policies of a receding era." On economic policy, the Times says Biden turns to Jared Bernstein, who "was Mr. Biden's first chief economist in the White House," along with Austan Goolsbee, a former chairman of the Council of Economic Advisers, and Gene Sperling, a former National Economic Council chairman. On foreign policy, the Times says "perhaps most influential" is Antony Blinken, "who worked for...Biden on the Senate Foreign Relations Committee in the 2000s and served as a deputy national security adviser and deputy secretary of state" under President Obama.

The Wall Street Journal (10/29, Subscription Publication, 7.57M) says in an editorial that though Biden is running as a moderate, his platform, when not vague, is left-leaning, and could presage a progressive shift in policy.

Civil Rights Groups Sue Over Trump's Order Barring Some Diversity Training.

The AP (10/29, Olson) reports that on Thursday, "three civil rights groups filed a lawsuit...challenging President Donald Trump's executive order that prohibits federal agencies, contractors and grant recipients from offering certain diversity training that the president deems 'anti-American.'" The AP says the NAACP Legal Defense Fund "filed the complaint in federal court in Washington, DC, along with the National Urban League and the National Fair Housing Alliance." According to the AP, "The lawsuit argued that Trump's order violates free speech rights and strangles workplace attempts to address systemic race and sex discrimination."

USA Today (10/29, Guynn, 10.31M) reports NAACP Legal Defense Fund Senior Counsel Ajmel Quereshi said the Trump Administration is "trying to keep individuals from even expressing their thoughts. ... What this case does is challenge this executive order on both First Amendment grounds as well as Equal Protection grounds specifically because it tries to keep any federal contractor, federal employee or federal grantee from speaking about the history of systemic discrimination in the United States and its continuing effects."

The Washington Post (10/29, McGregor, Rosenberg, 14.2M) reports that the US Chamber of Commerce and the Business Roundtable have also criticized the executive order, which "bars the use of 'divisive concepts,' including the idea that the United States 'is fundamentally racist or sexist' or that an individual, 'by virtue of his or her race or sex, is inherently racist, sexist, or oppressive, whether consciously or unconsciously.'" According to the Post, "Three of the four examples in the order describe training that references White people, White males or Whiteness."

USA Today (10/29, Bote, 10.31M) reports, "As protections for LGBTQ people enter the domain of the United States' highest court, the vast majority of non-LGBTQ Americans believe that discrimination against LGBTQ should be illegal." According to the 2020 edition of GLAAD's "annual Accelerating Acceptance survey," an "overwhelming number of Americans, regardless of sexuality or gender identity, believe LGBTQ people have federal protections against discrimination that are, in reality, not available to them." This "includes discrimination in housing, public spaces, employment benefits and the military." GLAAD CEO Sarah Kate Ellis believes that the dissonance is due to LGBTQ issues being "left out" of the political conversation.

Interior Department Removes Most Endangered Species Protections For Gray Wolves.

The AP (10/29, Flesher, Mone) reports the Interior Department on Thursday "stripped Endangered Species Act protections for gray wolves in most of the U.S., ending longstanding federal safeguards and putting states and tribes in charge of overseeing the predators." The New York Times (10/29, Einhorn, 18.61M) says the new rule "will officially publish on Tuesday and become effective 60 days after that. ... It was the second time in recent years that the federal government had tried to take wolves off the endangered species list; the last attempt, under the Obama administration, was withdrawn amid strong opposition."

The Los Angeles Times (10/29, 4.64M) reports, "In California and Washington state, wolves would still be protected under those states' endangered species laws. But Utah allows wildlife managers to trap and euthanize wolves to prevent them from reestablishing themselves. And in Montana and Idaho, where Congress intervened to strip wolves of federal protections, nearly 500 have been killed in the past year." The Washington Post (10/29, Fears, 14.2M) reports that the overall population "is up from 1,000 when gray wolves were listed as endangered starting in 1967, officials said. But their population is still so depleted that thousands of acres of historical wolf habitat in Utah, Colorado and Maine is uninhabited by any wolves."

According to Roose, "Plenty of people have fact-checked Mr. Bongino. But nobody has figured out what, exactly, has lifted him above the legions of other pro-Trump influencers battling for attention online."

Global COVID Cases Rose By More Than 500,000 Wednesday.

Reuters (10/29, Ahluwalia, Maan) reports that global coronavirus cases "rose by more than 500,000 for the first time on Wednesday, a record one-day increase as countries across the Northern Hemisphere reported daily spikes." The global coronavirus total "stands at 44.7 million cases and about 1.17 million deaths," and "Europe, North America and Latin America account for over 66% of global cases and over 76% of global deaths." According to Reuters, "Most western countries and parts of Latin America have reported their highest single-day surges in the past few weeks," and "many governments, with the notable exception of the United States, have started taking stronger measures to bring the spread of the virus under control."

COVID Cases Rising Dramatically In Europe.

The AP (10/29, Jordans, Cook, Parra) reports German Chancellor Angela Merkel told citizens "to expect a 'difficult winter' as the country's daily reported coronavirus cases hit a new high Thursday, while residents in France prepared for life under a new month-long lockdown and experts urged Spain to more aggressively curtail its infections." Germany's "disease control agency said local authorities reported 16,774 new positive tests for COVID-19 in the past day, pushing the country's total close to the half million-mark," and "the Robert Koch Institute also recorded 89 additional deaths, bringing its confirmed pandemic death toll to 10,272." While France "announced a second, full nationwide lockdown Wednesday, many countries have hesitated to take such drastic measures for the second time in a year, wary of the economic pain they cause." The British government "has resisted calls for a national lockdown, despite having significantly higher 14-day infection rates than Germany and a virus death toll four times larger." ABC World News Tonight (10/29, story 5, 2:05, Muir, 7.02M) reported, "Europe is watching Belgium," which has a nearly 41% infection rate, "in horror even as their own cases start to spike. Germany hitting new restrictions, a new national lockdown in France and officials will meet here tomorrow to decide whether Belgium should do the same."

The Wall Street Journal (10/29, Subscription Publication, 7.57M) reports the surge in infections is stretching thin the capacity of hospitals in Belgium, France, Italy, and elsewhere. Experts say the rise was a surprise and demonstrates how quickly the virus can grow out of control.

Medical experts "point to many things they now know that were unknown back in the spring: with proper precautions, the rate of coronavirus transmission in schools is relatively low, especially among the youngest students; children who do get infected tend to have mild symptoms; and measures like mask-wearing, social distancing and air circulation are more effective than they had predicted."

The Washington Post (10/29, McAuley, 14.2M) reports, "Three people were killed in a knife attack at a church in the southern French city of Nice on Thursday, an act prosecutors were treating as possible terrorism and which prompted the country to raise its security alert to the highest level." The New York Times (10/29, Méheut, Breeden, 18.61M) says the attack comes "less than two weeks after the beheading of a French schoolteacher. ... Officials in Nice described the attack as Islamist terrorism, and it was quickly followed by two similar events – including a knife-wielding assailant outside a French Consulate in Saudi Arabia – though it was not immediately clear whether the events were coordinated."

