Explanation and analysis

Operation:

Currently, the minimum price increment of futures contracts on U.S. Treasury Bonds traded on NYSE Liffe US (“30 Year Treasury Futures”) is one tick, which is defined as one thirty-second ($1/32^{\text{nd}}$) of one point. With this notice, the Exchange is changing the minimum price increment from one tick to one-half tick.

This change will be effective on September 26, 2011.

Purpose:

The Exchange is reducing the minimum price increment to one-half tick in response to customer feedback. The Exchange has solicited views from a diverse group of leading customers, including Designated Market Makers in the contract, banks, proprietary and algorithmic traders. These clients have supported the change because it allows for more granular pricing, potential tighter bid/offer spread and a larger number of entry and exit transaction points.

Effect:

The effect of a reduced minimum price increment is expected to attract participation by a broader base of market users thereby fostering greater price discovery and market liquidity

Core Principles implicated by the change:

CP 9 – Execution of Transactions: Reducing the minimum price increment should lead to improved price discovery because participants will have increased opportunity to execute transactions at reduced bid/ask spreads.