Maggie Rulli reported on ABC World News Tonight (10/29, story 4, 1:30, Muir, 7.02M) that France is "on its highest terror alert level after [the] deadly rampage. ... Intiaz Tyab said on the CBS Evening News (10/29, story 6, 1:25, O'Donnell, 4.35M) that President Emmanuel Macron "rushed to the area, telling reporters France is under attack by Islamist terrorists, and sharply increasing the number of troops on the streets to 7,000." Bloomberg says this is "the latest step in the Gulf nation's efforts" to secure the Lockheed Martin fighters "after it agreed to recognize Israel in an accord brokered by the Trump administration." Under US law, "Israel is guaranteed weapons needed to maintain its 'qualitative military edge' over Arab nations," and US officials "have said they can provide that assurance regardless of F-35 sales without specifying publicly what they would offer Israel."

The Washington Post (10/29, Booth, 14.2M) reports, "Jewish leaders, including lawmakers in the Labour Party, have for years accused the party rank-and-file and grandees of using anti-Semitic language on social media and in party meetings," and Corbyn "has also personally faced charges of anti-Semitism."

Freddie Mac Net Income Rises To $2.5B In Q3.

HousingWire (10/29, Ramirez, 23K) reports Freddie Mac's net income "rose to $2.5 billion in the third quarter of 2020, up from $1.5 billion in the second quarter." HousingWire attributes the growth to "guarantee portfolio growth, higher upfront fee income recognition and strong margins on multifamily loan commitments." The GSE "reported 2.95% and 2.21% of the loans in the single-family guarantee portfolio and the multifamily mortgage portfolio, respectively, were in forbearance as of September 30, 2020." Freddie Mac CEO David Brickman said, "The company delivered strong earnings on higher revenues, substantially increasing our total equity by $2.5 billion to $13.9 billion – bringing us one step closer to our goal of responsibly exiting conservatorship. We did this while helping hundreds of thousands of families buy, rent and remain in their homes."

National Mortgage News (10/29, Finkelstein) reports Brickman said, "We expect the multifamily market to continue to do well in the medium to long-term but that ultimately will depend on resumption of economic growth. Since other debt providers have stepped back from the multifamily market, Freddie Mac has stepped forward. This is precisely the countercyclical support borrowers need from us and for which we are almost uniquely suited." Brickman added, "Our data shows that the vast majority of Freddie Mac borrowers who have fallen more than 60 days behind on their mortgage payments during the pandemic, 96.1% to be exact, have enrolled in forbearance. And that figure is even higher among minority borrowers at 97.6%. Since the outbreak began, approximately 639,000 single-family borrowers have used our forbearance options and 300,000 of those have already exited forbearance. In the third quarter nearly 100,000 borrowers moved directly from forbearance to a payment deferral, bringing them current on their mortgage."

DS News (10/29, Babb) reports Brickman said, "The company delivered strong earnings on higher revenues, substantially increasing our total equity by $2.5 billion to $13.9 billion – bringing us one step closer to our goal of responsibly exiting conservatorship. Behind a paywall, Inside Mortgage Finance (10/29, Muolo, Hollier, Subscription Publication) reports, "Meanwhile, there are potential storm clouds on the horizon. Fannie's 'serious delinquency' rate jumped to 3.20% at Sept. 30 from 2.65% 90 days earlier. A year ago, the reading was a mere 0.68%. Freddie's SR rate increased to 3.04% from 2.48% on June 30."

HousingWire (10/29, 23K) reports, "This week, Cindy Waldron, the vice president of research and analytics at Freddie Mac, joins the Housing News Podcast" to share "how the nation's lack of housing inventory is affecting low- and moderate-income borrowers, as well as how COVID-19 will impact the homeownership dreams of Americans who may be struggling financially due to the pandemic." Waldron explains, "We are seeing [the pandemic] hit a lot of renters, but we are actually also seeing it stimulate some of these Millennials. A lot of [Millennials] were staying in place as interest rates remained low, but during COVID-19 we began to see them move to the next house as they wanted additional space." Looking ahead, Waldron says, "Our chief economist at Freddie Mac has predicted the 30-year fixed mortgage will be around 3% in 2021, so that's good news for affordability as these low rates will keep monthly payments down." However, house price growth "has been more challenging."

Freddie Mac: Mortgage Rates Hold Near Record Lows; 30-Year FRM At 2.81%.

The Washington Post (10/29, Lerner, 14.2M) reports a Freddie Mac survey released Thursday shows "mortgage rates remained near record lows last week...amid turbulence in the stock market spurred by investors' uncertainty over rising coronavirus cases and stalled relief talks." The average for a 30-year fixed-rate mortgage "ticked up to 2.81 percent from 2.8 percent with an average 0.7 point. ... The 15-year fixed-rate average ticked down to 2.32 percent from 2.33 percent, with an average 0.6 point. The five-year adjustable-rate average of 2.88 percent, with an average 0.3 point, was slightly up from the 2.87 percent of the previous week." The AP (10/29) reports that the low rates have "bolstered demand from prospective homebuyers."

HousingWire (10/29, Roha, 23K) reports Freddie Mac Chief Economist Sam Khater said, "Strong purchase demand is helping to lift the construction, manufacturing and transportation industries that build new homes and it is also leading to more consumer spending for owners, who are selling or improving their homes. On the refinance front, many consumers are smartly taking advantage of the ability to lower their monthly payment, which means they can spend, save or pay down debt more so than they have in the past."

An "internal memo" indicates "the bureau plans to create the Office of SEFL Policy and Strategy within the SEFL division to decide and assign work to the Office of Enforcement and the Office of Supervision for execution." SEFL Associate Director Bryan Schneider wrote, "This reorganization allows for more effective and consistent delivery of policy, strategic planning, tool choice and operational/administrative functions. The centralization of these functions will increase efficiency, promote role clarity, reduce friction, establish consistency in policy and strategic outcomes SEFL-wide, and leverage existing expertise across SEFL."

Fair Housing Groups Sue Redfin Over "Redlining" Minority Communities.

The AP (10/29) reports that in a "complaint filed in U.S. District Court in Seattle," several fair housing groups "accused Redfin of systematic racial discrimination...saying the online real estate broker offers fewer services to homebuyers and sellers in minority communities – a type of digital redlining that has depressed home values and exacerbated historic injustice in the housing market." According to the plaintiffs, "Redfin's policies and practices operate as a discriminatory stranglehold on communities of color, often the very communities that have been battered by a century of residential segregation, systemic racism, and disinvestment."

Census Survey: 9.9M Americans Not Up-To-Date On Rent Or Mortgage Payments.

CNN (10/30, Lee-Johnson, 83.16M) reports, "According to the US Census Household Pulse Survey, by the end of October, 9.9 million Americans were not up-to-date on their rent or mortgage payments and had little to no confidence that their household could pay next month's rent or mortgage on time." The National Low-Income Housing Coalition (NLIHC) calculates that the country is short 7 million affordable rental homes for low-income renters. NLIHC CEO Diane Yentel said, "To be able to understand the eviction crisis that we're facing today, we have to recognize where we were before Covid-19 came to our country --and that was in the midst of a severe affordable housing crisis." CNN advises readers, "If you are struggling to pay your mortgage, you may be able to temporarily delay monthly payments if you have a federally or GSE-backed (Fannie Mae or Freddie Mac) mortgage. The reprieve is part of the Coronavirus Aid, Relief, and Economic Security (CARES) Act."

Fannie Mae Net Income Soars To $4.23B In Q3.

The Wall Street Journal (10/29, Ackerman, Subscription Publication, 7.57M) reports Fannie Mae reported its net income rose from $2.55 billion in Q2 to $4.23 billion in Q3, up from $3.96 billion in 3Q19. 4.1% of the single-family loans Fannie guarantees were in forbearance as of September 30, a decline from 5.7% at the end of June. MarketWatch (10/29, Prang, 1.67M) reports, "Fannie Mae's third-quarter profit rose from a year ago, while the serious-delinquency rate for single-family homes also climbed. Profit at the mortgage guarantor was $4.23 billion, up from $3.96 billion a year ago. Fannie Mae reported on Thursday." Fannie reported "$430 million in credit-related income. That compares with the second quarter's $22 million in credit-related expenses and $1.76 billion in credit-related income a year ago. Net revenue was $6.75 billion. It rose from $5.54 billion a year ago." According to MarketWatch, "Fannie said 4.1% of its single-family guaranty book was in forbearance at the end of last month, mostly related to the coronavirus pandemic. That was down from 5.7% at the end of June. One-fifth of the loans in forbearance were current at the end of September, Fannie said. Fannie also said that the serious-delinquency rate for single-family was 3.2% at the end of September. That was an increase from 2.65% at the end of June."

HousingWire (10/29, Ramirez, 23K) reports, "Fannie Mae's net worth increased from $16.5 billion as of June 30, 2020 to $20.7 billion as of September 30, 2020. Based on its agreement with the U.S. Department of the Treasury, the company may retain quarterly earnings until its net worth reaches $25 billion." Fannie said in a press release, "Fannie Mae's current forecasts and expectations relating to the impact of the COVID-19 pandemic are subject to many uncertainties and may change, perhaps substantially. It is difficult to assess or predict the impact of this unprecedented event on the company's business, financial results or financial condition."

DS News (10/29, Babb) reports Fannie Mae CEO Hugh Frater said, "Our performance this year demonstrates our ability to support the mortgage market in a safe and sound manner even during these uniquely challenging times. To continue meeting these challenges, we believe our company and the broader housing finance system would be best served by a responsible end to Fannie Mae's conservatorship, consistent with FHFA's goals." Seeking Alpha (10/29, 512K) also reports.

FHA Program Loses Market Share In Q3.

Behind a paywall, Inside Mortgage Finance (10/29, Bancroft, Subscription Publication) reports FHA production volume rose in Q3, according to an analysis of agency MBS, but "the venerable mortgage insurance program continued to lose market share." According to IMF, "Lenders delivered $83.98 billion of single-family FHA loans into Ginnie Mae MBS during the third quarter, a solid 15.2% increase from the prior period. But total sales of loans with some form of primary MI coverage rose 19.0%. The FHA share of the insured agency market fell to 22.7%, down from 23.5% in the second quarter and 28.8% a year ago." IMF says both the VA program and private MI "gained some ground in the insured agency market, with quarterly sales volume increases of 19.7% and 20.3%, respectively."

NY Fed Panel Warns Small Mortgages Could Be A Pain Point.

National Mortgage News (10/29, Sinnock) reports that a NY Fed panel is warning that "potential problems down the road" could be "concentrated in smaller mortgages." According to NMN, "The distress is likely to be concentrated in properties with fewer tenants because in a one-to-four unit building, for example, a single incident of distress can mean a significant decrease in rental income." NMN says the FHFA "recently added a carve-out from an upcoming 50 basis-point refinancing fee for loans with a balance of $125,000 or lower that represents a nod to the concern. Nearly half of these borrowers are at or below 80% of area median income, according to the FHFA." However, "questions remain about how often lenders will be willing to refinance small loans at all as they process a deluge of applications."

JPMorgan Chase Marketing First SOFR-Linked Prime-Loan MBS.

National Mortgage News (10/30, Fest) reports JPMorgan Chase is "marketing the first prime residential mortgage securitization that will reference some of the AAA-rated term notes to the fledgling Secured Overnight Financing Rate published by the New York Fed." Presale reports indicate "three Class A note tranches of pass-through mortgage certificates (as well as an interest-only tranche) can reference SOFR as a benchmark rate in the new $342.2 million JPMorgan Mortgage Trust (JPMTT) 2020-8, should they be lower than the weighted average coupon of the collateral pool after applying a basis-point spread." NMN says, "A term-SOFR rate will be used first according to a benchmark decision waterfall published by the ratings agencies, but the deal could use a compounded SOFR index of prior daily rates."

Zillow: Low Rates Improving Home Affordability, But Americans Struggle Saving For Down Payments.

M Report (10/29, Espinosa) says a "recent Zillow report" suggests that "monthly mortgage payments are getting more affordable for most Americans. In fact, Zillow reports that mortgage rates for U.S. homeowners have actually hit all-time record lows." However, "According to Zillow data, even though mortgage payments are decreasing, the fact remains that American homeowners are still having trouble getting into homes in the first place. The reason for this schism is that would-be buyers face extraordinary price growth in total home prices – prices far above the average American's income (more so than we've seen in the past several years)." Zillow found that "homeowner households earning a median income for American workers reported shelling out 17.5% of their total earnings to use toward a mortgage during the month of September. This figure was down from the 19.6% that was reported just two years ago."

Racial Disparity Evident In Detroit's Housing Market.

The Wall Street Journal (10/29, Subscription Publication, 7.57M) reports that Detroit is a glaring example of systemic failure in housing, according to Quicken Loans' Laura Grannemann. For many of the city's Black residents, decades of redlining and lack of access to affordable credit have kept homeownership out of reach. Of the mortgages made in Detroit, a disproportionate share go to white borrowers; while white Americans make up less than 10% of Detroit's population, they obtained 39% of the city's mortgages in 2019. On the other hand, Black residents are 80% of the city's population, but Black Detroiters only got 51% of the city's mortgages.

NAR: Pending Home Sales Dip 2.2% In September, Missing Expectations.

The AP (10/29) reports US pending home sales dipped 2.2% in September, the National Association of Realtors announced on Thursday. This was the "first monthly contraction of that figure in four months," the AP reports. Reuters (10/29) reports that the economists it had polled "had forecast pending home contracts...rising 3.4% in September." Instead, pending home sales "fell in the Midwest, South, and West," only rising in the Northeast. Mortgage News Daily (10/29, Swanson) reports, "Those polled by Econoday were not universally upbeat, their forecasts were, in fact, wild. They ranged from a 4.0 percent downturn to a 9.5 percent increase. The Econoday consensus was for growth of 3.5 percent, while the consensus from Trading Economics was 3.4 percent."

Potentially behind a paywall, Bloomberg (10/29, Ren, 4.73M) reports NAR Chief Economist Lawrence Yun said, "The demand for home buying remains super strong, even with a slight monthly pullback in September, and we're still likely to end the year with more homes sold overall in 2020 than in 2019. With persistent low mortgage rates and some degree of a continuing jobs recovery, more contract signings are expected in the near future." HousingWire (10/29, Mohtashami, 23K) provides additional coverage.

Wade: Federal Regulations Should Incentivize Pathways To Affordable Housing.

Writing for National Mortgage News (10/29), FHA Commissioner Dana Wade says HUD has been "knocking down many decades-old barriers to the production of manufactured housing, which are homes built in factories and shipped nationwide." However, she says, "manufactured housing has too often been stymied by complex local zoning ordinances, a false stigma regarding quality that is decades out of date, and layer-upon-layer of regulations. Mitigating these issues will expand the supply of manufactured housing and reduce the homeownership affordability gap." Wade concludes that the "federal regulations that govern manufactured housing should encourage the industry's technological advancements, improvements in manufacturing materials, economies-of-scale production, and other process efficiencies and cost savings. All of this translates into more housing affordability and a better menu of options for homeownership."

The euro "was little changed at $1.1676 in Asia, taking a pause after hitting a four-week low of $1.1650 in U.S. trade overnight. Against the yen, the common currency slightly eased at 122.08 yen." The dollar index "rose to a four-week high overnight due to the euro's decline and U.S. data. It stayed near Thursday's level at 93.916 and was on track to post its second monthly gains."

Reuters \(UK\) (10/30) reports, "Gold prices lingered near the one-month low hit in the previous session on Friday, as the dollar strengthened and hopes of an immediate U.S. coronavirus aid package waned." Brent crude "slipped for a third day and was down 60 cents, 1.6%, at $37.05 a barrel by 0720 GMT after touching a five-month low in the previous session." US West

After FBI Warning, US Healthcare Facilities On Cyber Alert.

The New York Daily News (10/29, Shahrighian, 2.52M) reports, "The city is on alert for possible cyberattacks in the wake of an FBI warning about threats to the country's health care system, Mayor de Blasio said Thursday. 'Our Cyber Command is an extremely talented group of people, very strategically conservative in their approach and really making sure that we have what we need across all elements of city government,' he said at a press conference. 'That obviously includes our public health system.'" De Blasio's comments "came after federal authorities said Wednesday that 'malicious cyber actors are targeting the [public health] Sector with Trickbot malware, often leading to ransomware attacks, data theft, and the disruption of healthcare services.'"

CyberScoop (10/29, Lyngaas) reports, "A day after U.S. federal agencies warned of an 'imminent' ransomware threat to hospitals, it's an all-hands-on-deck mentality for a health sector already strained by the coronavirus pandemic." According to CyberScoop, "Private threat briefings are being held for hospital executives, federal officials are appealing for more data on the cybercriminals and hospitals are hardening their computer networks. The defensive measures follow an advisory Wednesday from the FBI and departments of Homeland Security and Health and Human Services that cybercriminals were deploying Ryuk ransomware to disrupt IT networks and extort hospitals. It was a stark warning, even for a health care sector accustomed to pandemic-era cyberattacks: Medical organizations are being singled out by capable crooks."

Vox (10/29, Morrison, 2.27M) reports, "As though hospitals across America didn't have enough to handle with the recent resurgence of Covid-19 causing overflows and straining their resources, they're now the possible targets of a new onslaught of ransomware attacks." Vox adds, "An alert from the FBI, the Department of Health and Human Services (HHS), and the Cybersecurity and Infrastructure Security Agency (CISA) said on Wednesday that there is an imminent threat of ransomware attacks on American hospitals and health care providers. Ransomware is malware that locks up a system's computers and data until a ransom is paid. The alert didn't specify who the agencies thought might be responsible for the attacks, but HHS has said in the past that the ransomware associated with the current threat is linked to Russian criminal groups. The alert also didn't say how many – if any – health care institutions had already been affected, but Reuters reports that there were attacks in New York, Oregon, and Washington state."

WDRB-TV Louisville, KY (10/29, Ragsdale, 179K) reports from Louisville, Kentucky, "Hospitals all around the U.S. are being warned about a scheme to hack computer systems and hold data hostage for money. The FBI and two other federal agencies sent out alerts related to the threats Wednesday night. The alert warns that there is 'credible information of an increased and imminent cybercrime threat to U.S. hospitals and healthcare providers.'" WDRB-TV adds, "The primary means of a hack would be ransomware, according to the alert. The attack would essentially create a 'hostage' situation for hospitals in which hackers would take control of data and not release it until a ransom is paid. There has been no indication that any of the largest health care providers in the Louisville area have been targeted by ransomware attacks. Nonetheless, FBI Louisville's 'Cyber Squad Supervisor is checking in with them' on Thursday, an FBI spokesperson told WDRB News."

VT Digger (VT) (10/29, Jickling, 4K) reports that the FBI "is investigating a cyberattack that caused a shutdown of the University of Vermont Health Network's online systems." UVM Medical Center President Steve Leffler "said Thursday officials had not identified the source of the attack that had downed the electronic health records system and its patient portal, where patients can access their appointment information and medical history. After learning of the issues on Wednesday afternoon, the staff switched to all paper medical records, Leffler said. Some appointments Thursday were cancelled, including certain surgeries and elective X-rays, Leffler said. The Burlington hospital has temporarily stopped taking trauma patients transferred from other emergency rooms. The system shutdown will likely delay the result of some Covid tests."

The AP (10/29) reports from Burlington, Vermont, "The University of Vermont Health Network has 'experienced a significant and ongoing system-wide network issue' and is investigating all causes including a possible cyberattack, officials said Thursday, as federal agencies are warning about cyber-assaults against the U.S. health care system." The AP adds, "Some changes have been made to patient appointments and the network was trying to reach impacted patients, said spokesman Neal Goswami in a text. The outage has affected its six hospitals in various ways." According to the AP, "Federal agencies warned Wednesday that cybercriminals are unleashing a wave of data-scrambling extortion attempts against the U.S. health care system designed to lock up hospital information systems, which could hurt patient care just as nationwide cases of COVID-19 are spiking. The FBI and two federal agencies warned in an alert that they had 'credible information of an increased and imminent cybercrime threat to U.S. hospitals and healthcare providers.'"

Judge Rules Huawei CFO Can Bring Forward Additional Evidence.

Bloomberg (10/29, Pearson, 4.73M) reports that Huawei CFO Meng Wanzhou "will be permitted to bring forward 'some, but not all' of the evidence she had requested," a Canadian judge announced Thursday. The "small victory" means she "can introduce additional evidence to buttress her argument that the U.S. handover request is so deeply flawed it should be thrown out." Meng's defense "has argued that request and its supporting documents were so 'grossly inaccurate' that they constitute an abuse of process grave enough to justify having the court dismiss the extradition case." One batch of emails contains "an excerpt from a separate 2012 deferred prosecution agreement in which" the US DOJ "said it could revive criminal charges against HSBC if the bank 'knowingly' processes transactions that violate sanctions in the future."

Hackers Steal $2.3M From Wisconsin Republican Party Account Funding Trump Reelection Efforts.

The Wall Street Journal (10/29, Subscription Publication, 7.57M) reports that computer hackers stole $2.3 million from a fund the Wisconsin Republican Party has used to support the effort to reelect President Trump in that state. The party's Chairman, Andrew Hitt, said they informed the FBI a week ago when they noticed suspicious activity. The hackers directed funds away from four vendors by manipulating invoices, and the party was discovered when they noticed an invoice that should not have been generated.

The AP (10/29) reports that Hitt "said he was not aware of any other state GOP being targeted for a similar hack, but state parties were warned at the Republican National Convention this summer to be on the lookout for cyber attacks." Campaign officials in the state "learned about the alleged hack from media reports and were furious that state officials had not briefed them on how it might impact operations," according to an anonymous Trump campaign official. Meanwhile, the Wisconsin Department of Justice, "which has a center focused on cyber crime able to assist if requested, has not been asked to investigate, said spokeswoman Rebecca Ballweg."

Reuters (10/29, Satter) reports that Hitt said, "These criminals exhibited a level of familiarity with state party operations at the end of the campaign to commit this crime."

Also reporting are Bloomberg (10/29, 4.73M), NBC News (10/29, 6.14M), and the Milwaukee Journal Sentinel (10/29, 632K).

NSA Unveils 25 Top Vulnerabilities Exploited By Chinese Hackers.

CPO Magazine \(SGP\) (10/29) reports that the NSA "published a report detailing the top 25 vulnerabilities currently being exploited by Chinese state-sponsored hacking groups." The agency "said that the bugs exist in web services or remote access tools." The vulnerabilities are "directly accessible from the Internet and can act as gateways to organizations' internal networks." China and "other state-sponsored threat actors from Russia and Iran had also exploited some of these top vulnerabilities to compromise computer systems." The NSA considers "Chinese malicious cyber activity to be among the greatest risks facing the US Defense Industrial Base (DIB), the US National Security Systems (NSS), and the Department of Defense (DoD) information networks." The NSA "urges organizations in the public and private sectors to patch their systems."

Florida Chamber Of Commerce, Key West Documents Uploaded To Web By Ransomware Group.

The Miami Herald (10/29, Elwood, 1.09M) reports that Florida Chamber of Commerce and city of Key West document have been reportedly "posted online but buried so deep on the Dark Web that a simple Google search won't yield results." The documents were "uploaded by a ransomware group claiming the material was stolen in a cyberattack." Agencies including the FBI "warned Wednesday that cybercriminals are unleashing a major ransomware assault against the U.S. healthcare system." The documents posted so far "include publicly available and seemingly harmless information – based on the Miami Herald's review." However, "their existence still poses two key questions, how can attackers get in and what else can they access?"

US Agencies Warn Kimsuky Hacker Group Is Preying On Foreign Academics.

The Times \(UK\) (10/30, Lloyd Parry, Subscription Publication, 50K) reports, "North Korean hackers are posing as journalists and using bogus emails and websites to extract information from foreign academics and government organisations." A statement from US agencies including the FBI "warns businesses, universities and think tanks against the activities of the so-called Kimsuky group." The group "is believed to have carried out cyberattacks against a range of targets, including South Korean and Indian nuclear power plants." Other hacker groups "have been blamed for a variety of attacks in the past few years, from petty credit card and cashpoint fraud to the robbery of millions of pounds from the Bangladesh national bank."

Akamai CEO Says Hackers Taking Advantage Of Work-From-Home Boom.

CNBC (10/29, Matthews, 3.62M) reports that the "stay-at-home boom" during the pandemic "also has been closely watching a boom in bad actors," according to Akamai Technologies CEO Tom Leighton. Hackers are taking advantage of people working from home, "and massively increasing the number of attacks as daily routine changes caused by the pandemic are prolonged, and become potentially permanent." Leighton said "the threat actors are trying to take advantage of the pandemic, and of course, the prize is greater now that so much business has moved online." He also "said that in the last couple of months, Akamai Technologies has seen an 'enormous increase' in DDoS extortion attacks, mostly threatening financial institutions and national stock markets."

Sony, OmniVision Granted US Licenses To Resume Sensor Shipments To Huawei.

Reuters (10/29) reports that Sony and OmniVision Technologies "have been granted U.S. licences to resume shipping some image sensors" to Huawei, "Nikkei Asia reported on Thursday, citing multiple sources familiar with the matter." US curbs on Huawei "have banned global suppliers from selling it chips, including image sensors, which use U.S. technology, without a special licence since Sept. 15." However, "some display and image sensor-related suppliers are receiving U.S. licences as those components are considered less related to cybersecurity concerns." Sony's license "could be limited only to a portion of its products."

Expert: Basic Cybersecurity Precautions Key To Minimizing Ransomware Threat.

An article in The Conversation (10/29, 62K) discusses a recent ransomware attack on "computer systems in Hall County, Georgia, including a voter signature database." The author, Richard Forno, a cybersecurity professional and researcher at the University of Maryland, Baltimore County, said that attack "follows on the heels of a ransomware attack last month on eResearchTechnology, a company that provides software used in clinical trials." The FBI has "warned that cyber criminals have unleashed a wave of ransomware attacks targeting hospital information systems." These attacks "underscore the challenges that cybersecurity experts face daily – and which loom over the upcoming election." Forno said "there is no silver bullet for defeating cyber threats like ransomware," and "defending against them comes down to the actions of thousands of IT staff and millions of computer users in organizations large and small across the country by embracing and applying the basic good computing practices and IT procedures."

Financial Regulatory Agencies

CFPB Faces Suit Over Payday Rule.

American Banker (10/29, Berry, Subscription Publication, 31K) reports two consumers groups have sued the CFPB "to overturn its 2020 payday lending rule, alleging the bureau violated the Administrative Procedure Act and the Dodd-Frank Act." On behalf of the National Association for Latino Community Asset Builders, Public Citizen and the Center for Responsible Lending filed suit Thursday claiming that the rule was not supported by evidence. Public Citizen attorney Rebecca Smullin said, "The CFPB's rule appears to be crafted solely to boost lenders' profits, contrary to the consumer financial protection mission of the agency."

Office of the Comptroller of the Currency

Brooks, Calomiris: OCC's "True Lender" Rule, Fintech Charter Will Expand Access To Banking.

Writing for The Hill (10/29, 2.98M), Acting Comptroller of the Currency Brian Brooks and Charles Calomiris, Chief Economist at the Office of the Comptroller of the Currency, explain how states' efforts to impose price controls and banking charter limits are "barriers on full and fair access" to the banking system. As such, the OCC recently finalized a rule that clarifies "that a bank is the 'true lender' of a loan and retains the consumer protection obligations related to that loan." The rule "also guards against fears of predatory lending" and "bolster[s] the ability of lenders, including financial technology companies, to create responsible partnerships with banks that reach the customers who may otherwise go unserved." Brooks and Calomiris add that states' efforts to block fintech charters cut "consumer and business choice and opportunity," stifle technology, and prevent "the banking system from adapting to such evolving consumer and market preferences."

Regulators Propose To Weaken Authority Of Guidance.

American Banker (10/29, Pedersen, Subscription Publication, 31K) reports federal financial regulators on Thursday "issued a proposed rulemaking to weaken the authority of supervisory guidance, codifying an announcement from 2018 that declared that guidance does not carry the force of law." In a joint press release, the Office of the Comptroller of the Currency, Federal Reserve, Consumer Financial Protection Bureau, Federal Deposit Insurance Corp., and National Credit Union Administration said, "Unlike a law or regulation, supervisory guidance does not have the force and effect of law and the agencies do not take enforcement actions or issue supervisory criticisms based on non-compliance with supervisory guidance." The agencies added, "Rather, supervisory guidance outlines supervisory expectations and priorities, or articulates views regarding appropriate practices for a given subject area."

Bitcoin Adoption Predicted To Reach 90% By 2030.

The CoinTelegraph (10/29, Pirus, 14K) reports that it will take 10 years for corporate allocation of Bitcoin to become the norm, according to Brian Estes, founder of investment firm Off The Chain Capital. Estes said, "I think in 2029, 2030, when 90% of U.S. households and people in the United States use cryptocurrency and Bitcoin, then I think it becomes a stable part of the [global] economy." According to the article, his "rationale is based on an analysis of the S-curve, a common graphical image depicting the speed and process of adoption for new technologies. ... Digital asset holders make up at least 15% of the 18-and-older U.S. population, based on 2020 data from consultancy firm Cornerstone Advisors, as reported by Forbes contributor Ron Shevlin in July. Acting U.S. Comptroller of the Currency Brian Brooks also commented on this 15% estimate in an August interview with CNN."

Analysis: Volcker Rule's VC Changes Will Support Underserved Regions.

Law360 (10/29, Subscription Publication, 8K) reports behind a paywall, "For nearly a decade, the Bank Holding Company Act, specifically the Volcker Rule, severely restricted banks and banking entities from investing in venture capital funds, effectively preventing them from backing the very types of investments the BHCA originally sought to promote: small businesses, regional businesses and startups that create jobs and spur innovation."

Editorial Wrap-Up

New York Times.

“Holiday Must Look Different This Year. Lives Are At Stake.” The New York Times (10/29, 18.61M) says that because the coronavirus “spreads most rampantly between people who gather indoors, in close quarters, to talk or laugh or sing, without wearing masks,” one of “the most obvious ways to mitigate further viral spread will be for as many people as possible to stay home this holiday season.” The Times says that “taking unnecessary risks now would be an affront to all those sacrifices” we have made through the year: “What will have been the point of closing schools, hobbling industries or swapping so many human interactions for so many virtual ones? So much of it will have been for naught if a surge of holiday travel gives way to a tsunami of outbreaks and, ultimately, more death.”

Washington Post.

“The Supreme Court Could Still Flip The Election.” The Washington Post (10/29, 14.2M) editorializes, “The Supreme Court is in dangerous territory” regarding potential election issues. Republicans “jammed Amy Coney Barrett onto the court days before next week’s election. President Trump explained the reason for the haste: to ensure he has a friendly justice to rule his way when he alleges voting fraud.” While “we can all hope that the Supreme Court will be irrelevant to the election going forward,” an intervention with Barrett in a 5-4 majority would do “incalculable” damage “to the court’s credibility.”

“It’s Great The Economy Grew. But It’s Still In A Hole, And Congress And Trump Have Gone AWOL.” The Washington Post (10/29, 14.2M) says President Trump “is, not surprisingly, taking credit for the good economic news,” but “discerning voters will see through that last-minute political spin to the reality, which is that there is no way out of the crisis without a reliable, steady commitment of federal resources and attention – that is, exactly the kind of leadership that Mr. Trump has failed to provide.”

“Belarus’s Movement Will Hopefully Prevail. A U.S. President More Sympathetic To Democracy Could Help.” The Washington Post (10/29, 14.2M) editorializes, “For about three months, demonstrators in Belarus have been detained, beaten, hit with water cannons, fired from their jobs and expelled from universities by the regime of President Alexander Lukashenko. ... This is a genuine movement for democracy that just won’t quit – and hopefully will prevail.” Despite setbacks, the Post says “the battle for Belarus is not over. The protesters deserve every ounce of support that democratic nations can muster.”

Wall Street Journal.

“The Biden Contradiction.” The Wall Street Journal (10/29, Subscription Publication, 7.57M) says that though Joe Biden is running as a moderate, his platform, when not vague, is left-leaning, and could presage a progressive shift in policy.

“The Economy’s Post-Lockdown Comeback.” The Wall Street Journal (10/29, Subscription Publication, 7.57M) says Thursday’s report on the growth of the economy is an indication of the V-shaped recovery that has been predicted.

“Who’s Ready For Another Bush V. Gore?” The Wall Street Journal (10/29, Subscription Publication, 7.57M) says that the Supreme Court has been right to intervene to uphold state election laws, and that its rulings contrary to that in the mixed set of decisions this week have made post-election turmoil more, not less, likely.

“Walmart’s Opioid Whipsaw.” The Wall Street Journal (10/29, Subscription Publication, 7.57M) describes the Administration’s threat to sue Walmart for filling legal opioid prescriptions written by licensed doctors registered with the DEA as an abuse of its enforcement authority. The Journal argues that with some state regulators saying refusal to fill valid prescriptions interferes in the doctor-patient relationship, Walmart pharmacists are torn between contradictory orders from federal and state governments.

Last LaughsLate Night Political Humor.

Trevor Noah: "Let's kick it off with the coronavirus. It's the reason people hit the ground whenever you sneeze. With cold weather arriving, many places in the world that had largely gotten the pandemic under control are now seeing alarming new spikes. ... While Europe is trying to limit public risk, the corona-in-chief Donald Trump is going around this country holding as many super-spreader rallies as he can. He even changed the crowd chant from 'lock her up' to 'lick your hands.'"

Trevor Noah: [On Trump rushing Sen. Martha McSally on stage at his rally] "I love how Trump cannot even share the spotlight even for a second. He would be a terrible duet with karaoke. 'Okay, I'll sing Brandy and Monica's part, and you can sing the rest.' 'But this song is only Brandy and Monica!'"

Trevor Noah: "All this campaigning doesn't come cheap. Did you know that with the congressional and presidential elections combined, the 2020 elections are expected to cost $14 billion? Twice the cost of 2016, $14 billion! That was almost a combined age of both candidates!"

Trevor Noah: "I mean, do you have any idea how much money that is? If you gave me $14 billion, I would be a billionaire. And what's crazy is they spend all this money to get elected and then, when you're like, 'Okay, I voted for you. Can I get free healthcare?', they will be like, 'Sorry, no money, we spent it on ads.'"

Jimmy Kimmel: "You know, we've all been wondering when is life going to get back to normal? The answer is, how the hell would I know? Even if we do get a vaccine sometime in the next few months, Dr. Fauci says we might not be back to normal until 2022. ... Remember when we were kids and we all thought we'd have flying cars by 2022? Now it's like, maybe in the future we'll be able to go to a movie without killing our grandma."

Jimmy Kimmel: "Meanwhile, the Vice President tested negative today. ... Yesterday, we learned his number two guy on the Space Force tested positive for the virus. Trump put Mike Pence in charge of two things: Space Force and COVID. And somehow, he managed to combine them into one."

Jimmy Kimmel: "Here's a question that I don't think has been asked. If Biden wins, what happens to the Space Force? Do we have to keep pretending that's a real thing?"

Jimmy Kimmel: "Meanwhile, Donald Trump's out there [complaining] about the big tech companies because they've been unwilling to help spread his smears against the Bidens, which I understand. No one likes to have their messages suppressed. Rather than retaliating, maybe just stop lying all the time and see if that solves it."

Jimmy Kimmel: "You know, Trump used to love doing these rallies. He would go and people would cheer. But now that he's losing and still has to go to these towns he hates, he's not doing a very good job of hiding his disdain. ... You know, when he's in prison, he'll wish he could go back to Omaha."

Stephen Colbert: "Currently, cases are rising in more than 40 states, and when it comes to the West and Midwest, the coronavirus task force warns of 'unrelenting, broad community spread.' Also the theme of Trump's campaign rallies."

Stephen Colbert: "As the campaign draws to a close, Trump and Biden are pushing opposing pandemic strategies. Biden is pushing viral containment, while Trump is pushing your grandma into traffic."

Stephen Colbert: [On Trump commenting that people want to return to normal life] "Yeah, I miss those pre-pandemic days of waking up to find out what country [Trump] had blackmailed, which porn star he had paid off, and which hurricane he was threatening to nuke. You know, normal."

Stephen Colbert: "Strangely, Trump's blatant disregard for human life seems to be hurting him with the key demographic of humans. The latest ABC News/Washington Post/PF Chang's Great Wall Of Chocolate poll shows that Biden is leading Trump by 17 points in Wisconsin. Seventeen? Trump doesn't know whether to be worried about that lead, or start dating it."

Stephen Colbert: [On Trump saying that before he knew the writer of the anonymous op-ed in the New York Time was Miles Taylor, he was worried it could be anyone in his inner circle] "(As Trump) 'Now that the mystery's solved, I want to make it abundantly clear: I don't trust my son-in-law, or any of these people around me. They all know things that, if they spilled their guts, I'd be gone in a minute. It's a nest of highly knowledgeable vipers. And I am just so thankful none of them has a conscience or I would be in real trouble."

Stephen Colbert: "Feeling anxious about Tuesday's upcoming election as I am? Well, you're not alone. According to a recent study, nearly 70 percent of US adults say the presidential election is a significant source of stress. It's okay. Just take deep cleansing breaths to forget about this election and start focusing on how much coronavirus you just inhaled."

Jimmy Fallon: "According to Trump, electing Biden will lead to riots in the streets, an economy in the tank, and no holidays. But also, he's a sleepy politician who can't get anything done."

Jimmy Fallon: "Today, Trump and Biden were both campaigning down in Tampa, Florida. ... I'm glad both guys were in the same place, cause it finally ends my uncle's conspiracy theory that Trump and Biden are actually the same lizard person."

Jimmy Fallon: "Yep, Trump went to Tampa, and this was nice. He brought some frozen Nebraska supporters so they could thaw out."

Jimmy Fallon: "As for Trump, you can tell his campaign is low on money 'cause he asked Biden if he wanted to split an Uber back to the airport."

James Corden: "At Trump's rally, first lady Melania Trump took to the stage to speak about the need for social distancing while speaking to a packed crowd of Trump supporters who weren't wearing masks. ... The only people at that rally who are socially distant are Donald and Melania, and they were doing it before COVID."

Seth Meyers: "In recently released audio, President Trump told veteran reporter Bob Woodward that his son-in-law Jared Kushner was, quote, 'one smart cookie,' and added, quote, 'Very capable guy, Jared. You can't get people like this.' And Lord knows, the FBI has tried."

Seth Meyers: "President Trump's campaign ran an ad yesterday on YouTube's home page that compared former Vice President Joe Biden to a zombie. As opposed to Trump, who has never once shown any interest in brains."

Seth Meyers: "The US Space Force yesterday announced that its second-in-command officer has tested positive for the coronavirus, which is an actual news item and not, as you might think, an episode summary for a terrible Netflix series."

Treasury in the News

Pelosi Says Stimulus Package Could Become Lame-Duck Issue, Hopes Stock Market Woes Move Trump.

The Wall Street Journal (10/28, Andrews, Peterson, Subscription Publication, 7.57M) reports House Speaker Nancy Pelosi said the coronavirus relief plan she has been negotiating with Treasury Secretary Steven Mnuchin could become an issue in a lame-duck session of Congress if the two sides don't reach a formal agreement on details, but some lawmakers doubt an agreement can be reached then.

Bloomberg (10/28, Wasson, 4.73M) reports Pelosi "said she hopes the current selloff in U.S. stocks will prompt President Donald Trump to agree to Democratic demands in stalled stimulus talks and end a three-month stalemate." Pelosi said on MSNBC: "What the president cares a lot about is the stock market. As he sees the market react to the spread of the virus and sees the market react to the fact that we do not have an agreement – which could inject resources into the economy – hopefully now he will come to the table in a serious way."

NYTimes Report: Turkish Gov't Lobbied Trump, Mnuchin To Limit Bank Fine.

The New York Times (10/29, Lipton, Weiser, 18.61M) reports President Trump's "apparent eagerness to please" Turkish President Recep Tayyip Erdogan "has drawn scrutiny for years." After senior officials from the Turkish government "lobbied Treasury Secretary Steven Mnuchin and Mr. Trump, Mr. Mnuchin pressed the Justice Department not to impose too large a fine on Halkbank because Turkey could not afford it, two federal officials said." The Times says Mnuchin "considered the violations Halkbank had been accused of to be serious – and he believed the U.S. government was right to demand that the bank admit wrongdoing, according to one White House official involved in the negotiations." However, Mnuchin "raised concerns about how large a fine might be imposed on Halkbank."

Leading National News

Trump Campaigns In Arizona Near Nevada Border.

The AP (10/28, Weissert) reports President Trump made "a crunch-time appeal to voters in Nevada" on Wednesday, but he did it "from Arizona." Trump "was under pressure...to avoid one negative result of a September rally in Nevada that attracted thousands of people: The airport that hosted that event was fined more than $5,500 for violating crowd restrictions aimed at preventing the spread of the coronavirus." Trump instead moved the event "across the banks of the Colorado River to Bullhead City, Arizona," in "the latest example of Trump's efforts to downplay the virus and criticize Democratic leaders in states such as Nevada who have imposed limits on gatherings to combat the worst public health crisis in more than a century."

KLAS-TV Las Vegas (10/28, 6K) reported Trump "pitch[ed] Nevada voters from Arizona because of the Silver State's current social gathering restrictions." Trump spoke "more than an hour to the crowd. Topics included the economy, the Second Amendment, the border wall...and COVID restrictions in Nevada." KVOA-TV Tucson, AZ (10/28, 15K) reported Trump "touch[ed] down in Arizona for the second time in nine days, hoping to take Arizona's crucial 11 electoral votes next week." Trump: "Six days from now, we are going to win Arizona and we are going to win four more years in our great, beautiful White House."

On KTVK-TV Phoenix (10/28, 8:34 a.m. MST, 43K), White House Strategic Communications Director Alyssa Farah said that the President is campaigning in Arizona because he "loves the state" and "doesn't take any vote for granted. He's going to fight and earn the vote of the American people and share that message of promises made and promises kept and how he's delivered for the people of Arizona."

Jonathan Karl said on ABC World News Tonight (10/28, story 2, 4:45, Muir, 6.59M) that Trump "is facing two foes" in the last days of the campaign: "Biden and a pandemic that is getting worse in the very places he needs to win. Unable to ignore the virus, he's downplaying it, and he's making promises." President Trump: "And a safe vaccine is coming very quickly. You're going to have it momentarily that eradicates the virus. We're rounding the turn regardless. Normal life will fully resume. That's what we want. Normal life." Hallie Jackson said on NBC Nightly News (10/28, story 3, 1:55, Holt, 5.63M) that Arizona is "a state President Trump won in 2016 but this year, polls show he is trailing, damaged by how he's handled the coronavirus."

Ed O'Keefe said on the CBS Evening News (10/28, story 2, 3:10, O'Donnell, 3.95M) that the pandemic "continues to dominate the campaign more than any other issue. And despite the evidence that it's only worsening, the President is claiming the opposite, a risky move as he courts late-deciding voters today in western states. ... Trump stumped through Arizona and Nevada" on Wednesday, "trying to reverse Joe Biden's lead in the polls in both states, and he continued to argue the coronavirus, raging in record numbers across the country, is under control."

The Arizona Republic (10/28, 869K) reports Trump "barnstormed Arizona Wednesday in his seventh visit to the state in 2020, where he urged throngs of red-capped supporters in the competitive battleground state. ... Trump's swing through ruby-red Bullhead City and then south to the western suburbs of Maricopa County represented a late push by Republicans to hold Arizona in the red column, even as polls show the state's electorate appears to be favoring" Biden. Arizona's Havasu News-Herald (10/28, 26K) says it was "the first visit to Mohave County by a sitting president – certainly in recent memory and possibly the first ever."

Reuters (10/28, Mason, Scheyder) reports the President "held an in-person campaign rally in Arizona despite a U.S. surge in COVID-19 cases and mounting criticism that he is prioritizing his re-election above the health of his supporters." The New York Times (10/28, Burns, 18.61M) says Trump "is closing his re-election campaign by pleading with voters to ignore the evidence of a calamity unfolding before their eyes and trust his word that the disease is already disappearing as a threat to their personal health and economic well being." At his Wednesday event, Trump "promised voters that a vaccine would be available 'momentarily,' though scientists and pharmaceutical companies say no such breakthrough is assured." The Washington Post (10/28, Gearan, Wang, Wagner, 14.2M) says Trump "pushed ahead Wednesday with a strategy for the closing days of the campaign that minimizes the threat from the coronavirus pandemic, misstates his record in confronting it and mocks... Biden's caution in campaigning amid a disease that has killed more than 225,000 Americans."

NBC News (10/28, 6.14M) reports on its website that Trump "offered a not-very warm welcome" to Sen. Martha McSally (R-AZ) at the rally. After saying McSally "was 'respected by everybody'" and "great," Trump rushed McSally to the stage at an airport rally in Goodyear to say a few words." The President said, "Martha, just come up fast. Fast. Fast. Come on. Quick. You got one minute! One minute, Martha! They don't want to hear this, Martha. Come on. Let's go. Quick, quick, quick. Come on. Let's go." Laurie Roberts of the Arizona Republic (10/28, 869K) writes that Sens. Mike Lee (R-UT) and Rand Paul (R-KY), "who aren't running literally for their political lives... were afforded more time. And, it seemed, more respect."

The Las Vegas Review-Journal (10/28, 345K) reports Trump "sniped at" Nevada Gov. Steve Sisolak (D) "without mentioning him by name. In an afternoon news conference, Sisolak fired back, disputing Trump's assertion that the country had 'turned the corner' on fighting the coronavirus. ... Trump faulted Sisolak for not opening up Nevada for business, and serving as the head of a 'political club.'" KLAS-TV Las Vegas (10/28, 61K) reports on its website that Trump held an unscheduled news conference at his Trump International Hotel in Las Vegas before moving on to Arizona.

Breitbart (10/28, 673K) reports Trump "is barnstorming the country in the last days until the election, hitting critical swing-states important to his re-election. Because of the coronavirus pandemic, the president is delivering campaign speeches outdoors in locations across the country." Fox News (10/28, Musto, 27.59M) reports on its website that Trump spoke "in a strongly Republican area of northwestern Arizona and about an hour from Las Vegas, but still in that city's television market."

Fighter Jet Intercepts Plane Flying In Restricted Area Near Rally. KGUN-TV Tucson, AZ (10/28, 61K) reports on its website, "An F-16 fighter jet intercepted a plane that was flying in a restricted area" during the rally. North American Aerospace Defense Command officials said the plane "was intercepted around 2 p.m. after officials noticed it had entered the Temporary Flight Restriction area surrounding Bullhead City. Officials say the violating aircraft did not respond to initial intercept procedures, but established radio communications after NORAD aircraft deployed signal flares."

Kudlow Predicts "Good Number" For Q3 GDP.

On America This Week (10/28), NEC Director Kudlow said Thursday's Q3 GDP report is "going to be a good number. ... It's going to spill over. The momentum is carrying through to the fourth quarter and with good policies, we can have a bang-up 2021."

IG Criticizes SBA's Management Of EIDL Program.

The Washington Post (10/28, Mider, 14.2M) reports the SBA's Economic Injury Disaster Loan program, which is intended "to help struggling entrepreneurs amid the coronavirus pandemic may have sent billions of dollars to scammers or ineligible applicants, the agency's inspector general said." A report Wednesday from Inspector General Hannibal "Mike" Ware portrayed the $212 billion program "as chaotic and vulnerable to fraud." Ware "disclosed that $450 million in doubtful payments have already been seized by law enforcement and identified tens of billions more that he said required further investigation. The SBA has referred more than 80,000 loans to law enforcement."
